It was suggested in argument that, if the broader view taken by the justices prevailed, the apparent contrast suggested by the provisions of s. 12 between the case of the purchased article and the article in possession would be removed. It is not necessary to speculate upon the reasons why Parliament provides for one thing and not for another. It is quite true that under s. 12 (3) in respect of an alleged deficiency in the weight of any article of food delivered to a purchaser, the defendant has an opportunity of proving unavoidable evaporation or drainage plus all due care and precaution taken to avoid such deficiency. The argument is that it is unreasonable that that kind of answer should be contemplated in the case of an alleged deficiency in an article of food delivered to a purchaser, while there is no such provision with reference to pre-packed articles in possession for sale. There may be twenty answers to that conundrum, and I can at once think of one. It is one thing to give the tradesman the opportunity of proving an excuse in the case of a particular article delivered, but it is quite another thing to say that he may have upon his premises ready for sale a whole stock of articles which do not satisfy the requirements of the Act as to weight. It may be expedient to offer a defence in one case, which would open a large door to fraud in another. However that may be, the fact remains that, when s. 12 (3) was passed, it was limited, and we must take it deliberately limited, to the case of an article of food delivered to a purchaser. That is quite a different thing from an article of food held in possession for sale.

The justices have held that s. 4 (2) (a) does not deal with the subject of deficiency of weight. That seems to be manifestly at variance with the plain words of the section. They have held that the words "made up for sale" refer to the act of the putting of the article in its package ready for sale, and to the time when that act was performed. They do not refer solely to that time. The article must be made up in the prescribed quantity at the time when it is in possession for sale. Otherwise the section would have had to read in some such way as this, "unless the article has been made up for sale in quantities of two ounces"; but the words are, "unless the article is made up for sale in quantities of two ounces." Any other construction, it seems to me, would render the provision entirely nugatory. The justices go on to say that the prosecution have not proved that the butter was not made up for sale in those quantities. Lex non cogit ad impossibilia: no such extraordinary provision is contained in or suggested by this section.

While I pay great attention to the able and exhaustive argument of counsel for the respondents, I remain of the opinion that the conclusion of the justices was wrong and that this appeal must be allowed and the case go back to the justices with a direction to find that the offence which was charged was proved.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I agree. I have not, myself, had occasion to apply my mind to the construction of this statute before to-day, and the cases which have been very shortly referred to in argument are sufficient, I think, to show that in many respects it is not an easy Act to construe. Counsel for the respondents may be right when he says that in some respects the Act appears to be illogical. I express no opinion whether it is or not, but I think the court must take refuge in the ordinary rule which applies to the construction of statutes, which is that, where the terms of the statute are plain, then effect must be given to those words. Where the language used appears to be ambiguous, then other matters, including the intention of the framers of the Act, may properly be the subject of inquiry by the court.

In this case the court is asked to construe very short words in s. 4 (2) of the Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926. It is to be observed, first of all, that s. 1 of the Act is quite clear. In general terms it makes it an offence for any person to sell articles of food which are of a less weight, measure, or number than is purported to be sold. That section, however, is by no means comprehensive, because it is not essential that an article of food should be sold either by weight, measure, or number. So, in s. 4, Parliament goes on to deal with what has become a very common practice among those who sell food by retail, that is, the practice of selling pre-packed articles of food, and has provided, in sub-s. (2), that a person shall not sell pre-packed articles of food of certain kinds unless two conditions are fulfilled. The first is, that the article is made up for sale in certain specified units or multiples of those units. Upon that counsel contends that the real meaning of that section is that the article must be made up for sale in quantities purporting to contain 2 oz. or multiples of 2 oz., and so forth. I cannot, myself, find any justification for that argument. If Parliament had intended to say so, I think Parliament would have said so, and I cannot see anything illogical or surprising in finding that Parliament has said that pre-packed articles of food shall be sold, first of all, in certain definite quantities and not in any other way, such as in threepennyworths or sixpennyworths, and, secondly, in packets which contain those quantities. For my own part, I entirely decline to read the word "purporting" into that section. That disposes of the first argument.

The subsection says that the article is to be made up for sale in quantities of certain specified amounts. The expression "made up" is, of course, one which may be used in one of two different ways. It may refer to the moment when the article is made up, and it would be true now to say of some article, in answer to a question: "When was it made up?" "It was made up on Wednesday afternoon." It would be equally true to say on Friday of an article made up on Wednesday and continued to be made up on Friday and was then in the same condition: "It is an article which is made up." I think that this section is clearly dealing with articles which are in the condition described, that is, made up, at the time when they become the subject of an inquiry under this particular subsection—in other words, when some person is found selling or having in his possession for sale those particular articles.

As against that, counsel has referred us to what he calls instances of illogicality on the part of Parliament. For my own part, I think it much wiser not to inquire into those matters till it is necessary to do so. If I thought that the construction which I have given to this subsection was a strained construction or anything except the perfectly plain and obvious meaning of the words used, then I would proceed to inquire whether there were other sections of the Act of Parliament which seemed to indicate that some particular construction must be given to this one. While I respectfully agree with

A what fell from my Lord, that when some of those supposed cases of illogicality are examined there probably is a good explanation to be found for them, I prefer to base my judgment on this, that, in my opinion, the two constructions suggested by counsel are wrong. As they appear to be the constructions which were put upon the subsection by the justices, in my view, the justices were wrong, and I agree that the result will follow as stated by my Lord.

B

SINGLETON, J.—I am satisfied that the contention of the respondents in the court below is ill founded, and I am further satisfied that the finding of the justices cannot be supported. By s. 4 (2) of the Act of 1926: "A person shall not sell or have in his possession for sale any pre-packed article of food of any of the kinds set forth in Sched. I to this Act, unless—(a) the article is made up for sale in quantities of two ounces. . . ."
C It is to be observed that the words are "the article is made up," not "has been made up" and not "has at some distant or recent date been made up." Primâ facie, then, that must be read as meaning "made up at the time of sale or at the time when the article is in possession for sale"—in this case when it was found in the shop by the inspector. Furthermore, the two conditions must, in my view, exist at the same time.
The second condition is in para. (b): "The wrapper or container bears thereon, or on D a label securely attached thereto, a true statement in plain characters of the minimum net weight of the article contained therein. . . ." The statement, if there were no sub-s. (3) of the Act, must be a statement true at the time. It would be no answer, apart from sub-s. (3), to say: "That statement was true at the time when it was put on the label or wrapper, but is no longer true." The two conditions (a) and (b) must co-exist at the same time, and I am satisfied that at the time when the article is exposed E for sale it must be made up for sale in quantities of two ounces, &c. It is not sufficient to say that it has been made up at some prior date.

Counsel for the respondents, in the course of his argument, referred to sub-s. (3), and pointed out that that subsection, on the construction which was sought to be put upon the section by the appellants, would give an answer to a charge under one part of sub-s. (2), but might not give an answer to a charge under the other part. I am bound F to say that I think he showed there was something illogical in the framing of the section or of the Act as a whole, but that does not carry him as far as he wishes. If there is a statement on the wrapper or container within the meaning of sub-s. (2) (b), by reason of sub-s. (3), that statement is not to be deemed to be untrue if it is shown that it was true at the time of packing or of importation, whichever was the later, and the original wrapper or container has remained intact, and I cannot myself see why that concession G should be given when there is no corresponding concession with regard to the other part of the subsection. But it seems to me that a matter, which may have been introduced by way of amendment at the time when the Act was being passed, does not provide an argument to enable the respondents to escape from the ordinary and natural meaning of the clause of the subsection under which they were prosecuted. The ordinary meaning is, I think, plain, and I am of opinion that the justices arrived at a wrong
H conclusion and that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Mortgage—Power of leasing—"Best rent reasonably obtainable"—Twenty-one year lease by mortgagor at best rent then reasonably obtainable—Mortgagor landlord's covenant to pay rates, taxes and insurance—Premises subsequently improved voluntarily by mortgagor—Whether lease binding on mortgagee—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 99 (6).

In 1927 a mortgagor mortgaged an estate. In May, 1933, he granted a twenty-one year lease of the mortgaged property to his son-in-law at a rent of £125 a year, and covenanted to pay all rates and taxes and insurance and to maintain the roofs, drains and structural work, and told his son-in-law that he intended to put the property in a suitable state for his residence, which he subsequently did at a cost of about £300. The property was not worth more than £125 a year at the date of the lease. The mortgagees contended that the lease to the son-in-law did not reserve the best rent that could reasonably be obtained, and, therefore, failed to satisfy the requirement of the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (6), and so was not binding on them.

Held: (i) the rent must be considered in the light of the value of the property at the date of the lease; (ii) in the absence of an express covenant by the mortgagor to improve the property, so as to increase its rateable value, his covenant to pay rates, taxes and insurance could not be construed as showing that the best rent had not been reserved.

Witness Action

The plaintiff mortgagees claimed a declaration that a lease granted on May 12, 1933, to the defendant tenant by their mortgagee under a mortgage made in 1927, and an underlease of part of the property granted by the defendant tenant in October, 1933, were not binding on them. The facts appear in the judgment.

Sir G. Hurst, K.C., and Rand for the plaintiffs, the mortgagees.
Roxburgh, K.C., and A. C. Nesbitt for the defendant, the tenant.
A. C. Nesbitt for the second defendant, the sub-tenant.

LUXMOORE, J.—The plaintiffs in this action (the mortgagees) seek a declaration that a lease executed on May 12, 1933, by one Walter James Fryer (the mortgagor) in favour of the defendant, Leslie Lloyd Somerville, and an underlease of part of the property demised by the lease and dated Oct. 16, 1933, are not binding on the mortgagees, or either of them, and for ancillary relief. The ground on which the declaration is sought is that the lease of May 12, 1933, being by a mortgagor in possession, does not comply with the requirements of s. 99 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. This section confers the statutory power of leasing on mortgagors and mortgagees respectively in possession of mortgaged land. It is to be observed that the section imposes a limit on the term which can be granted, and requires that the lease shall take effect in possession not later than twelve months after its date, and that the rent reserved shall be the best rent that can reasonably be obtained having regard to the circumstances of the case, but without taking fines. The section contains no provision with regard to the covenants which may be inserted in the lease, except that there must be a covenant for the payment of rent and there must also be a condition of re-entry on non-payment of rent within a specified time which must not exceed thirty days. The sole ground on which the lease is impeached in this action is that the rent reserved is not the best rent which could reasonably have been obtained having regard to the circumstances of the case.

The facts of the case are peculiar and perhaps give rise to a certain amount of suspicion.

Counsel for the mortgagees, both in his opening and in his cross-examination of the defendant tenant, suggested that the grant of the lease was a colourable attempt by the mortgagor to obtain an advantage for himself, if, indeed, he was not beneficially entitled to the lease. Nothing in the pleadings warranted any such case being put forward and the argument was confined to the single question of the sufficiency or otherwise of the rent. The facts are as follows: in May, 1924, the mortgagor acquired by purchase a considerable estate at Sonning in Berkshire, known as the Holme Park Estate. In June, 1927, he charged the estate in favour of the mortgagees, Coutts & Co., the well-known banking firm; the charge was an equitable charge, being effected by a memorandum accompanied by the deposit of the deeds. The memorandum contained the usual undertaking to execute a more formal charge if and when called upon by the mortgagees so to do. There were subsequent memoranda to which I need not refer. It is alleged that in or about March, 1933, the mortgagor was being pressed by the mortgagees to execute a legal mortgage, which was to contain a restriction on his statutory power of leasing so that it was only exercisable with the consent of the mortgagees. That legal mortgage was executed on May 19, 1933. On May 12, 1933, the mortgagor had executed the lease in question. It is expressed to be made between the mortgagor of the one part and the tenant, Mr. Somerville, of the other part. By it the landlord agrees to let and the tenant agrees to take all that messuage or dwelling-house known as Holme Farm House, Sonning, together with the ground and all outbuildings thereunto as shown on the plan attached to the lease, for the term of twenty-one years from May 29, 1933, determinable as hereinafter mentioned at the yearly rent of £125 payable by equal quarterly instalments on the days therein mentioned. The lease contained covenants to pay the rent,

> "to keep the messuage and premises and all fixtures and fittings in and about the same and all additions thereto in good tenantable repair, order and condition, also the sanitary and water apparatus and the fittings thereof in thorough substantial repair, order and condition, and at the expiration or sooner determination of the said term to deliver up to the landlord in the same good substantial repair, order and decorative condition as now."

There are a number of other covenants, all of them more or less usual in form, but none of them appears to have any particular materiality to the issue which I have to try except those which are numbered 14 and 16. They are in these terms:

> "14. The landlord agrees to pay all rates and taxes and insurance imposed or in respect of the said premises. 16. The landlord agrees to be responsible for the maintenance and repair of the roofs, drains and structural work."

This lease was given to the tenant, Mr. Somerville, by the mortgagor, who was his father-in-law. There had been some suggestion by Mrs. Somerville, who was the mortgagor's daughter, before its execution, that she would like to live in part of the property comprised in the lease. There were negotiations as to its terms, and when the mortgagor gave it to his son-in-law he told him that he, the mortgagor, intended to make such alterations to the property and to put it in such a state of decoration and repair that Mr. and Mrs. Somerville might live there. At this time the tenant's resources were insufficient to enable him to support his wife and himself in the manner in which they were accustomed to live. The tenant frankly admitted that his private income was hardly more than sufficient to enable him to meet the rent reserved by the lease.

After the lease was granted, the mortgagor instructed a builder named Russell to do work on the premises. Before referring to this work it is material to state in what condition the premises were on May 12, 1933. They consisted of a block of three cottages, all under the same roof. This block was originally the Holme Park Farmhouse and was apparently so named. The cottage at the north end had been occupied by the mortgagor's bailiff, Pitt, and the other two were occupied by farm hands. There was no hot water supply in any of these cottages; there was a bath which could not be used in the bailiff's cottage, and the sanitary arrangements were certainly not up to modern standards. Water was laid on, but there was no gas or electricity. In addition to those cottages there was a bungalow with two rooms occupied by a pensioner. This bungalow had resulted from the conversion of a calving shed. In addition to the A cottages and bungalow there was a large barn which was used as a stable for the farm horses, another barn used for storing hay and straw, a shed for sheltering cattle and also for the storage of farm implements, and a long, low range of buildings, one-half of which was used for standing the cows when they were being milked and the other half of which had been converted into loose boxes for some hunters kept by the mortgagor. There were other and smaller farm buildings. In addition there was a farmyard and another B yard that was gravelled. This yard was in front of the three cottages and was used in part as a stockyard. The whole of the premises comprised an area of about three and a half acres. The approach was by a lane leading from the Sonning Lane and this approach was not metalled, although I think it had a gravelled surface. After the lease was granted, the mortgagor at his own expense converted the bailiff's cottage and the cottage next to it into a dwelling-house. Two bathrooms were constructed, the kitchen C was re-arranged, the wall was removed for repair, a study was built on and the whole building was modernised and brought up to date; basins with hot and cold water were fitted in the bedrooms and electric light and gas were laid on, new fireplaces were constructed and a modern cooking range was installed. This work was finished about September, 1933. By that time the house was, according to the evidence, an attractive residence. I have no information as to the total cost of these alterations and improve- D ments, but Mr. Russell, the builder who did some of the work, was paid £300 for his work.

Expert evidence was called on behalf of the mortgagees as to the letting value of the premises. Mr. Fraser, a partner in the well-known firm of Nicholas, who was well acquainted with the Sonning district, said that in his opinion the present letting value was £250 per annum, but he frankly admitted that he never went over the premises E until January of last year, and that he knew nothing of the state of the property in May, 1933. Mr. Dunn, who is a partner in Simmons and Son of Reading and Henley-on-Thames, agreed with Mr. Fraser's opinion as to the present letting value of the property, but he did not go over the property until September, 1933; he was not able to speak of the condition of the property on May 12, 1933, and was therefore unable to express an opinion as to its letting value at that date. It is obvious that the mort- F gagees and their advisers were unaware that any alterations had been made to the property after May 12, 1933, until after the evidence on behalf of the tenant had been given. The main evidence on behalf of the tenant was given by Mr. France and Mr. Russell. Mr. France is the manager of Messrs. Wilson and Co. He went over the property in September, 1931, and made on the mortgagor's instructions a valuation of the Holme Park Estate as a whole at that time. His description agrees in the main G features with the fuller description subsequently given by Mr. Russell, the builder, to whose evidence I have already referred. He stated that in his view the three cottages were worth respectively, 12s. to 14s. per week for the bailiff's cottage, 9s. to 10s. per week for the cottage next to it, and 7s. to 8s. per week for the third cottage, while the bungalow was worth in his opinion about 5s. a week. He thought it would be difficult to let any of the additional land, or to get any rent for that part of the property H if let separately, but he put its outside annual value at £25. He put the whole value of the property in 1931 at £120 per annum on the basis of the landlord paying the rates, taxes and insurance. Mr. Russell was the only witness able to speak positively to the condition of the property in May, 1933. He went over it on May 14, 1933, on the invitation of the mortgagor, and was given verbal instructions as to the work he was to carry out. I have already stated the effect of his evidence as to the condition of the I property. On his evidence, which I accept, it is clear that the property required very considerable work repair and redecoration to make it suitable for a residence. He put the weekly rental values of the cottages at 10s. to 12s. a week for the bailiff's cottage, 7s. a week as the outside value of the cottage next to it, which he said was in a very poor state of repair, and 8s. to 9s. a week for the third cottage; the weekly value of the bungalow, which has only two rooms, he put at 3s. to 4s. In his view the letting value of the rest of the property would be very small, as it was of practically no value.

On the evidence before me, it is plain that, on May 12, 1933, the value of the property was certainly not more than £125 a year; indeed it seems to me that it may have been considerably below that figure. The only difficulty in the case is caused by the presence of the covenant by the landlord to pay the rates. Taxes are usually paid by the landlord, and the insurance is a negligible matter. There is no covenant by the landlord, the mortgagor, to do any work on the property; there may have been some agreement to that effect, but I have no sufficient evidence to come to a definite conclusion on that point.

The question I have to determine is whether the existence of this covenant by the landlord to pay the rates is, in the circumstances, one which I ought to take into consideration in determining the question whether the rent reserved by the lease was the best rent reasonably obtainable in the circumstances for the property included in the lease. There was no obligation on the mortgagor to spend any money on the property, and I do not think that the mortgagee is entitled to say that the rent is not the best rent reasonably obtainable for a particular property by reference to its condition as a result of voluntary expenditure at a date subsequent to the date of the lease in question. The rent must be considered in reference to the property in its condition at the date of the lease. It is said that the subsequent expenditure may put a very heavy burden upon the mortgagee, because by reason of it the rateable value may be increased, and, as the landlord is liable under the lease for the rates, the actual rent received will be diminished. It is agreed that in a short letting of property in the state in which this property was at the date of the lease, with a number of cottages suitable for letting at weekly rents, it is usual for the landlord to pay the rates; but it is certainly unusual for the landlord to covenant to pay rates in respect of property which is let for a long time. If the property is to be kept during the term in the same state as it was in the beginning of the lease, there would, so far as I can see, be no objection to the covenant, for the rates might go up or they might go down. It is said, however, that such a covenant in a long term must affect the rent reserved prejudicially if it is possible to alter the property by effecting improvements of a sufficiently substantial nature so as to increase materially the rateable value of the property. There was no direct evidence as to the present rateable value of the property. Indeed it was suggested that during the present year the rates were something under £6. There is no evidence that a higher rent could have been obtained by reason of the landlord's covenant to pay the rates. It is true Mr. Fraser said that he could put no monetary value on the covenant, but that he thought it would make a considerable difference. It may well be that a tenant would refuse to accept a lease at a higher rental in consideration of the insertion of such a covenant. I think, in the absence of any express covenant or agreement by the landlord to improve the property in such a way as to increase the rateable value, I cannot treat the presence of the covenant as a circumstance sufficient to warrant a finding that the rent reserved is not the best rent reasonably obtainable.

On the facts, I am satisfied that the rental of £125 reserved by the lease was the best rent reasonably obtainable for the property in the condition in which it was at the date of the lease, and I do not think I should be justified on the evidence (or perhaps I should say on the lack of it) as to the increase, or possibility of increase, in the rateable value by reason of subsequent alterations, in holding that it was not. Counsel for the mortgagees argued that in fact there was no attempt to ascertain whether a higher rental could be obtained from any independent source, and he argued that that by itself was a sufficient ground for holding that the rent reserved was not the best reasonably obtainable. I am unable to accede to that argument. I agree that the fact that the parties to the lease were not at arm's length, and that there was no independent bargaining before the lease was granted, demands a more critical consideration of the question whether the rent reserved was a proper rent or not, and of the evidence with regard to it, than would be necessary if the parties were strangers. However, the matter does not end there, for I am satisfied that the property as it was at the date of the lease was certainly not worth more than £125 per annum, and was in all probability worth less. I do not think I am justified in taking into consideration the intention of the landlord to expend his own moneys on the improvement of the property after the lease was granted, even though that intention was notified to the tenant before the lease was granted. These facts might or might not be material to another aspect of the case; but that aspect is not raised and cannot be considered in this action. In the result, it is impossible for me to hold that in all the circumstances of the case the rent of £125 per annum reserved by the lease was not the best rent reasonably obtainable, and the action therefore fails.

I have not dealt with the position of the second defendants, the sub-tenants, but it is sufficient to say that on Oct. 16, 1933, the tenant granted to them an underlease of a part of the property included in the original lease, being that part other than the residence and the cottage and part of the land which he reserved. The rent reserved by the underlease was £120 per annum. The underletting was granted to enable the sub-tenants to carry on a pig farm. I do not think that the rent reserved by the underlease demonstrates that the rent reserved by the original lease was not the best rent reasonably obtainable at the date of its execution, and beyond this the underlease has no bearing on the case. In the result the action fails against both defendants and will be dismissed with costs.

Action dismissed.

Guarantee—Co-sureties—Action for contribution—Principal debtor not a party and not proved insolvent—Principal debtor not sued by creditor—Inference of principal debtor's insolvency

Practice—Parties—Surety's action against co-sureties for contribution—Amendment to allow joinder of principal debtor or showing of good cause for not doing so—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11.

The rule that a surety who has paid the principal creditor and is suing his co-sureties for contribution without making the principal debtor a party, must give the court some good reason, such as the principal debtor's insolvency, for not making the principal debtor a party is only a rule of convenience; the court may therefore, in a proper case, conclude for itself on the materials before it that, even though the plaintiff has not given any such reasons, no good purpose would be served by joining the principal debtor, and, if it has done so, should proceed with the trial of the action in his absence. If objection is taken to the absence of the principal debtor the court, unless satisfied that no good purpose would be served by joining him, should grant the plaintiff (if he applies therefor) leave to amend his proceedings, pursuant to R.S.C. Ord. 16, r. 11, so as to add the principal debtor as a defendant or to explain why he was not made a party.

The four directors of A. D., Ltd., guaranteed the account of the company with a bank in 1930; in 1933 the bank claimed from the guarantors a sum of £1,195 16s., and one of them, H., the plaintiff, paid part of that sum. The bank then obtained a judgment against the four guarantors, including H., for the sum remaining unpaid on the guarantee. The plaintiff, having had a petition in bankruptcy lodged against him, paid up the full amount remaining owing to the bank. In this action he claimed contribution from his co-sureties, and also that he was entitled to be

A indemnified from any liability under the guarantee by his co-sureties. One of the defendants objected that the principal debtor, A. D., Ltd., had neither been joined as a party to the action nor been proved insolvent. FARWELL, J., refused the plaintiff's application for leave to amend so as to join the principal debtor or to show good reason for not doing so, and dismissed the action.

Held: the appeal must be allowed, and the action remitted to FARWELL, J., for B further trial, because the fact that the bank sued the guarantors, and not the company itself was sufficient in this case for the court to infer that the company was insolvent, and that, therefore, no good purpose would be served by joining it:

Appeal from the decision of FARWELL, J., dated Nov. 16, 1934, who dismissed the action.

The facts are shortly stated in the head-note and are fully set out in the judgment of LORD HANWORTH, M.R.

G J. F. Bowyer for the plaintiff.
H. F. F. Greenland for the defendant Barker.
R. L. Edwards for the defendants Carter and Duckett.

The arguments appear from the judgment of LORD HANWORTH, M.R.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—The plaintiff, A. J. Hay, and the defendants, Carter, H Duckett and Barker, were directors of a company known as Andrew Duckett, Ltd., and they gave two guarantees to the Westminster Bank guaranteeing the account of Andrew Duckett, Ltd., with the bank. Those guarantees were given in 1929 and 1930. In 1933 a demand was made by the bank upon the guarantors for the payment of a sum of £1,195 16s., no doubt the amount of the over-due account of Andrew Duckett, Ltd., both, I suppose, of principal and interest, and in September of that year Mr. Hay, I the plaintiff, paid up a sum of £319 in respect of the principal debt together with £60 for interest. However, although he had played his part, that was not sufficient for the bank, with the result that the bank issued a writ on Sept. 14, against all the guarantors and recovered judgment under Order XIV for the amount then due, which was £913 12s. 7d., together with a sum of £12 9s. 6d. costs. That meant that there was a liability, upon those figures, of £926 and a little more, and that judgment was obtained against all of them on Oct. 16. A bankruptcy notice was issued on Jan. 9 against the plaintiff Hay and served upon him on the 13th. It was not complied with, which meant that he had committed an act of bankruptcy. Thereupon, on Feb. 12 a petition in bankruptcy was lodged against the plaintiff, and the plaintiff, placed in that very serious difficulty, paid up the full amount of the debt and costs then owing to the bank, which by that time had amounted to a little more than the figures I have given, £934 12s. 7d.

On Nov. 17, 1933, the plaintiff commenced an action in the Chancery Division claiming, first of all, a declaration that the defendants were jointly and severally liable to him for the contribution which he had paid up, and all necessary accounts and inquiries; and, secondly, that he was in the position of a surety who was entitled to be indemnified by his co-sureties. No defence was put in by two of the defendants, Mr. Carter or Mr. Duckett, but a defence was put in by the other defendant, Mr. Barker, who claimed in effect that he had given the guarantee to the bank because the bank had required the signature of all the directors. Para. 3 of his defence and counterclaim says this:

> "The defendant executed the guarantees mentioned at the verbal request of the plaintiff and the defendant Carter, who verbally represented to him that the company's bankers required the signatures of all the directors of the company to such guarantees."

Then the defendant Barker says that he had no means, as they knew, except his salary and some moneys which would be paid to him by the company, and that the directors had agreed to indemnify him from any liability which arose against him under this guarantee given to the bank. Upon that he said there was a defence to the plaintiff's claim, and he counterclaimed, in respect of his rights under the agreement made with him by the other directors, and asked for a declaration that the other defendants and the plaintiff were bound to indemnify him against any liability or to exonerate him from any claims to contribution.

The action came before FARWELL, J. The petition was mentioned, the facts I have stated were told to the learned judge, proof was given by the plaintiff of the payment of £934 12s. 7d., and then his case was closed. Counsel, on behalf of the defendant Barker, took a point that the principal debtor, Andrew Duckett, Ltd., ought to have been made a party to this action by being joined as a defendant and that, in the absence of the principal debtor, the action could not be dealt with by the learned judge. That proposition was said to follow from Lawson v. Wright (2). FARWELL, J., acceded to that view, and said:

> "At the close of the plaintiff's case, and before opening his defence, counsel on behalf of the defendant Barker, submitted that the plaintiff had not proved his case, and was entitled to no relief against his client, on the ground that the plaintiff had neither proved that the company was insolvent nor made the company a party to the action; and in support of this submission he referred to Lawson v. Wright (2), a case where a surety sued a principal debtor and co-surety, alleging insolvency of the former and claiming a contribution from his co-surety on that ground, and that case is directly in point here."

In other words, FARWELL, J., held that the failure to make the principal debtor a party could not be excused unless there were affirmative proof that the principal debtor was in fact insolvent, that as that proof had not been given the plaintiff's claim had not been established. He thereupon dismissed the action and ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs of all three defendants, and he also dismissed the counterclaim and granted a set-off in respect of the costs of claim and counterclaim of the defendant Barker.

We have looked into Lawson v. Wright (2) to see whether or not that course adopted by the learned judge was the necessary and right course established by Lawson v. Wright (2). It certainly seems somewhat startling to find that in these days an action can be, and ought to be, dismissed out of court by reason of the failure to have the proper parties before the court. No amendment was allowed; no adjournment was allowed for the purpose of further joinder of the principal debtor, but the learned judge said that his order in the action was to be without prejudice to either party commencing fresh proceedings. In other words, there was liberty to start over again and bring the matter before the court when the proper parties should be presented to the court.

We have looked at Lawson v. Wright (2) and some other cases. It would appear that the rule which FARWELL, J., applied was an objection in point of form to the action. It does not appear in any of the cases that it is established that the objection taken was one based on a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to bring his action, and it would seem also that the proof of the insolvency of the principal debtor would be an excuse from the necessity to join him as a party, and that the proof or information available to the court as to the insolvency of the principal debtor need not necessarily be given by affirmative proof tendered and established by the plaintiff. Turning to Lawson v. Wright (2), the judgment which was there given by SIR LLOYD KENYON, M.R., contained these words (1 Cox, Eq. Cas. at p. 276):

> "His Honour was very clear on the general equity of the case, and said it had been established ever since the origin of Courts of Equity, that one surety had a right to call on another for contribution in cases of this nature; but his Honour had some doubts whether it was not absolutely necessary to prove the insolvency of the principal, which was not done in the present case. To which objection it was answered by the counsel for the plaintiff, that although such was the rule where the principal was not before the court, yet the principal being here a defendant, it was competent to the court to make such a decree, as it could at the same time direct payment from the principal to the co-surety, and it was also suggested that there might be a difference in the case where the money had been actually paid by one surety."

As a matter of fact, the decree was that it should be referred to take an account, and the head-note says:

> "On a bill filed by a surety against his co-surety and the principal for a contribution from the co-surety in respect of money actually paid by the plaintiff for the principal, it is not necessary to prove the insolvency of the principal; otherwise where the principal is not a party to the suit."

I turn now to look at some of the other cases in which this point has been considered. In Hitchman v. Stewart (3) it was contended that in similar circumstances the principal debtor was not a necessary party; and three cases were cited to establish that point. The first is Madox v. Jackson (4), where LORD HARDWICKE says (3 Atk. at p. 406):

> "The general rule of the court, to be sure, is, where a debt is joint and several, the plaintiff must bring each of the debtors before the court, because they are entitled to the assistance of each other in taking the account. Another reason is, that the debtors are entitled to a contribution, where one pays more than his share of the debt. But there are exceptions to this, and the exception out of the first rule is, that if some of the obligors are only sureties, there is no pretence for the principal in the bond to say that the creditor ought to bring the surety before the court, unless he had paid the debt. The exception out of the second rule is that if there are no personal assets at all, and this fact appears plainly in the cause, there is no occasion to bring the representative of that co-obligor before the court."

It is therefore stated by LORD HARDWICKE not that there is a condition precedent, but that the court must be informed as to whether or not it was of importance that the further party should be before the court, and the necessity of the party being before the court was answered if there were no personal assets in his hands at all. I turn to the next case in which that point was considered: Collins v. Griffith (5). There Lord Chancellor KING refers to the question of the necessity of having all the obligors before the court and overrules the objection that it was necessary to make them all parties to the suit. In the last case to which I need refer, Angerstein v. Clarke (6), it is said by the LORD CHANCELLOR that > "if one of the persons living (which is a stronger case than that of a dead person) be admitted to be insolvent, surely it ought to be an answer to an objection for want of parties."

After looking at those cases, I now turn to Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (1) (1 Cox, Eq. Cas. at p. 323), where the objection was taken that the principal debtor was not before the court, and the observation which is made is this:

> "The objection in point of form, which I before mentioned, is, that the bill cannot be sustained, inasmuch as it has not charged the insolvency of the principal debtor, and that such a charge is absolutely necessary. As a question of form, it ought to have been brought on by demurrer; but in substance the insolvency of Mr. Dering may be collected from the whole proceedings, which strongly imply it; for the plaintiff appears to have submitted to the judgment, and the defendants have made their defence on other grounds."

It appears, therefore, that this rule is not one which is to be treated as a condition precedent, but one which is to be observed unless there is the excuse, which is excepted to it, of insolvency, and hence that it would serve no useful purpose in insisting on the presence of the principal debtor before the court. In a passage which is to be found in Rowlatt, J.'s book on Principal and Surety (2nd Edn.), pp. 229, 230, he says:

> "It would seem right upon principle that a surety should not have contribution from a co-surety unless he proves that the principal is insolvent, or at any rate that there is some impediment to suing him. The contrary course would certainly lead to a multiplicity of suits, and where he has no contract giving him such a right it seems anomalous that the surety paying should have an equity to contribution so long as the remedy against the principal, which would relieve all the sureties, is available."

The upshot of all that appears to be this, that the rule which is found in Lawson v. Wright (2) is a rule which must be affirmed and applied, but a rule the observance of which can be overcome if there is evidence that no useful purpose would be served by having this particular party, the principal debtor, before the court by reason of his insolvency. When that excuse is given the want of form is excused; in other words, that the rule is one which does not lay down a condition precedent but want of form which may be overcome. It may be overcome by proof or it may be overcome by it being plain to the court that there is sufficient evidence revealed in the facts before the court that the principal debtor is insolvent; in other words, that there is an implication which the court itself would draw, as in Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (1) that there was insolvency on the part of the principal debtor. I would also say, although it is unnecessary to go further into it, that Lawson v. Wright (2) and its limitations have been considered in two cases to which attention must be drawn when it is necessary to examine it exactly, Re Snowdon, Ex parte Snowdon (7), where it is examined by Cotton, L.J., and an important judgment of Lord Warrington (Warrington, J., as he then was) in Stirling v. Burdett (8).

I turn now, therefore, after considering those authorities and the limitation of the rule, to consider what has happened in the present case. It appears from the pleadings, upon the facts, upon the knowledge before the court, that this £934 was a sum paid up in respect of the overdraft of the account of Andrew Duckett, Ltd., enforced against the guarantors and not claimed against the company itself, that the only proper inference is that the company itself was insolvent and unable to pay. The implication which was found, therefore, in Dering v. Lord Winchelsea (1) appears in the present case, and the result is that it was unnecessary to insist upon the company being made a defendant, and that the plaintiff's action ought not to fail by reason of a defect of form.

Under those circumstances, the right course will be to allow the appeal and to send the case back to be further tried before the judge of the first instance; but the defendant, Barker, must pay the costs of this appeal, the appeal of the plaintiff, and of the two defendants, Carter and Duckett, who are also respondents to this appeal, and he must also pay the costs of all parties which have been thrown away by his intervention which caused the dismissal of the action.

ROMER, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion as that which has already been

A stated by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, but as we are differing from FARWELL, J., I should like, out of respect to him, to state my own reasons for so doing.

Where a surety has paid the principal creditor the whole of the principal creditor's debt and is suing his co-sureties for contribution without making the principal debtor a party, it is not in my opinion precedent to the plaintiff's right to sue that the principal debtor should be insolvent. Therefore, in such an action it is not strictly necessary B as a matter of pleading for the plaintiff to allege such insolvency, but in order to avoid multiplicity of actions and to enable the court to adjust all the rights between the sureties and the principal debtor once and for all, the court has laid down a rule of convenience, a very salutary rule and one that I hope will always be observed, but none the less merely a rule of convenience. It is this: that for the purposes I have mentioned the principal debtor should be brought before the court unless the plaintiff C can give to the court some good reason for not doing so. One very obvious reason for not doing so would be the insolvency of the principal debtor, because it would be quite useless to bring him before the court to enable the court to adjust all the rights. There may be, and there no doubt are, other reasons which may be sufficient for not bringing the principal debtor before the court, and in considering whether the plaintiff has shown sufficient reason for not bringing the principal debtor before the court the court D can act on such material as it thinks proper. In the present case, therefore, when counsel for the plaintiff closed his case without having alleged the insolvency of the principal debtor, it was not, in my opinion, right for the learned judge, without more, to dismiss the plaintiff's action as though he had shown no cause of action at all against the defendants. It was, however, right thereupon for the defendants to call the court's attention to the fact that the principal debtor was not there, and if the defendants E had not called the attention of the learned judge to that fact the learned judge himself might have asked, and ought to have asked, the plaintiff why the principal debtor was not a party. If the plaintiff then asked, as he did in the present case, for leave to amend upon proper terms, either by adding the principal debtor as a defendant or being given an opportunity of explaining to the court why the principal debtor was not a party, I think that the learned judge should have acceded to the plaintiff's counsel's F request. The truth of the matter is, as it seems to me, that the objection to the absence of the principal debtor was not an objection going to the root of the plaintiff's cause of action, but was merely an objection to the absence of parties, and, that being so, Order XVI, r. 11, is directly applicable. That rule states that:

> "No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or non-joinder G of parties, and the court may in every cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the court or a judge to be just, order that the names of any parties improperly joined, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants, be struck out, and that the names of any parties, whether H plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter, be added."

However, instead of adjourning the case in order that the plaintiff might either join the principal debtor as a party or might have an opportunity of giving reasons for not I having joined the principal debtor, the court may in a proper case come to the conclusion, on the materials then before it, that no good purpose would be served by adding the principal debtor. The present case, as it appears to me, would be exactly a case of that description. I will not go through the facts again; they have already been stated by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, but those facts afford eloquent testimony to the inutility and uselessness of adding the company, the principal debtor in this case, and therefore I think that in the circumstances the learned judge should, notwithstanding the objection that the principal debtor was not before the court, have proceeded with the trial of the action.

For these reasons and those which have been given by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS A
I think that this appeal must be allowed with the consequences that he has indicated.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I am of the same opinion and, agreeing as I do precisely with the statement of the law given by ROMER, L.J., I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat what he has said on that point. In my opinion, the question whether the principal debtor in such a case as this should be a party to the action is a question of B convenience; and I will repeat what the Lord Justice has said in this form, that I think the question is whether the presence of the principal debtor before the court is necessary

> "in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter," those words being taken from Order XVI, r. 11, which distinguishes between the case C of a person not present being a necessary party and a person such as the words I have quoted describe.

I would add this, that if the view is right which has been contended for, that, as a matter of law, it was necessary before this action could be maintained either to add the principal debtor, Andrew Duckett, Ltd., as a defendant or to prove strictly that that company was insolvent, that is a point which any one of the defendants, including, of D course, the defendant Barker, could have raised in his defence according to the terms of Order XXV, r. 2. Not having so raised it, although it stared the defendants in the face, I am of opinion that that was a strong ground for allowing an amendment under Order XVI, r. 11, even if the question, as I say, had been a matter of strict law. By that I do not mean that a question of law of that kind need as a matter of necessity be pleaded by the defendants, but I do think that, when an obvious question of law E arises in an action and the defendants do not plead it, the judge may well think that, having regard to the intention of the rules of the Supreme Court, merely technical objections should not be allowed to defeat an action or, in other words, that the court in such a case ought to exercise its discretion in favour of allowing the amendment. F

> "no cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or non-joinder of parties,"

There was, as I have already inferentially stated, no question of surprise here, because the defendants are coming forward knowing perfectly well that the guarantee given was a guarantee of Andrew Duckett, Ltd., and that there was no allegation in the pleadings that that company was insolvent. However, I take the view that the real point was only one of convenience, and I think the question here is whether on the materials before the court it was possible to hold that the presence of the principal G debtor was necessary in order to enable the court completely to settle the various questions involved.

On that I should like to say a word out of respect to counsel for the defendant Barker's strenuous argument to the contrary. I should observe this, that we do not start with an ordinary case where we know nothing about the principal debtor, we begin in this case with one of those instances, which are exceedingly common to those who are H conversant with business in the city of London, where a company, desirous of either issuing debentures or obtaining advances from its bank, finds itself bound to obtain the guarantees of its directors. It appears that the guarantee of all the directors was necessary for the overdraft to be allowed by the bank of the company. The defence set up by Mr. Barker was that it was for that very reason that he joined in, it being verbally represented to him that the company's bankers required the guarantees of all I the directors and he happened to be one. It does not stop there at all, because by the defence it is apparent that the principal debtor, Andrew Duckett, Ltd., had fallen upon bad times, and the defendant Barker, who had been the sales manager of the company's business at a salary of about £312 a year, was so alarmed at the financial responsibility that he was under in connection with the company's affairs that he verbally agreed to resign his salaried post with the company on condition that the plaintiff and the defendant Duckett would exonerate him from any responsibility in connection with the company's affairs. That was, according to the defence, in April, 1930. That

A the company did not improve its position is clear by the fact that on Feb. 25, 1933, the bank served notice in writing on the plaintiff and the defendants demanding payment under the guarantees of the sum of £1,195 16s., and it was after the plaintiff had been compelled to pay to the bank a smaller sum than that, in part satisfaction of his liability, that an action was commenced in the King's Bench Division by the bank against the plaintiff and the defendants, omitting the joining of Andrew Duckett, Ltd., the principal B debtor, as a defendant, and the bank recovered judgment on Oct. 16, 1933, against the plaintiff and the defendants for the sum of £913 12s. 7d. and a sum for costs. The plaintiff had had bankruptcy proceedings taken against him; there apparently was never a more unwilling payment by a guarantor, and after the bankruptcy proceedings were on the point of resulting in a receiving order he paid the whole amount to the bank. In the King's Bench proceedings none of the defendants thought fit to take proceedings C by way of third party process against the principal debtor, and it is apparent that the plaintiff himself did not think it worth while to try to recover anything from the principal debtor, not only because he commenced no proceedings against them and did not attempt to wind them up, but also because he paid the whole sum himself.

The question is not, as it seems to me, whether it has been proved by strict evidence and beyond all doubt that the principal debtor was and is insolvent. The question is D whether there was, in the circumstances I have stated, primâ facie evidence that the presence of that principal debtor, in any proceedings that might take place in chambers in Chancery with a view to enabling the court "effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved" was or was not necessary. I have not the smallest hesitation in coming to the conclusion that on those facts there is strong primâ facie ground for thinking that the presence of the principal debtor would have E been perfectly useless and would only have led to an increase in the costs. It was quite open to the defendant Barker, had he chosen, to raise the point by saying: I am going to call evidence to show that the company has some money and ought to be parties to this action, and therefore the proceedings must be stayed at the expense of the plaintiff until the company is added as a party. He did nothing of the sort; on the contrary, what he did was to raise a defence, a plain and intelligible defence absolutely F disconnected with the question as to whether the principal debtor were before the court or not, a defence which could have been made and persisted in and proved in the absence of the principal debtor without the smallest difficulty had it been sound in point of fact. This is therefore one of the rare cases, in my opinion, where a statement made in an ancient case is almost exactly in point. The decision in the case of Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (1) was a decision of the LORD CHIEF BARON EYRE on Feb. 8, 1787, and it G really is curious how the passage which has already been read on p. 323 of the report in 1 Cox is apposite to the present case. He says:

> "In substance the insolvency of Mr. Dering [that is, the principal debtor] may be collected from the whole proceedings, which strongly imply it; for the plaintiff appears to have submitted to the judgment"

H —that is what has happened here, he submitted to the judgment without bringing in the principal debtor—"and the defendants"—in this case it is the defendant Barker—"have made their defence on other grounds"—that is precisely what Mr. Barker did here. Without saying I want the principal debtor added, he says: I shall raise a totally different point dependent upon a contract made by the plaintiff with me to hold me free from any liability on this guarantee. Accordingly it seems to me, with the greatest I respect to the learned judge, that in this case the proper course was to have proceeded with the discussion of the defence which had been raised by the defendant Barker, and that the case must therefore go back to have the question raised by his defence adjudicated upon.

On those grounds I agree with the judgments of my learned brethren.

Appeal allowed; case remitted to the judge of first instance for further trial.

Variation of Settlement—Settlement made during subsistence of former marriage—Appointment thereunder, after decree absolute, in favour of intended second wife—Second wife's decree of divorce and petition for variation—Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 49), s. 192.

Under a post-nuptial settlement made by a husband in 1925 provision was made for the husband and any wife and issue of his for the time being in existence. In 1928 the husband exercised a power of appointment under the settlement in favour of two children of the existing marriage. He was divorced in 1929, and later that year, immediately before he married another woman, he made a settlement in her favour. The second wife divorced him in 1934, and petitioned under s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, for variation of settlements.

Held: section 192 did not give the court jurisdiction to vary a settlement executed during the subsistence of one marriage, but made in contemplation of a second marriage, on the dissolution of the second marriage; the petitioner was therefore not entitled to succeed as (i) the first settlement was made and the power of appointment exercised during the subsistence of the first marriage; (ii) the court had no jurisdiction to vary the 1929 settlement as any such variation must constitute a variation of the first settlement.

Hargreaves v. Hargreaves (1) applied.
Prinsep v. Prinsep (2) and Janion v. Janion (3) distinguished.

Notes. Section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, is now s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.

Quære whether, in view of the principle in Fender v. Mildmay, [1937] 3 All E.R. 402, the court would have jurisdiction under s. 25 to vary a settlement, made between decrees nisi and absolute of dissolution of one marriage and in contemplation of a second marriage, upon the dissolution of the second marriage.

As to settlements which cannot be varied under s. 25, see 12 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 452, para. 1017, and for cases on the subject, see 27 DIGEST (Repl.) 645–649, 6087–6112. For the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 25, see 29 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 412.

Divorce Motion

This was a motion by the respondent husband in a divorce suit, to confirm the registrar's report submitting that the petition of the wife for variation of settlements be dismissed. By cross-motion the petitioner prayed that the registrar's report be discharged and that her petition for variation of settlements be remitted for further report. The facts are set out in the judgment. The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 102, provides: "The Court may after pronouncing a decree for divorce . . . inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or any part of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of the parties to the marriage as the Court think fit, and the Court may exercise the powers conferred by this sub-section notwithstanding that there are no children of the marriage."

Alexander Grant, K.C., and Victor Russell for the wife petitioner.

A. Richard Ellis for the husband respondent.

L. W. Byrne for the trustees of the principal settlement.

F. L. C. Hodson for the children of the respondent by a previous marriage.

July 19. BUCKNILL, J., read the following judgment:

The petitioner was married to the respondent on June 27, 1929, and there is no issue of the marriage. On April 13, 1934, the petitioner obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage, and the decree was made absolute on Oct. 22, 1934. On Nov. 21, 1934, the petitioner petitioned for a variation of settlements under the power conferred on the court by s. 192 of the Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. The settlements in respect of which the petitioner claims an order for variation are three in number, and are dated (i) June 18, 1925, (ii) Oct. 6, 1927, (iii) June 24, 1929. No. 2 is a subsidiary settlement to No. 1. No. 3 is a deed of appointment exercised under powers conferred by No. 1. When the respondent executed settlement No. 1 he was then in fact married to another women by whom he had two daughters, born in January, 1925, and March, 1927. Under the terms of settlement No. 1 the respondent effected a settlement of his share of the residuary estate of a deceased uncle. The declared trusts of the settlement so far as is material to this motion were as follows:

> "3. (a) Upon trust during the lifetime of the settlor to apply the annual income of the trust fund for the maintenance support or otherwise for the benefit of all or any one or more exclusively of the other or others of the settlor and any wife and issue of his for the time being in existence and any person or persons who would if he were actually dead intestate be entitled to the trust fund or the income thereof, as the trustees in their absolute discretion . . . think fit.
> "(b) And after the death of the settlor and subject to any life or less interest appointed to his wife under the power for that purpose hereinafter contained the capital and income of the trust fund shall be held in trust for all or any one or more exclusively of the other or others of the child children or more remote of the issue by his present or any future marriage. . . .
> "(c) If there shall not be any child of the settlor who attains a vested interest under the trust hereinbefore declared in default of appointment . . . the capital and income of the trust fund shall be held in trust for such person . . . as the settlor shall by deed . . . or by will or codicil appoint.
> "(4) The settlor may from time to time . . . appoint to or in favour of a wife who may survive him during the residue of her life while she remains his widow."

By the terms of settlement No. 2, dated Oct. 6, 1927, which was stated to be supplemental to No. 1, it was recited that the settlor had granted a mortgage on June 17, 1925, for £2,000 on his reversionary interest in his uncle's will, to secure a loan of £2,000 for the purpose of paying his debts, which loan was made on the express condition that the settlor would execute settlement No. 1. The settlor has since the settlement No. 1 incurred further debts which also were paid off on condition that he should bring certain further investments into the settlement. The settlor accordingly brought the said investments into the principal settlement to be held on the same trusts. On Aug. 21, 1928, and Sept. 26, 1928, the respondent executed two appointments in favour of the two children of his first marriage.

On June 24, 1929, the respondent, who was by this time divorced from his first wife, and was about to marry the present petitioner, executed a deed of appointment in pursuance of the powers conferred on him under settlements No. 1 and No. 2. The operating words of the appointment so far as is material to this case are as follows:

> "Whereas a marriage is shortly intended to be solemnised between the appointer and S. N. . . . the trustees shall after the death of the appointor stand possessed of the sum of six thousand pounds of the part of the residue of the trust funds settled by the settlement . . . upon trust to pay the income thereof to the said S. N. (if she shall survive him) during her life for her separate use . . . and from and after the death of the survivor of the appointor and the said S. N. . . . upon trust for the children (if any) of the appointor's marriage with the said S. N. . . ."

The registrar reported on the petition to vary settlements that he was of the opinion that none of the three settlements were settlements which could be varied under the powers given to the court. In his opinion, the first two settlements might properly be regarded as post-nuptial settlements as regards the first marriage, inasmuch as they were made by the respondent while he was married to his first wife, but neither of the first two settlements was made in contemplation or on account of the second marriage in respect of which it is sought to vary the settlements. The registrar considered that the case was almost identical with Hargreaves v. Hargreaves (1). As regards the third settlement, the registrar reported that this was clearly an ante-nuptial settlement in contemplation of the second marriage, but that the appointment was on the trusts mentioned in the first two settlements, and must therefore stand or fall with them. The appointment also purported to confer an interest without limitation to widowhood, which was greater than the respondent was given power to appoint.

On objection to the registrar's report it was argued on behalf of the petitioner (the second wife) that the widest possible interpretation should be given to the word "settlement" in s. 192 of the Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and that the motive which induced the settlor to make the settlement was of no importance. In support of this proposition Prinsep v. Prinsep (2) was cited where ([1929] P. at p. 235) Hill, J., said:

> "Whether a settlement is within s. 192 must depend on what it effects. If, in fact, it is a settlement on either husband or wife, or both in the character of husband or wife, it is wholly immaterial that it is prompted and stated to be prompted by affection only for one of them. On the question whether a settlement is a settlement within s. 192, the motive seems to me immaterial, except so far as it is given effect to by the terms of the deed."

It was argued that the settlement of 1925 was clearly a post-nuptial settlement as regards the woman who was then the wife of the respondent, and was an ante-nuptial settlement as regards the woman who subsequently became his wife after his marriage with the first wife had been dissolved. In support of this argument, Janion v. Janion (3) and Prinsep v. Prinsep (2) were relied on, and it was argued that the settlements in those cases were of the same ante-nuptial character as in the present case.

In Janion v. Janion (3) the marriage was celebrated in 1914, and in 1915 the husband, who had married while he was a minor, came of age and executed the settlement which was the subject of the decision. He was therefore one of "the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree," to quote the words of s. 192 of the Act of 1925. The settlement recited that the settlor was desirous of making a provision for his wife and issue in consideration of his natural love and affection for his wife. The trusts of the settlement included a provision that "after the death of the settlor" and subject to the life or other interest of any wife of his the capital and income were in certain circumstances to be held in trust for all or any of his children by any marriage. Provision was made under the settlement for appointment by the settlor in favour of any wife who might survive him. There was one child of the marriage. In due course the wife obtained a decree dissolving her marriage on the ground of the husband settlor's adultery. She filed a petition to vary the settlement. She asked, inter alia, that the settlor's power to appoint to a future wife or children should be extinguished in the case of any future wife whom he might marry in her (the petitioner's) lifetime.

The registrar in his report on that petition reported that there was no jurisdiction to vary the settlement because it did not come within s. 192. It was argued on behalf of the husband that the settlement was not a post-nuptial settlement but a spendthrift settlement. LORD MERRIVALE, in the course of his judgment varying the report and holding that the settlement did come within s. 192, said ([1929] P. at p. 239):

> "With an assignment of property to a trustee in which the cestuis que trustent are the wife then in being, a future wife, if there be one, and any child of the marriage, as well as the husband and father of any wife and children, there being these uses, it extends not only to but beyond the lifetime of the husband. I find it impossible to say that this is not a settlement which is within the provisions in the successive statutes and placed by those provisions under the control of the court. It is the effect which must be regarded. It is the interest of the wife and child or any wife or any child or children, and as to those the legislature, as I understand, intended to protect them from being impoverished by reason that a decree of divorce had become necessary."

In the present case it was argued that the use of this language by LORD MERRIVALE indicated that he considered that a settlement of this nature made by a husband was not only a post-nuptial settlement as regards the wife in being but an ante-nuptial settlement as regards any wife in the future, so as to entitle any wife of the settlor to apply for a variation of the settlement. If this reading of s. 192 is right, the legal position of the various beneficiaries, wives and children, arising from a possible series of variations of the settlement, which would be limited only by the possible number of wives of the settlor, would tend to become extremely complicated. It is to be noted that in Janion v. Janion (3) there was a wife in being at the time when the settlement was made, that the settlement was expressly made for the purpose of making provision for her, and that it was the dissolution of her marriage which prompted the application to the court to vary the settlement. No second wife in fact appeared on the scene, and to this extent the case differs entirely from the case which is now before me.

In Prinsep v. Prinsep (2) the question as to variation of settlements arose on the dissolution of marriage of a husband and wife on the ground of the husband's adultery. There was one child of the marriage. The decree absolute was made in 1928. The parties were married in 1912, and by an ante-nuptial settlement made in 1912 certain trust funds were brought into settlement by the mother of the husband on trust to pay the income to the husband for life until he should become bankrupt and thereafter on certain protective trusts, and after his death to pay the income to the wife so long as she remained a widow. There were provisions for resettlement of trust funds on an after taken wife of the husband. In August, 1920, the mother of the husband by deed brought into settlement certain further funds in trust to apply the income at the discretion of the trustees for the benefit of the husband and his issue by any marriage and any wife of his. Power was reserved to the husband to appoint income for her life to any wife he might marry.

The question for the decision of the court was whether the deed of the mother of the husband made in August, 1920, was a post-nuptial settlement within s. 192 of the Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. It was argued on behalf of the trustees of the settlement that the settlement of August, 1920, was a settlement by the mother on her son and had nothing to do with his marriage, and was not a settlement in consequence of the marriage, and was therefore not a "post-nuptial" settlement. HILL, J., decided that the settlement of August, 1920, was a "post-nuptial" settlement. He said ([1929] P. at p. 232):

> "What does matter is that the settlement should provide for the financial benefit of one or other or both of the spouses as spouses and with reference to their married state. Is the settlement of that character? . . . In terms, it has in contemplation Mr. Prinsep, whom it designates 'principal beneficiary,' but it also has in contemplation his then wife, Mrs. Prinsep, and any future wife and his child and any future children."

It was argued that these words used by the judge indicated that, in his view, the settlement in question in that case was not only a post-nuptial settlement as regards his then existing marriage, but was also an ante-nuptial settlement as regards any future marriage. It was a settlement which > "provided for the financial benefit of one or other of the spouses and with reference to their married state."

Here, again, it must be pointed out that in Prinsep v. Prinsep (2) the motion to vary the settlement was in respect of the injured wife who was married to the husband at the time when the settlement was made. It is true that "any wife" is mentioned in the settlement, and that the expression "married state" is quite general. If in Prinsep v. Prinsep (2) the husband had married again and had again been divorced, and the second wife had then sought to vary the settlement of August, 1920, in her favour, the same point would have arisen which has arisen in the present case. But as it is, the case of Prinsep v. Prinsep (2) is no direct authority on the question which I have to decide.

In Melvill v. Melvill and Woodward (4) the husband obtained a decree for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery. There were two children of the marriage. The decree nisi was pronounced in March, 1928, and was made absolute in October, 1928. On Dec. 12, 1928, the wife married the co-respondent in the suit. On Dec. 30, 1927, after the divorce petition had been filed and the case had been set down for trial, the wife executed a settlement on herself for life with the remainder to any children of hers. The settlor was described as the wife of the petitioner in the divorce suit, as she in fact was, and the consideration was expressed to be the natural love and affection of the settlor for the two children of her marriage. The settlor also had a power to appoint the income and not exceeding a moiety of the capital of the trust fund to any surviving husband. On a petition by the husband to vary the settlement, MR. JUSTICE BATESON held that it was not a "post-nuptial" settlement within the meaning of the section, and said that he was satisfied that the settlement was made by the wife to protect, if she could, any money to which she might be entitled from being touched in any way by her then husband. BATESON, J., said ([1930] P. at p. 109):

> "In my judgment it is not a settlement on the wife in her character as a wife, nor is it in reference to the married state of the spouses. It is a settlement upon the wife for herself and for any children she may have in future and with power to appoint to any husband she may take, made at a time when she knew perfectly well that the only possible person that she at that time could think of benefiting would not be the husband who had not yet got his decree absolute, but the new husband whom she intended to take as soon as she possibly could."

The judgment of BATESON, J., was reversed on appeal, and the settlement was held to be a post-nuptial settlement so far as the then existing marriage was concerned. I have referred to the case because it seems to me that, if the argument put before me is right in the present case, the co-respondent who became the second husband in Melvill v. Melvill and Woodward (4) might also have claimed a variation of the settlement as an ante-nuptial settlement, if he, too, subsequently divorced the wife, and therefore the settlement would be post-nuptial as regards the first marriage and at the same time ante-nuptial as regards the second marriage. I cannot think that the legislature ever intended s. 192 of the Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, to have such a result as that.

It was argued on behalf of the wife in the present case that the word "parties" in s. 192 has been decided to include one of the two parties, and that if the settlement refers in terms to any marriage of one of the parties it is an ante-nuptial settlement as regards any such marriage, either in being or in the future. In other words, a settlement may be made on a woman in contemplation of a possible series of marriages by her with the aid of death or divorce, and in such a case the settlement is an ante-nuptial settlement within the meaning of s. 192 in the case of each marriage of the series.

On the other side, on behalf of the husband, in support of the registrar's report, it was argued that the reasoning of HILL, J., in Hargreaves v. Hargreaves (1) applied to this case. In that case, on April 28, 1914, a man made a settlement of certain property on trust, subject to the life interests of his mother, to pay the income to the settlor for life, and after his death in favour of his children. The settlement contained a power for the settlor to appoint for the benefit of any wife, but contained no other reference to the marriage of the settlor. A month later the settlor entered into a deed of appointment in which, after reciting that a marriage had been arranged between himself and his future wife, he appointed to her after marriage a certain sum during the continuance of the coverture. The marriage took place on June 9, 1914, and there was one child, born in January, 1920. On May 6, 1924, a decree nisi was granted on the petition of the wife, who subsequently applied to vary the settlement. Hill, J., confirmed the report of the registrar that the appointment should be varied by directing the trustees to pay £500 a year to the petitioner for life instead of during coverture, but he refused to vary in the wife's favour the original settlement of April, 1914. Hill, J., in the course of his judgment, said ([1926] P. at p. 45):

> "This section is dealing with ante-nuptial and post-nuptial settlements, and it refers to marriage. It refers to it because what it is dealing with is what we commonly know as a marriage settlement—that is, a settlement made in contemplation of, or because of, marriage, and with reference to the interests of married people, or their children. Nobody has referred me to any case in which it is said it has any wider meaning. The judgment of the Court of Appeal in Loraine v. Loraine and Murphy (5) shows that it has not a wider meaning than that."

This passage was quoted by Romer, J., in Melvill v. Melvill and Woodward (4) ([1930] P. at p. 178).

Applying this explanation of the meaning of "ante-nuptial settlement" to the case now before me, the principal settlement, in order to be "ante-nuptial" within the meaning of s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, must be made in contemplation of, or because of, a second marriage, although the settlor at the time when the settlement was made was already married. I do not think that s. 192 was intended to cover such a case as this. To bring the section into operation there must be a "marriage" which is the subject of the decree of divorce, and it is in contemplation of this marriage and because of this marriage that the settlement must be made. I do not think that the legislature intended a spouse of an existing marriage to contemplate a second marriage, so as to be able to execute a settlement which is "ante-nuptial" as regards such contemplated marriage when at the time being she or he is married and, therefore, incapable of then entering into a second marriage.

In my view, the settlements of June 18, 1925, and Oct. 6, 1927, were not made because of the marriage which is the subject of the decree in this case. If there were a settlement made "in contemplation of or because of marriage," to quote the words of Hill, J., in Hargreaves v. Hargreaves (1), it was made in contemplation of or because of the marriage between the settlor and his first wife, which was subsisting at the time of the settlement in question.

A second point taken on behalf of the wife on this petition to vary was that the appointment under settlement No. 3 by the settlor on his second wife under the powers conferred by the original settlement No. 1 was clearly an ante-nuptial settlement within s. 192. I think that this is so, but, in my view, the court has no jurisdiction under s. 192 of the Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, to vary an appointment in such a way that in the result the principal settlement is also varied although that settlement is not within s. 192. Thus, in this case, the settlor under the principal settlement only had power to appoint to a wife who may survive him while she remains his widow. In other words, it only covers a period of time which begins with the death of the settlor. But if the appointment is varied by varying the period of appointment to her life while single and thereby starts during the settlor's life, then the principal settlement is thereby itself varied, because the appointment covers a different period of time to that which the principal settlement allowed.

For these reasons, I confirm the report of the registrar.

[Reported [1935] 2 K.B. 300; 104 L.J.K.B. 654; 153 L.T. 58]

Bankruptcy—Proof lodged for rent due—No dividend paid in bankruptcy—Legality of subsequent distress for same rent—Bankrupt a joint tenant—Levy of distress on goods of other joint tenant—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 35, sub-s. (1).

Distress—For rent—One of joint tenants bankrupt—Proof lodged in bankruptcy for rent due—No dividend paid—Legality of subsequent distress for same rent—Levy of distress on goods of other joint tenant—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 35 (1).

A landlord who has lodged a proof in his tenant's bankruptcy for rent due before the date of the receiving order may subsequently distrain for the same rent if he has not received a dividend in the bankruptcy in respect of it. Where the bankrupt holds a joint tenancy the distress may be made on the other joint tenant's goods.

Appeal by landlords from the decision of Talbot, J., and a common jury awarding the tenant £20 damages for excessive distress.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Hanworth, M.R.

E. W. Cave, K.C., and R. J. White for the landlords.

Lord Erleigh, K.C., and W. D. Roberts for the tenant.

The arguments and the cases cited sufficiently appear in the judgments.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This appeal is one which involves a good many points of law which were not fully developed before the learned judge in the court below. Indeed, the learned judge, as I understand, felt himself bound to follow the case of Ex parte Grove (1), but invited a further examination of the authorities, and thought it was a case in which there ought to be a review in the Court of Appeal. We have had the advantage, with the assistance of counsel, of going into a large number of authorities which were not before the learned judge, and, therefore, I feel less reluctance in differing from the learned judge because I feel that the case now has developed completely different aspects from those which it wore when it was before the learned judge and the learned judge himself was anxious that the case should be reviewed.

It is very important that the facts of this case should be stated and fully understood because it is in relation to the facts of the case that our judgment applies. There was an agreement made on May 17, 1926, whereby the landlord, James Watt, let these premises to Charles Robert Holmes and Mary Davison Holmes, who were together described as the tenant. It was a joint tenancy, and under that agreement they covenanted to pay a rent of £4 10s. a week. The tenants got into arrear with their rent. Difficulties occurred and there had been certainly one distress, which was levied in October, 1931. The agreement was one for a definite period of three years, but it was continued by holding over between the parties, and the result was that there was a tenancy, at any rate, from week to week at £4 10s., but it might be possible to apply to this continued tenancy the provision of the original agreement for a longer period of notice to quit. The situation remained that they were joint tenants liable to pay the landlord £4 10s. a week. By Jan. 1, 1932, there was a sum due from them in respect of rent of £74 9s. 7d., and a distress warrant for that was issued. On May 4, 1932, the landlord, James Watt, died. Probate was taken out to his estate, and the appellant landlords are his personal representatives. The rent was not paid, but the occupation continued. On May 23, 1932, a receiving order was made against the tenant, Charles Robert Holmes. On July 4 a notice was given to disclaim this lease or tenancy, and on July 19, in fact, it was disclaimed. However, the bankruptcy was one in which the assets were very small indeed. The statement of affairs which I hold in my hand was one which showed an apparent deficiency of as much as £3,182. Therefore it was a case in which it was possible to apply the summary procedure under s. 129 of the Bankruptcy Act, which applies to cases of small estates where the estate is less than £300. Although there was that disclaimer, there was no release of the occupation by the two tenants. On July 18 a proof was carried in in bankruptcy for a sum of £67, being the rent which was claimed to have accrued due and to remain unpaid at the date of the receiving order, May 23. On Aug. 11 there was a distress warrant taken out for the sum of £78 3s. 11d., but it was contended that at that time, inasmuch as the proof had been carried in for £67 instead of £78 3s. 11d., that figure ought to stand at £11 3s. 11d., and no more. The distress was levied, and on Aug. 15 the tenant paid the bailiff £30 on account with a request to withdraw from possession and with liberty "lawfully to make a second distress for the said rent and for the expenses incident to such distress." On Aug. 14 the tenant unhappily lost his wife, and he remained in possession of the premises. The furniture which was on the premises was said to belong to his wife. So far as the evidence goes there is no proof that administration was granted to the tenant or that the value of the goods was so small that the administration by probate would not be required. All that we do know is that the tenant remained in possession of the premises and was a bailee and had a possessory title to the goods which had belonged to his wife. On Dec. 3 the tenant paid a sum of £43 2s. 3d. That made a total in these two payments of the £30 I have mentioned and the £43 2s. 3d. of £73 2s. 3d. paid by the tenant. However, whichever way you take it there was rent accruing and still remaining due. It is plain that by virtue of the payments that had been made the only amount which remained due on Dec. 3 was £18, as the rent accrued due from Aug. 11 to Dec. 3 was £72, and of the total rent in arrear, namely, £150 3s. 11d., the £73 2s. 3d. had been paid, leaving £77 1s. 8d., the amount distrained for, from which £59 1s. 8d. out of the sum of £67 proved for must be deducted, but the true amount would appear to be £77 1s. 8d. Also it is to be remembered that during the time of the tenant's occupation of the premises rent had been accruing due at £4 10s. a week.

The distress was levied on Dec. 3, and the present claim in the action was brought in respect of that levy; it is said that the landlords had elected to prove for the said A sum in the tenant's bankruptcy, and submitted a proof of their claim to the trustee in bankruptcy, and that, that proof being admitted, there was no liability at all in respect of that £67 which could be enforced by distress, and that by reason of that the landlords wrongly made a claim for £77 1s. 8d. on Dec. 3, and that the distress which was levied was excessive. It is not suggested that it was illegal or irregular: the claim is that it was an excessive distress. The landlords justify their action on the ground that they B were entitled to levy the distress, that the £67 proof carried into the estate in respect of which there was no dividend at all did not prevent their right to levy the distress. The case was tried before the learned judge, who awarded a sum of £20 in respect of this excessive distress to the tenant. From that decision the defendants appeal, and we have heard the matter at length before this court.

The learned judge acted upon Ex parte Grove (1). That appears to be taken in some C of the cases as establishing the proposition that a landlord cannot distrain and prove for the same rent, that if there is an election by him to carry in a proof he has lost his right of distress. Ex parte Grove (1) has been a good deal criticised, and in particular by LORD BATHURST in Ex parte Devine (COOKE'S BANKRUPTCY LAWS (8th Edn.), 199, 201). LORD BATHURST pointed out that Ex parte Grove (1) was a case which depended upon whether or not the assignees in the bankruptcy could make a good title to a D purchaser. That was the real purport and point of the case, and it was held that they could. Turning to the report of the case I find this (1 Atk. at p. 104):

> "The issuing a commission against a tenant, and the messenger's possession of the goods of the tenant, does not hinder the landlord from distraining for rent; for this is not such a custodia legis as an execution is, and there, too, the law allows the landlord a year's rent," E that is, even in bankruptcy.

HARDWICKE, L.C., also says (1 Atk. at p. 105):

> "A landlord is considered in a higher degree than a common creditor, and it would be hard to preclude him from distraining where there are goods on the premises, and, therefore, he must be put to his election to waive his proof, or his distress." F

How far does that case go? How far is it an authority binding at any rate upon this court?

One has to examine the Bankruptcy Acts to see whether or not the right of the landlord is taken away and, if so, how far. The Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 7, provides that > "On the making of a receiving order an official receiver shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor, and thereafter, except as directed by this Act, G no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor in respect of the debt, or shall commence any action or other legal proceedings, unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose."

The same provision in the Act of 1883, s. 9, as it then was, came up for consideration by H VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in Re Howell, Ex parte Mandleberg (2). He said this ([1895] 1 Q.B. at p. 847):

> "It was contended on behalf of the trustee that the landlord's right of distress in respect of the first two months of the quarter was taken away by the joint effect of s. 9 of the Act of 1883, r. 19 of Sched. II, and the limitation in s. 42 . . . and that by s. 9 no creditor in respect of any debt provable is to have any remedy against the I property of the bankrupt except as is directed by the Act. . . . But I think that contention fails," and he thereupon affirmed the right of the landlord to levy a distress. He affirmed the right and held that s. 9, as it was under that Act, had not removed the landlord's right of distress. It is quite true that by s. 42, as it was in that Act, and by s. 35 of the present Act, there is a limitation imposed upon the right of the landlord to levy. Section 35 (1) says:

> "The landlord or other person to whom any rent is due from the bankrupt may at > any time, either before or after the commencement of the bankruptcy, distrain upon the goods or effects of the bankrupt for the rent due to him from the bankrupt, with this limitation that, if such distress for rent be levied after the commencement of the bankruptcy, it shall be available only for six months' rent accrued due prior to the date of the order of adjudication and shall not be available for rent payable in respect of any period subsequent to the date when the distress was levied."

That section affirms the right of a landlord to levy a distress. That common law right is not removed. It limits the amount for which the landlord can hold the distress to a period of six months' rent accrued prior to the date of the order of adjudication, and it is not to be available for rent payable for any period subsequent to the date when the distress was levied: in other words, you cannot levy in respect of the rent which is by agreement to be payable in advance, but it does not prevent the right to levy in respect of the rent which accrued after the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy if what is levied for is rent which has up to that time accrued, and is not rent which is payable in advance. The case of Re Howell (2) definitely decided that in respect of rent which accrued by virtue of the Apportionment Act prior to the date of the order of adjudication, that is, after the receiving order but before the adjudication, the landlord was entitled to distrain and to hold that rent.

There are other cases which must be considered. In Re Jeffery, Ex parte Honey (3), MELLISH, L.J., says (7 Ch.App. at p. 182):

> "Before the passing of the Act of 1861, although a proof could be made against both the joint and separate estates where the bankrupts had executed a joint and several guarantee or bond, or entered into a joint and several contract, yet the creditor could not receive a dividend from both estates, and he had to elect from which he would receive the dividend."

That seems to indicate that by the mere proof or carrying in of a proof the creditor has not lost his other rights. It is contended that by carrying in that proof there was no further right of distress. I have dealt with the point under the Bankruptcy Act. But on what is the doctrine of his losing the one remedy in favour of the other founded? During the argument we looked at King v. Hoare (4), which provides that where you have a judgment that then exists your judgment is not merely a right against a debtor but something of a higher nature. Very often, if it is unsatisfied, it is a bar to an action because you have now got a judgment, and it has become something different from the debt which gave you a right to sue. That principle does not apply where you are merely carrying in a proof. There are two more cases on the same lines that I must refer to. In Briggs v. Sowry (5) the head-note reads:

> "Where the assignees of a bankrupt, under the 6 Geo. 5, c. 16, s. 75, have declined a lease to which the bankrupt was entitled, but the bankrupt has not delivered up the lease to the lessor, the property in the demised premises, in the meantime, continues vested in the bankrupt, and the lessor retains, until such delivery up to him, his right of distress for the rent."

That appears applicable at the present time because the debtor with his wife remained in possession of these premises from May 23 to Aug. 15, and after Aug. 15, when the wife died, the tenant remained in possession of the premises from Aug. 15 right down to Dec. 3. During that time there was rent accruing due, rent which had not been carried in to the proof and which had accrued due subsequent to the date of the receiving order. In Newton v. Scott (6), where a landlord distrained on the goods of A. and the tenant afterwards became bankrupt and obtained a certificate, it was held by the court of Queen's Bench

> "that the certificate did not operate as a release of the rent, and that the landlord had a right, in replevin at the suit of A., to avow for a return of the goods."

LORD DENMAN definitely applies the case of Briggs v. Sowry (5). Under those circumstances I find a difficulty in seeing that there has been some change or alteration which prevented the right of a landlord to levy the distress. The claim has not passed into any higher right and no dividend has been received in the bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Act recognises the power of the landlord to sue and to retain a certain amount, and although I agree that there is sufficient interest in the goods remaining in the plaintiff, within the case of Fell v. Whittaker (7), which would enable him to bring an action for interference with his possession, yet unless he can do more than establish the right that the landlord had no right to levy a distress, there ought to be no damages awarded to him.

For the reasons which I have given it appears to me that there was at the time the distress was levied a sum in respect of which the landlord was not precluded from levying a distress and, under those circumstances, no right to damages arises and the appeal must be allowed here with costs and judgment entered in the action for the landlords with costs.

ROCHE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be allowed and that judgment should be entered for the landlords on the claim and counterclaim. My Lord has stated the relevant facts so fully that it is unnecessary to repeat them but, having regard to the respect I feel for the learned judge from whose decision we are differing, I should like to state very shortly in my own way my reasons for arriving at the conclusion which I have stated.

This tenancy which was in question was at the material times a tenancy of the plaintiff tenant and his wife. At the time the distresses complained of were made the wife was dead. The tenant brought and maintained his action in respect of property which had been his wife's, of which he was at all material times bailee, but in respect of which he had no right of property whatever. That fact, I think, was not brought to the attention of the learned judge and was sufficient of itself to account for the difference between the conclusion at which the learned judge arrived and at which this court is arriving. Having regard to that circumstance, the case of Ex parte Grove (1), on which the learned judge founded his judgment, however understood, in my judgment is no authority entitling the plaintiff to succeed in his action. I have no inclination, even had I the temerity, to criticise the decision of Hardwicke, L.C., in the case of Ex parte Grove (1). Understood as I understand it, and I understand it in the same sense that Lord Bathurst understood it as stated in Cooke on Bankruptcy at p. 199, that case seems to me to be one which no criticism can be directed at. I am far, however, from saying that it is sufficient warrant for the broader proposition which in other textbooks it is supposed to be an authority for, namely, that once a proof is lodged in respect of a tenant who becomes bankrupt there can never be a distraint upon that tenant's goods thereafter. I should require authority, which has not been produced to us here, before I was satisfied that that broad conclusion resulted from that case. As at present advised I am inclined to think that at most the mere lodging of a proof would give rise of necessity for an election on the part of the landlord as to which remedy he desired to pursue. It will be noticed that I have laid emphasis on the fact that the lodging of the proof was the matter here relied upon. In this case, as my Lord has stated, not only was there no question that the landlord never received a dividend, but there never was a dividend in the present case paid by the bankrupt's estate. I am therefore dealing with this case on the basis that it is the mere lodging or filing of a proof that is the matter which is supposed to have debarred the landlord from his right of distress. Taking that view, however, of the case of Ex parte Grove (1), as I have stated, it seems to me to have no relevance to the facts of this case. What the landlord did was that he proved against the estate of one joint tenant, who was the plaintiff, and he afterwards distrained on the goods of the person who had formerly been a tenant, namely, the deceased wife, upon property which was then the property of her next of kin or her legal representatives whoever they might be. If it is asserted in this action that the landlord may prove for rent in the bankruptcy of one tenant, and distrain upon the goods which belonged to another person, also a tenant, why then the authority for that must be found elsewhere than in the case of Ex parte Grove (1).

This is not a case where there has been a res judicata as in King v. Hoare (4) or Kendall v. Hamilton (8) to which my Lord has referred, nor is it a case on which there has been a proof and receipt of a dividend. As I understand the law of election in

A bankruptcy it is plain. My Lord has referred to Re Jeffery, Ex parte Honey (3), and the law as there laid down by MELLISH, L.J., that

> "although a proof could be made against both the joint and separate estates where the bankrupts had executed a joint and several guarantee or bond, or entered into a joint and several contract, yet the creditor could not receive a dividend from B both estates, and he had to elect from which he would receive the dividend."

The same statement of the law, namely, that time for action is open until receipt of a dividend, was laid down by JAMES, L.J., in Re Collie, Ex parte Adamson (9). The Lord Justice, delivering the judgment of himself and BAGGALLAY, L.J., says (8 Ch.D. at p. 817) (it had been objected that proof against one estate was an election not to proceed against another estate):

> C "By a rule which was established by the courts (it is difficult to see on what principle or by what authority) [the Lord Justice had no great conviction that the rule, though established, was a sensible rule apparently] a creditor having a joint legal or equitable demand against a partnership, and a several one against the members, or some of the members, of the same partnership, was not entitled to go against the joint estate and the separate estates, but was entitled to choose between D them; and it was laid down in the books that the election must be made before the receipt of a dividend."

Here no dividend was received in respect of this estate of the bankrupt and until the landlord had a chance of receiving a dividend or had to elect whether he would take a dividend or not, it seems to me impossible to contend, having regard to the facts of the case and the doctrine to which I have referred, that he had no right to distrain in E respect of the sum which was due from the wife as well as the husband. For those reasons I think that the decision that the distress was excessive, which means that the rent was not due because there had been already a proof in respect of it, cannot be supported, and that the judgment on the claim and counterclaim should be as stated by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

F SWIFT, J.—I agree.

Re ORLEBAR. ORLEBAR v. ORLEBAR

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Clauson, J.), June 25, 26, July 2, 1935]

Settlement—Condition—Tending to induce tenant for life to abstain from exercising powers under Settled Land Act—Settled Land Act, 1925 (15 Geo. 5, c. 18), s. 106 (1) (b).

A testatrix, who died in 1919, by her will devised the C. estate, to which she was entitled in remainder after the death of O. O., who was tenant in tail in possession of the C. estate and also heir-at-law and next of kin of the testatrix, to E. O. for life, with remainder over. By cl. 10 she gave the income of her residuary estate to O. O. for life, and after his death she directed that in case the C. estate "as existing at my death," or the greater part thereof, should devolve under the limitations of her will, then her residuary estate was to be held upon the same trusts as would be applicable if it were capital money or investments therefrom arising from a sale of the C. estate under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, and in case the C. estate should not thus devolve, then the residuary estate should be held upon trust after raising therefrom the sum of £10,000 for certain charitable purposes for the legatees therein named.

Held: upon the proper construction of the will, upon the exercise by O. O., as tenant in tail in possession of the C. estate, of his power of sale under the Settled Land Act, 1925, the C. estate, as existing at the death of the testatrix, could not devolve under the limitations of her will, and the words of the condition which governed the disposition of her residuary estate in that event would be fulfilled; but if that disposition operated, it would prevent the residue passing to O. O. as on an intestacy and must tend to induce him to abstain from exercising his powers under the Settled Land Act, 1925, within the meaning of s. 106 (1) (b) of the Act; and, therefore, in the event of a sale by O. O. under the powers granted him by the Act the disposition of the residuary estate of the testatrix would be inoperative and the residuary estate would, subject to the life interest of O. O., devolve as on an intestacy.

Adjourned Summons

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of CLAUSON, J.:—

On Oct. 30, 1919, died a Mrs. Valentina Augusta Wynter. At that moment certain family estates, which it is convenient to refer to as the Crawley estates, stood settled to the use of the plaintiff, Orlando Orlebar, who was the son of a sister of Mrs. Wynter, for life with remainder to the heirs of his body, with remainder to Mrs. Wynter absolutely. It was, apparently, supposed at the time that the plaintiff was tenant for life with remainder to the heirs of his body, if any, but it is recognised now that, in view of the rule in Shelley's Case (1), the true position was that he was tenant in tail with remainder to Mrs. Wynter. He had not then, and he has not now, barred his estate tail, and I was told that he has made up his mind not to do so. The testatrix, Mrs. Wynter, left residuary estate of the value of some £15,000. The plaintiff was the only nephew of Mrs. Wynter and he was her heir-at-law and sole next of kin.

Mrs. Wynter's will contained cl. 6, which I will read:

> "I bequeath all furniture glass plate . . . belonging to me at the time of my death and situate in or about Crawley House in the county of Bedford (which furniture > glass plate and plated articles pewter linen books china and pictures miniatures and prints bequeathed by this clause are hereinafter referred to as 'the settled chattels') unto my trustees upon the trusts hereinafter directed, namely: I direct that my trustees shall permit my nephew [the plaintiff] to have the use and enjoyment of the settled chattels during his life upon condition that he allows the same to remain at Crawley House in the same manner substantially as at the time of my death and I give this direction in the hope that my said nephew will make Crawley House his principal place of residence during his life. Subject as aforesaid I direct that the settled chattels shall be held by my trustees upon the trusts following namely: In case Crawley House shall after the death of my said nephew devolve under the limitations of this my will then upon trust to permit the settled chattels to be used and enjoyed as heirlooms by the person or persons for the time being entitled to Crawley House under the limitations of this my will and as nearly as the rules of law and equity will permit but so that the same shall not vest absolutely in any person. . . ."

Then:

> "But in case Crawley House shall not after the death of my said nephew devolve under the limitations of this my will then upon trust for such relative of mine of the name of Orlebar who upon the death of my said nephew shall become entitled to Crawley House whether for an estate for life in fee or in tail and if there shall be no such person then I direct that the settled chattels shall fall into and form part of my residuary personal estate hereinafter bequeathed."

There follow directions about an inventory.

It is clear that, if Crawley House is sold by the plaintiff under the powers vested in him under the Settled Land Act, it will not devolve under Mrs. Wynter's will, and, accordingly, in that event, the gift of chattels in cl. 6, in so far as it directs the chattels to be used and enjoyed as heirlooms, will be inoperative. The question whether in such case these chattels might, in certain events, devolve on a relative of the testatrix of the name of Orlebar should he have acquired, presumably through some purchase, an estate in Crawley House, seems to me to be open. Before reading the next clause, let me say that the plaintiff, the tenant in tail, appears to me to be a tenant for life within the meaning of that term as used in s. 51 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and s. 106 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, in view of the provisions of s. 58 of the former Act, and s. 20 (1) (i), and s. 117 (1) (xxviii), of the latter. I go on to cl. 8 of the will. The question which arises under cl. 8 is as to a certain condition requiring residence at Crawley House. That clause contains recitals that the hereditaments in the county of Bedford usually known as the Crawley estate (which hereditaments included Crawley House) were settled by the will of the testatrix's late father, Robert Shipton Orlebar, to the use (after the death of her mother and subject to an annuity in favour of the testatrix) of her late brother-in-law, Orlando Robert Hammond Orlebar, during his life with remainder to the use of her said nephew Orlando Robert Aplin Orlebar, during his life, with remainder to the heirs of the body of the said Orlando Robert Aplin Orlebar with an ultimate remainder to the use of the testatrix her heirs and assigns for ever; then that the testatrix was desirous of providing for the event of the said hereditaments devolving under the said ultimate limitation, but so, nevertheless, that no person should be put to any election owing to the disposition thereinafter contained that she was also desirous of disposing of her freehold cottage at Walton in the county of Bucks in manner thereinafter mentioned. The latter part of cl. 8 contains a devise of the Crawley estate and all the other hereditaments to which under the said will or any conveyance the testatrix was or might be entitled for any estate or interest in remainder and also her said freehold cottage at Walton in the county of Bucks (all of which hereditaments were thereinafter referred to as "the Crawley and Walton estates") to the use of her cousin Evelyn Orlebar during his life without impeachment of waste with remainder to the use of his son Robert Evelyn Orlebar during his life without impeachment of waste with remainder to the use of the first and every other son of the said Robert Evelyn Orlebar successively in remainder one after the other according to their respective seniorities in tail male, with remainder to the use of Augustus Orlebar, A during his life with remainder to uses in favour of his sons successively and their sons in tail male (all which uses were revoked by codicils to the testatrix's will) with remainder to the use of Edward Yarde Orlebar during his life with remainder to his sons successively and after various other remainders to the use of the testatrix's own right heirs

> "Provided always that every person who shall become entitled under my will to the B said Crawley estate hereinbefore devised as tenant for life or tenant in tail male or in tail by purchase in possession shall reside at Crawley House aforesaid for at least six calendar months (either continuous or discontinuous) in every year (meaning thereby every complete period of twelve calendar months) and if the person so becoming entitled as aforesaid shall fail to comply with the direction last hereinbefore contained (not being prevented from so doing by illness or accident) then and C in such case the estate of such person shall cease and determine."

It was argued by counsel, and I agree, that in the event of a sale of Crawley House by the plaintiff under his Settled Land Act powers, the condition of residence imposed by this clause in the will will be inoperative.

By cl. 10 the testatrix devises and bequeathes her real estate and her personal estate D to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion and out of the proceeds of conversion to pay legacies and so forth and to invest the residue and to stand possessed of the rest of the investments (thereinafter called "her residuary estate") upon trust to pay the income to the plaintiff

> "during his life and after his death in case the Crawley estate as existing at my death or the greater part in value thereof shall on his death devolve under the E limitations of this my will then upon the trusts which would be applicable to my residuary estate if the same were capital money or investments of capital money arising from the sale under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, of the Crawley estate or the part thereof which shall so devolve and so as to be primarily liable to be invested in the purchase of land in fee simple to be conveyed to the uses affecting the said Crawley estate or the part thereof which shall so devolve but in case the F Crawley estate or the greater part thereof shall not on the death of my said nephew devolve under the limitations of this my will then upon trust to raise out of my residuary estate the sum of £10,000 sterling and hold the same upon the trusts hereinafter declared concerning the same and to stand possessed of such part of my residuary estate as shall remain after raising the said sum of £10,000 as to £5,000 part thereof upon trust for Knightly Vere Orlebar, son of the late Captain Vere G Bernard Orlebar, R.N., and as to the balance thereof upon trust for the said Robert Evelyn Orlebar and Henry Augustus Godfrey Thornton Orlebar in equal shares."

There is a question which I do not think it will be necessary for me to deal with, as to exactly who is intended by the legatees last named.

This summons was taken out by Orlando R. A. Orlebar, tenant in tail in possession H of the Crawley estate, and also heir-at-law and sole next of kin of the testatrix to have it determined in the event of his exercising his power of sale under the Settled Land Act, 1925, (a) what would be the effect of the condition as to residence upon the provisions of the will; and (b) upon what trusts after the death of the plaintiff would (i) the settled chattels, (ii) the residuary estate, be held.

F. McMullan for the plaintiff. I

CLAUSON, J., stated the facts and continued: The question which I have to determine is whether the provisions in cl. 10 of Mrs. Wynter's will have any, and what, operation in the event of her nephew, the plaintiff, who, it is to be remembered, is her heir-at-law and next of kin, selling the Crawley estate or the greater part of the value of it under his settled land powers. Before 1926 this would have turned on the question whether the provisions in question, within the meaning of s. 51 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, tended by a disposition of property, or in any other manner whatever, to induce the plaintiff to abstain from exercising any Settled Land Act power. If they did so tend, they were, so far as they did so tend, to be deemed void. Section 51 of the Act of 1882 is now replaced by s. 106 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, which, for all material purposes, is in precisely the same terms.

In the first place I am of opinion that the expression "Crawley estate as existing at my death," means land which, on Oct. 30, 1919, was subject to the Crawley family settlement. If that land, or the greater part of it, is sold by the plaintiff under the Settled Land Act powers, the trusts in effect settling the testatrix's residue as capital moneys of the Crawley estate will not arise because the condition, namely, that the lands, or the greater part of them in value, shall pass under the limitations of the testatrix's will, will not have been fulfilled, while, on the other hand, the words of the condition which govern the disposition of her residuary estate in that event will be fulfilled. But, if that disposition operates, it will prevent the residue passing as upon an intestacy to the plaintiff, and it seems quite clear that the provision in question must necessarily tend to induce him to abstain from exercising his Settled Land Act powers of sale. It results that the provision must, in the event of a sale by the plaintiff under the Settled Land Act powers, be inoperative.

I will declare that, in the event of the settled estate being sold or disposed of by the plaintiff in exercise of the powers conferred upon him by the Settled Land Act, 1925, the condition of residence imposed by the will of the testatrix upon the defendants Edward Yarde Orlebar and Godfrey Thornton Orlebar respectively as tenants for life will cease to have effect; that the trust in cl. 6 to permit the settled chattels to be enjoyed as heirlooms will be inoperative; and lastly, that the testatrix's residuary estate will, subject to the life interest therein of the plaintiff, devolve as on an intestacy by reason of the invalidity of the provisions contained in cl. 10 of the will for raising the £10,000 thereout and holding the balance in trust as therein mentioned.

Sale of Land—Repudiation of agreement by purchaser—No memorandum or note in writing—Part payment of purchase price by cheque—Right of vendor to recover on cheque.

The defendant orally agreed to buy back for the sum of £800 a cottage which he had sold to the plaintiff. There was no memorandum or note in writing of the agreement for sale sufficient to satisfy the terms of s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. He handed to the plaintiff a cheque for £450 made payable to him as part of the purchase price. The defendant subsequently repudiated the agreement and stopped the cheque, which was dishonoured. The plaintiff, who had always remained able and willing to convey the property, sued the defendant on the cheque. The defendant relied on s. 40 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

Held: the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the cheque.

Action tried by du Parcq, J.

The plaintiff, Charles Leonard Low, sued the defendant, John Fry, as the holder of a cheque for £450, dated Dec. 31, 1934, drawn by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff. The defendant had orally agreed to buy back a cottage at Worcester Park, Surrey. where the plaintiff and his wife lived, the defendant having sold it to the plaintiff some time previously. There was no memorandum or note in writing of the agreement for re-purchase sufficient to satisfy the terms of s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The defendant handed to the plaintiff the cheque as part of the purchase price, but subsequently repudiated the agreement and stopped the cheque, which was dishonoured. Notice of dishonour was duly given to the defendant, and the plaintiff, who had always remained willing and able to convey the property, sued the defendant on the cheque. The defendant relied on s. 40 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which provides:

> "No action may be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land or any interest in land unless the agreement upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged or by some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised."

Section 30 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, provides that every party whose signature appears on a bill is, primâ facie, deemed to have become a party thereto for value.

E. P. Done for the plaintiff.

C. E. Rochford for the defendant.

DU PARCQ, J.—This is an interesting case. The plaintiff claims £450, with interest, on a cheque drawn by the defendant, made payable to the plaintiff, and presented by the plaintiff as holder, and dishonoured. The defence is that the consideration had wholly failed or that there was no consideration for the cheque.

There is no dispute about the facts so far as they are material. It is sufficient to say that some time ago the defendant sold to the plaintiff Riverside Cottage, Old Malden-lane, Worcester Park, Surrey, in which premises the plaintiff and his wife lived. On Dec. 30, 1934, the defendant and his wife visited the plaintiff and his wife at Riverside Cottage, when a discussion took place as to the defendant buying back the cottage. Later that day the defendant orally agreed to buy the cottage for £800. He drew a cheque for £450, as part of the purchase price, made it payable to the plaintiff, and handed it to the plaintiff, who said that, if he received the money at once, he would save about £23. I doubt whether the defendant exactly understood this, but he knew that the cheque was wanted in connection with a mortgage—in fact, the plaintiff wished to use the cheque to make a payment to a building society early in the week. The plaintiff gave the defendant a receipt for "the sum of four hundred and fifty pounds on account of purchase of Riverside Cottage. Purchase price of Riverside agreed at eight hundred pounds." Both the cheque and the receipt were dated Dec. 31, 1934. The contract between the parties was an oral one. There was no contract in writing and there was no memorandum or note of the contract in writing sufficient to satisfy the terms of s. 40 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

That Sunday evening—Dec. 30—the defendant's wife changed her mind about wanting the house and the same evening, as the agent of her husband, wrote the following letter to the plaintiff: "I don't know what you will think of us, but have changed our minds about buying Riverside, so please do not put the cheque through. I have again got that feeling that I could not live there, so Mr. Fry wants me to let you know at once. I know you can make more money of it. Please forgive us for putting you about. Yours sincerely, E. Fry (for John Fry)." This letter reached Riverside Cottage on the Monday morning, but after the plaintiff had left to go to business. The cheque was duly presented, but, having been stopped, was dishonoured. The plaintiff now brings this action on the cheque. Counsel for the plaintiff, relying on s. 30 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provides that every party whose signature appears on a bill is, primâ facie, deemed to have become a party thereto for value, has put in the cheque, proved the signature of the defendant, and left it to the defendant to endeavour to prove that there was no consideration for it.

Counsel for the defendant points out that the cheque was given for part of the purchase price of the cottage and was not by way of deposit. He says that, as there was no memorandum or note in writing of the agreement between the parties sufficient to satisfy s. 40 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, there was no enforceable contract and that no action could have been brought for specific performance or for damages for the failure to complete the contract. Accordingly, he contends that his client would have been entitled to the return of the £450 had the cheque been met and that he has a good defence to the action.

That argument seems at first sight to have some support from authority, but I do not think that it can prevail. In my opinion, counsel for the plaintiff is right when he says that the decision in Jones v. Jones (1), if correctly decided, is conclusive of this case. It is a decision of the Court of Exchequer on a question of pleading. The action was one of debt by the payees against the makers of a promissory note payable on demand with a count on an account stated. The plea to the first count was that the promissory note was made and given by the defendants to the plaintiffs as the purchase money to be paid to the plaintiffs for the sale to the defendant, Owen Jones, of a cottage and land by virtue of an agreement made between the defendant, Owen Jones, and the plaintiffs for the sale of the cottage and land; "and that the said contract for the sale of the said tenement was not, nor was any memorandum or note thereof, in writing signed by the said Owen Jones, being the party to be charged therewith, or any person or persons thereunto lawfully authorised by him: and the defendants further say that there was not at any time any consideration or value for the defendants' making the said promissory note, or payment of the amount thereof except as aforesaid; and the plaintiffs have held, and now hold, the same without value or consideration." A

That case is very like the one now before me. The question was whether the facts stated in the plea, assuming them to be correct, afforded a defence to the action of debt on the promissory note. It was held that they did not. It is, no doubt, true that in the replication it was stated that the defendant, Owen Jones, had been put into possession of the cottage and land and was still in possession and enjoyment thereof B under the contract. But it is clear that the judgment of the court did not proceed on that fact or take it into consideration. PARKE, B., said in the course of the argument (6 M. & W. at p. 86):

> "We must assume, on these pleadings, that the note was given for the purchase money, and that the plaintiffs are perfectly ready to execute a conveyance. The plea does not aver that they are not ready and willing to convey. Although, therefore, they may not be bound to perform the agreement, yet, if they are ready to do so, what right have the defendants to refuse to pay their note? They have all they bargained for." C

LORD ABINGER, C.B., said (6 M. & W. at p. 88):

> "It is clear that this is a case where the parties have paid their money down—or, what is equivalent, given a promissory note payable on demand—for a future conveyance. Can anybody say they are not bound to pay it, unless they show that the plaintiffs have refused to execute that conveyance? I think the plea is clearly insufficient." D

The rest of the court concurred.

There being no evidence in the case now before the court that the plaintiff has not E always been ready and willing to execute a conveyance of Riverside Cottage, it might be enough to say that I was bound by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Jones v. Jones (1). Counsel for the defendant, however, has called my attention to Casson v. Roberts (2), decided in the Court of Chancery by SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R. The question now before me is not one in which there is any conflict or variance between the rules of equity and the rules of the common law with reference to the same matter. F If it were so, then in accordance with s. 25 (11) of the Judicature Act, 1873, now s. 44 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, I should be bound to give effect to the rule of equity. But I do not think that this is such a question. In my view, SIR JOHN ROMILLY purported to be giving a decision which was in accordance with the common law. His decision was that where there was no contract, or no contract which could be enforced, the purchaser was entitled to a return of his deposit. G He said (31 Beav. at p. 616) that it was only where there was a valid contract that the court, either in equity or at law, entered into the question by whose default it happened that the contract was not or could not be executed, and where there was no contract the purchaser was entitled to get back his deposit and nothing more. He also said:

> "I have always understood the law to be that when money is paid as a deposit on a purchase it is, primâ facie, money to be applied for the purchaser's benefit in the performance of the contract and in part liquidation of the purchase money." H

Casson v. Roberts (2) has, as counsel for the plaintiff observed, been twice commented on. No reference to it is made in LEAKE ON CONTRACTS (8th Edn., 1931, at p. 208), where the decision in Jones v. Jones (1) is set out and treated as correctly stating the law. Counsel referred to Thomas v. Brown (3), where QUAIN, J., said (1 Q.B.D. at p. 724):

> "With regard to the case of Casson v. Roberts (2) I do not think that it has much bearing upon the present question, but I must say that I do not think the reasons upon which it proceeded are satisfactory." I

I was also referred to the decision of HORRIDGE, J., in Monnickendam v. Leanse (4), where he declined to follow the decision of SIR JOHN ROMILLY in Casson v. Roberts (2). I need not refer further to Monnickendam v. Leanse (4), because a distinction may well be drawn between the facts of that case and those of the one before the court. In that case, in which the memorandum drawn up did not satisfy the requirements of s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and a deposit had been paid by the purchaser, it was held that if the purchaser repudiated the agreement he was entitled to recover the amount of the deposit.

In this state of the authorities I am satisfied that I ought to follow the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Jones v. Jones (1). I should, however, refer also to Mayson v. Clouet (5), on which counsel for the defendant relied. That is a decision of the Privy Council and not binding on me, and if it were in conflict with a decision of the Court of Exchequer I should follow the decision of the Court of Exchequer, but I do not think that Mayson v. Clouet (5) assists the defendant in this case. There a contract for the sale of land provided that a deposit should be paid forthwith, then two instalments of cash—each ten per cent. of the rest of the agreed price—at certain dates, the balance of the price to be paid within ten days of the production of a certificate of the completion of buildings. There was a provision that, if the purchaser failed to comply with the conditions of the contract, his deposit might be forfeited and the property re-sold. The purchaser paid the deposit and the two instalments, but failed to pay the balance of the price at the stipulated time. The vendors rescinded the contract, and a claim for the return of the instalments succeeded as the contract distinguished between the deposit and the instalments and provided for a forfeiture only of the deposit. The question there was whether the vendors could elect to rescind the contract and yet retain the instalments of the purchase price.

There is no doubt that the Privy Council disapproved of a dictum of Bankes, L.J., in Harrison v. Holland and Hannen and Cubitts, Ltd. (6). In that case there was provision for a deposit of £50,000 and a further £100,000 as part payment of the price to be paid within a fortnight. Ex abundanti cautela, the contract provided that in the event of non-completion the £50,000 should be forfeited and the £100,000 should not. Bankes, L.J., speaking of the £100,000 as a part payment, said ([1922] 1 K.B. at p. 213):

> "If nothing more had been said about it, as the contract came to an end in consequence of the purchasers' own default, neither they nor their assignee would have been able to get the money back."

The Privy Council pointed out that this was in conflict with what had been said by Lush, J., who tried the case:

> "The £100,000 is not called a deposit; it is expressly stated to be in part payment of the purchase money, and so it is not money paid as a guarantee for the due performance of the contract. It is, therefore, not forfeitable."

Their Lordships stated that they considered the dictum of Bankes, L.J., was unsound. In the case before me there is no provision in the contract as to forfeiture of the money paid by the purchaser, and if the plaintiff had elected to treat the contract as rescinded, and accepted the defendant's repudiation, he would not be entitled to recover. But he has not done so, and has done nothing to repudiate his promise to convey the premises to the defendant. In answer to a question which I asked just before giving judgment, the plaintiff, by his counsel, stated to me that he would give an undertaking to convey this property to the defendant. The plaintiff is entitled to judgment in this action on the cheque for £450, with interest thereon, and costs. The undertaking by the plaintiff that he will execute a conveyance of the property to the defendant will be set out in the judgment.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Re MANCHESTER (RINGWAY AIRPORT) COMPULSORY PURCHASE ORDER, 1934

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Branson, J.), May 23, 24, 27, 1935]

[Reported 153 L.T. 219; 99 J.P. 319; 79 Sol. Jo. 503; 33 L.G.R. 314]

Compulsory Purchase—Application to quash order—Need to show substantial prejudice of applicant—Bias—Appointment of official of Ministry to sit as assessor with inspector at inquiry—Form of appointment—Waiver of objection—Public Works Facilities Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 50), s. 2 (1), Sched. I, Part III (2).

The M. Corporation desired to establish an aerodrome on a certain site. In June, 1934, they approached the Director of Civil Aviation for guidance whether the consent of the Air Council, under s. 8 (1) of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, would be forthcoming. The Air Ministry sent Wing-Commander A. to inspect the site and report. After this inspection, by letter dated July 10, 1934, the Air Council told the Corporation that, while the report had enabled them "to arrive at certain general and provisional conclusions," the Council were "not in a position at the present stage to give their final decision in the matter, particularly as it may be necessary to hold a public inquiry, the results of which will possibly influence the Ministry's final views. Subject to these reservations, the letter added, the Council considered the site suitable. Subsequently, the Corporation made a compulsory purchase order to which objections were made, and the Air Minister and the Minister of Health jointly ordered a public inquiry by an inspector. Wing Commander A. sat beside the inspector and acted as his assessor, giving his views on technical matters and putting questions to witnesses. At the inquiry, the inspector said he intended to see the site from the air and also to walk over the ground. The inspector made two flights, the first during the inquiry. On each occasion he was piloted by N., a prospective witness for the Corporation. N. indicated landmarks referred to at the inquiry to the inspector but did not discuss the matter with him. Wing Commander A. accompanied the inspector on the second flight but no representatives of the objectors did so, despite an invitation by the inspector. No objection to Wing Commander A. or to N. or to the flights was taken at the inquiry. Between the close of the inquiry and the giving of the Minister's decision a Ministry official wrote to the Corporation asking for their views as to the exclusion of certain lands from the order and the siting of the airport entrance. The Corporation replied giving their views. Subsequently, the Minister confirmed the compulsory purchase order. The objectors applied to the High Court to quash the order, pursuant to s. 2 (1) and Sched. I, Part III (2) of the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, which empowered such quashing by the court "if satisfied that the order is not within the powers of the Act or that the interests of the applicant have been substantially prejudiced by any requirement of this Act not having been complied with." The objectors contended that by reason of the matters set out above the Minister was biased and so had no jurisdiction to adjudicate on or confirm the compulsory purchase order.

Held: the order should not be quashed because (i) the power to quash under the statute was discretionary and should not be exercised on either of the grounds set out above unless the interests of the applicant had been substantially prejudiced by the irregularity of which complaint was made: Errington v. Minister of Health (1), [1935] 1 K.B. 249, considered and explained.

(ii) neither the expression of the Ministry's view in the letter of July 10, nor the consideration of Wing Commander A.'s report, nor the correspondence with the Corporation before and after the inquiry, made it impossible, or even unlikely, that the Minister could act judicially.

(iii) the Minister was entitled to appoint an assessor to assist the inspector at the inquiry, and no formality was required for such appointment; any objection to the appointment of the assessor, and in particular to the appointment of Wing-Commander A., was waived by not being taken at the inquiry.

(iv) as the inspector had not received information from N. on controversial matters without giving the objectors a fair opportunity of correcting or contradicting such information, no objection could be taken to the inspector's flights with N.

Per Branson, J. It is most important that the rules of fair play should be insisted on, but it is important also that decisions, the giving of which has been entrusted to administrative bodies instead of to the courts of law, should not be rendered abortive by insistence upon irregularities which have not really prejudiced the applicant.

Notes. The Act of 1930 has been repealed, but provisions similar to those on which this case turns are now contained in Sched. I, Part IV, para. 15 (1) (b) of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946. The authority of Branson, J.'s dictum that ultra vires acts will not be quashed under such a provision unless substantial prejudice to the applicant is shown is doubtful; no question as to such prejudice was raised in the Court of Appeal in Palmer v. Minister of Housing and Local Government (1952), 3 P. & C.R. 165, when an order was attacked as being ultra vires.

Application. Objectors applied for the quashing of a compulsory purchase order, pursuant to s. 2 (1) and Sched. I, Part III, of the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930.

The applicants were a number of local authorities and the owners of certain lands affected by the City of Manchester (Ringway Airport) Compulsory Purchase Order, 1934, which had been made by the Manchester Corporation, and confirmed by the Secretary of State for Air on Feb. 8, 1935. The grounds of the application to the High Court were that the order as confirmed was not within the powers of the Act, and that certain requirements of the Act had not been complied with. The facts appear in the judgment.

The Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, s. 2, provides:

> "(1) Any local authority . . . may be authorised to purchase land compulsorily for any of the purposes specified in Part I of the First Schedule to this Act by means of an order (in this Act referred to as a 'compulsory purchase order') made and submitted to the appropriate Minister and confirmed by him in accordance with the provisions of Part II of that schedule, and the provisions of Part III of that schedule shall have effect with respect to the validity and date of operation of any such order. . . ."

By Sched. I, Part III, para. 2: "If any person aggrieved by an order desires to question its validity on the ground that it is not within the powers of this Act or that any requirement of this Act has not been complied with, he may, within twenty-one days after the publication of the notice of confirmation, make an application for the purpose to the High Court, and if any such application is duly made the court, if satisfied that the order is not within the powers of this Act or that the interests of the applicant have been substantially prejudiced by any requirement of this Act not having been complied with, may quash the order either generally or in so far as it affects any property of the applicant."

Sir Stafford Cripps, K.C., S. G. Turner, K.C., and A. Macfarlane for the applicants (the objectors).

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Wilfrid Lewis for the Secretary of State for Air (the confirming authority).

Tyldesley Jones, K.C., and Redmond Barry for the Manchester Corporation (the purchasing authority).

BRANSON, J.—This is an application, pursuant to s. 2 (1) and Part III of Sched. I, to the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, for the quashing of the City of Manchester (Ringway Airport) Compulsory Purchase Order, 1934. The applicants are a number of local authorities and the owners of certain of the lands to which the order applies. The grounds of the application are that the order as confirmed is not within the powers of the Act and that certain requirements of the Act were not complied with. The reasons upon which those submissions are based can be better appreciated when the facts have been stated.

The facts are as follows: In 1930 the City of Manchester established an airport at Barton to which, as time went on, there were thought to be certain objections which made it unsuitable for continental air service. The City Corporation thereupon appointed a committee to consider the question whether to spend money on improving it or whether to establish a new aerodrome elsewhere. An alternative site at Ringway was suggested and, in view of the fact that the consent of the Air Council was necessary under s. 8 (1) of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to enable them to acquire a new site, the committee approached the Director of Civil Aviation in June, 1934, for the purpose of seeking the guidance of the Ministry in the matter. In consequence an official of the Ministry, Wing-Commander Allen, was sent to inspect the Barton Aerodrome and the Ringway site. He inspected both places and made a report to the Director of Civil Aviation. The committee also obtained a report from their own advisers, and upon July 2, 1934, the town clerk wrote to the director asking what view the Ministry would take if the Corporation decided to seek another site. To this letter the Air Council replied on July 10 to the effect that on present information it was thought that the wiser policy for the city to adopt would be to purchase the Ringway site. I shall refer to these letters in greater detail later. As soon as the Corporation decided to proceed with the acquisition of the Ringway site, copies of the report of the Corporation's airport special committee, which contained the two letters above referred to, were sent to the Cheshire County Council and the Bucklow Rural District Council, who were regarded as interested. A compulsory order was thereupon made by the Corporation in pursuance of s. 2 (1) of the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, and submitted to the Secretary of State for Air and the Ministry of Health, to the latter for the purpose of getting authority to raise the necessary money. Notices of objection having been given, the two Ministers jointly ordered a public local inquiry to be held and gave notice that "G. Ewart Rhodes, the inspector appointed to hold the said inquiry," would commence it upon Oct. 9, 1934. At the opening of the proceedings on that day, the inspector was accompanied by Wing-Commander Allen, who sat beside him, and with regard to whom he said as follows:

> "I have the great advantage of having with me Wing-Commander Allen, who, after a distinguished career in the Royal Air Force, is with me as an assessor to assist me on technical questions regarding aviation. I am sure his help will be most valuable."

Wing-Commander Allen took part in the proceedings, giving his views on technical matters and putting questions to witnesses. No objection was taken by anyone at any time to his so acting. His presence at the inquiry was by reason of instructions received by him from the Directorate of Civil Aviation to give the inspector assistance on technical questions relating to aviation. This, he says, was in accordance with the usual practice. On the first day Mr. Turner, who appeared for all the local authorities who are parties to this application, asked the inspector to inspect the site. What happened was this. Counsel said:

A

> "And, if I may respectfully say so, sir, this site looks very different if you look at it from the road from what it does if you go over it field by field."

The inspector:

> "My intention is to see it from the air and walk over the ground."

He did so on Oct. 10, being taken up in an aeroplane piloted by one Norman. Norman B had been mentioned on the first day as a prospective witness for the Corporation. The fact that the inspector had inspected from the air was mentioned by him on the second day, when he said that he had asked the pilot to keep higher above the chimneys than he was doing. The circumstances of this flight and of another flight on Oct. 16 are detailed by the inspector in his affidavit. Having stated that he had arranged to be piloted by Mr. Norman, the inspector continued:

> "During these flights and on our way to and from the Barton Aerodrome, we did not discuss the subject-matter of the said inquiry, though when flying over the Ringway site he did manage to indicate to me the situation of some of the landmarks, which had been referred to on the previous day at the inquiry. The noise of the engines while in the aeroplane prevented anything more than a word or two being said to indicate any particular place and the indication was principally done D by gestures. . . . On Tuesday, Oct. 16, . . . I found in accordance with the directions I had given on Friday, Oct. 12, that a large aeroplane had been made available for me. The said aeroplane was one of the aeroplanes from the Barton Aerodrome and was piloted by a person who was entirely unknown to me. There was room in the said aeroplane for six passengers. Wing-Commander Allen (the assessor) and I only went up, but before going up I gave a special and urgent invitation that any E of the vacant seats should be occupied by representatives of the objectors and the Corporation."

I accept the inspector's account of those incidents which, with one exception, namely, his invitation to Major Allsop, are uncontradicted. It appears, therefore, that the inspector was invited by the objectors to inspect, that they were aware on the second F day of the inquiry that he had done so, that they were aware of his second inspection on Oct. 16 in company with the assessor, and made no objection at all. My attention was directed to certain complimentary remarks made by the counsel for the objectors to the inspector and the assessor at the close of the inquiry, with regard to which I need only say that I do not regard them as more than the usual interchange of courtesies at the close of a long inquiry.

G After the inquiry had closed and before the decision of the Ministry was given, certain communications passed between the town clerk of Manchester and the Air Ministry, to which exception is taken in the notice of motion. First there were certain interviews, which turn out to have been nothing more than inquiries as to when a decision might be expected. No question is now raised as to the propriety of these. Then there are some letters. On Jan. 19, 1935, an official of the Air Ministry wrote to the town clerk H of Manchester, asking for a precise definition of certain lands which the town clerk at the inquiry had suggested might be excluded from the order. No complaint is now made as to this, but the letter went on:

> "The solicitor representing Messrs. Greg, the parish of Styal and other interests, suggested that if the order was confirmed two conditions should be laid down, namely: (a) no entrance to airport on the Styal side, the roads being narrow and I airport traffic not being wanted; (b) there should be a definite condition that any land which might become subsequently surplus to airport requirements should be an open space only with no possibility of its use for such things as an omnibus station, buildings, cemetery, playing fields, or anything else. There seems no need to consider (b) at the moment, as any such questions can be dealt with better when any proposal arises to appropriate such lands for particular purposes, but (a) might conceivably affect the lay-out plans of the aerodrome if there is any likelihood of requiring an entrance on the Styal side. I should like therefore to have your general views on this."

The town clerk replied on Jan. 28, 1935, dealing with the suggested exclusion of the lands and continuing:

> "With regard to the two points raised in the fifth paragraph of your letter, I desire to make the following observations: (a) In view of the fact that there is a considerable length of frontage to the airport on the Styal side, the Corporation do not consider that they should be precluded from providing an entrance on that side at some future date, should the necessity arise. (b) I agree with you that there is no need to consider at the moment any question as to the possibility of the user of any land forming part of the compulsory purchase order, which may not ultimately be required for airport purposes."

On Feb. 8, 1935, the Secretary of State for Air confirmed the order.

In these circumstances it is contended by the objectors that the Secretary of State had no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the order or to confirm it because he was biased. The bias alleged is that the Air Council had expressed an opinion upon the question of the relative merits of the Barton and Ringway sites in the letter of July 10, 1934. It now becomes necessary to turn to that letter and the letter to which it was a reply. The town clerk's letter contains the following passages:

> "It must be appreciated that if it is decided to proceed with the construction of an aerodrome upon the alternative site, a compulsory purchase order will probably be necessary, and I appreciate that the Minister must not be asked, and cannot express any view which might limit his unprejudiced consideration of any question which might arise at a public inquiry with regard to the acquisition of the land. On the general question, however, as to whether it is desirable to proceed at Barton or to seek another site, it appears to the chairman of the committee and myself that the committee can fairly ask the Ministry for some guidance, and the chairman would be very much obliged if, after you have had an opportunity of considering the report and discussing the matter with Wing-Commander Allen, you could indicate to me what view the Ministry would take if the Corporation decided that it was wise to seek another site."

The answer to that I think it right to read in full because of the importance attached to it by the applicants. It is dated July 10, and runs as follows:

> "I am commanded by the Air Council to acquaint you that they have had under consideration the report of the aeronautical consultants, which was forwarded with your letter, and also the report of the inspection of the sites at Barton and at Ringway, which was carried out by a representative of this department [Wing-Commander Allen] on June 25 last. . . . I am to say that while the Air Council have been able, as a result, to arrive at certain general and provisional conclusions on which they are prepared to afford advice to your Corporation regarding the relative merits of the proposals under consideration, it will be appreciated that they are not in a position at the present stage to give their final decision in the matter, particularly as it may be necessary to hold a public inquiry, the results of which will possibly influence to a marked degree the views finally adopted by the Air Ministry. Subject to this consideration, however, I am to acquaint you that the Air Council's present opinion based on the information above referred to, is that the Corporation would not be well advised to undertake further expenditure on a large scale at Barton Aerodrome. Your Corporation are fully aware of the objections which have been raised to this site. As regards the alternative site at Ringway, the Air Council's view is that this site appears to be capable of development into an airport suitable for the requirements of a large and important district such as Manchester. They would, accordingly, advise that the purchase and development of this site will be the wiser policy to adopt and will prove more profitable, so far as can be foreseen at present, than further expenditure on a large scale at Barton."

The last paragraph is immaterial. It appears to me that the greatest care was taken both by the town clerk and by those who dealt with the Air Council's reply not to prejudge any issue which might arise at a public inquiry if, as was probable, a public inquiry should become necessary. The Air Council say that their conclusions are general and provisional, that they are not in a position to give a final decision, and point out that the results of a public inquiry might influence the views finally adopted by the Air Ministry. In arriving at this general and provisional conclusion the Air Council considered the report made by Wing-Commander Allen and the report of the aeronautical consultants sent to them on July 2 in the town clerk's letter. The latter report was put in evidence at the public inquiry, the report of Wing-Commander Allen, being a Government document, was not. It is contended that, having seen the report of Wing-Commander Allen made in the absence and without communication with the opponents of the site, the Secretary of State had rendered himself unfit to adjudicate upon the question of the comparative merits of the two sites.

The proposition that a person or body upon whom the duty is cast of deciding anything in the nature of a dispute between two parties must act judicially is not disputed. No good purpose would be served by my reading again the well-known passages from Board of Education v. Rice (2) ([1911] A.C. at p. 182), and Local Government Board v. Arlidge (3) ([1915] A.C. at pp. 133, 134, 141), which were cited in the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Errington v. Minister of Health (1). They may be summed up by saying that, though the forms and procedure of a court of law need not be followed, the ordinary principles of fair play must in substance be observed.

A further question is raised in the present case, which has not so far been expressly dealt with by the courts. Part III, para. 2, of the First Schedule to the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, provides for the quashing of an order

> "if [the court is] satisfied that the order is not within the powers of this Act or that the interests of the applicant have been substantially prejudiced by any requirement of this Act not having been complied with."

It is contended that, if it appears that the Minister has failed in any particular to act judicially in making the order, then the order is not within the powers of the Act and must be quashed whether the interests of the applicant have been substantially prejudiced or not. In my opinion that contention is unsound. It is true that it appears to be supported by some expressions at the end of the judgment of GREER, L.J., in Errington's Case (1), where the point was not raised. The passage I have in mind is the following ([1935] 1 K.B. at p. 268):

> "In my judgment it is true to say that an order made by a quasijudicial officer based on materials which are not the materials referred to in para. 4 of the First Schedule is an order which is not within the powers of the Act, having regard to the proposition which has been established in common law that a quasijudicial officer in exercising his powers must do it in accordance with the rules of natural justice, that is to say, he must hear both sides and must not hear one side in the absence of the other."

Both MAUGHAM, L.J. ([1935] 1 K.B. at p. 279) and ROCHE, L.J. ([1935] 1 K.B. at p. 282) proceed to consider the question whether the applicant's interests had been substantially affected. The paragraph is perhaps not very happily expressed. The power to quash is made discretionary in both cases referred to, even, that is to say, if it appears that the order is not within the law. In my opinion, the manifest intention of the statute is that the order shall not be quashed on either ground unless it appears that the interests of the applicant have been substantially prejudiced by the irregularity of which complaint is made. This seems to be in accordance with what one would expect. It is, of course, most important that the rules of fair play should be insisted on, but it is important also that decisions, the giving of which has been entrusted to administrative bodies instead of to the courts of law, should not be rendered abortive by insistence upon irregularities which have not really prejudiced the applicant. The substance must not be allowed to be obscured by undue attention being paid to form.

I now proceed to consider in detail the objections raised by the objectors. The first is that, the Air Council having expressed a tentative view in its letter of July 10, 1934, and having considered Wing-Commander Allen's report and having been in communication with the town clerk by the letters above referred to, the Air Minister, who is a member of that council, had incapacitated himself from acting judicially and, therefore, that the Public Works Facilities Act, 1930, cannot be operated in this case at all, so that if the Manchester Corporation wish to acquire the Ringway site it must proceed by private Act of Parliament. The question is really one of fact, namely, did what was done make it impossible or even unlikely that the Minister could bring a judicial mind to bear upon the matters in issue between the parties? In my opinion, it did not. With regard to the letter of July 10, the greatest care was taken to emphasise the fact that the view expressed therein was tentative only and might be altered. There was every reason of common sense and prudence impelling the Corporation, on the one hand, to inquire of the Air Council what its view of the suitability of the Ringway site might be, and the Air Council, on the other hand, to express a view, because under s. 8 (1) of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, and para. 7 (1) of the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923 (S.R. & O. 1923, No. 1508), made thereunder, the Corporation could only use the site, however acquired, for an aerodrome with the consent of the Air Council and if licensed by the Secretary of State. The Ministry was bound, in order to express even a tentative opinion, to get a report. It is true that the report was not disclosed to the objectors, but its author was present at the inquiry and made his views known thereat. With regard to the letters, the passages complained of did no more than inquire whether certain matters raised at the inquiry were still in issue for decision. The answer being merely that some were and some were not, no real objection can be taken to them. The result is that the contention that the order is not within the powers of the Act fails.

Next the objectors contend that certain requirements of the Act were not complied with. Under this head it is said that the inquiry was not a public local inquiry within para. 4 of the Second Part of the First Schedule to the Act. Three grounds are assigned for this contention. The first of them was the attendance thereat of Wing-Commander Allen. It was said that there is no power to appoint an assessor, as Wing-Commander Allen was said to be, and that, if there was such a power, he was not duly appointed. There are two answers to this. The first is that there is nothing in the Act or in any of the Acts referred to therein which deal with the holding of public local inquiries which would prevent the appointment of two inspectors or of one inspector and an assessor, as the Minister might determine; nor is there any requirement as to any formality to be observed in appointing him or them. The second is that the inspector announced that Wing-Commander Allen was there to assist him, and no objection was taken to him or to the part he took at any time. Thus, even if there was any irregularity in his being there, it was clearly waived. Then it is said that it was wrong to appoint Wing-Commander Allen because he had already reported in favour of the Ringway site. Two answers are made to this objection, the first being that Wing-Commander Allen was not a member of the tribunal at the local inquiry and took no part in the making of the report. The second answer is again waived. The letter of July 10, which had been disclosed to the applicants, made them aware of the fact that Wing-Commander Allen had made a report to the Ministry. The applicants could have raised objection if they thought that any objection could properly be made, but they did not. The third matter complained of is that the inspector was taken on a flight of inspection to the rival sites by a witness for the Corporation and in the absence of any representative of the objectors. Here again the matter is one of fact. If the inspector had received information from the pilot on controversial matters without giving the objectors a fair opportunity of correcting or contradicting what he said, there would be ground for complaint. But accepting, as I do, the affidavit of the inspector upon this point I hold that there is no substance in this objection.

For these reasons I conclude that the order appealed from is valid and this application should be dismissed.

Lunatic—Guardian of infant—Sole guardian—Receiver authorised to exercise powers—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict., c. 5), s. 128.

The patient, a lunatic, of whose estate a receiver had been appointed under s. 116 (1) (c) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, was the sole guardian of her infant son.

Held: under s. 128 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the court had jurisdiction to authorise the receiver, in the name and on behalf of the patient, to exercise in such manner as he thought advisable the powers relating to the custody, control, maintenance, and education of the infant which were vested in the patient as guardian.

Notes. As to where a person of unsound mind is a trustee or guardian, see 21 Halsbury's Laws (2nd Edn.) 355–357, and for cases, see 33 Digest 222 et seq. For Lunacy Act, 1890, see 17 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 1052.

Application under r. 10 of the Management of Patient's Estates Rules, 1934.

The patient was a lunatic of whose estate the Official Solicitor had been appointed receiver by order dated Nov. 4, 1931, made under s. 116 (1) (c) of the Lunacy Act, 1890. At the date of the order the patient was in a mental hospital. The patient was discharged from the hospital on Nov. 18, 1932, and resided outside a mental hospital until the end of April, 1935, but the receivership order was not discharged. On April 23, 1935 (while the present application was pending), she was again admitted to hospital and was certified on April 26, 1935. At the time of the hearing before the Court of Appeal she was resident in a mental hospital.

The patient was a widow, her husband having died in the year 1929. She had an infant son, who was born on July 18, 1919, and was receiving his education at a public school. At the time of the hearing the patient's property was insufficient for the maintenance of the infant, who was being maintained and educated out of funds provided from outside sources. The only known relations of the infant, apart from the patient, were a sister of the patient residing abroad and a brother of the patient's late husband residing in Scotland. The patient was the sole guardian of the infant, no testamentary guardian having been appointed by the patient's husband and no guardian having been appointed by the court.

The application was made by the Official Solicitor, as receiver of the estate of the patient, for authority to exercise the power of custody, control, maintenance, and education vested in the patient as guardian of her infant son. Romer, L.J., heard the application on April 15, 1935, and it was adjourned by him into court. The adjourned application was now heard in camera.

J. W. Brunyate for the Official Solicitor.—The order is necessary in order that arrangements may be made for the future holidays of the infant and for launching him in the world. The mother is the sole guardian of the infant by virtue of s. 4 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, and there is jurisdiction under s. 128 of the Lunacy Act, 1890 (as extended to the case of a receiver by s. 1 of the Lunacy Act, 1908), to authorise the receiver to exercise the powers vested in her as guardian, although no previous case can be found in which the jurisdiction given by that section has been exercised as regards powers vested in the patient as guardian.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—We have considered the facts and the sections of the Acts quoted and are of opinion that there is jurisdiction to make the order asked. The order will authorise the receiver in the name and on behalf of the patient to exercise, in such manner as he in his discretion thinks advisable, such powers vested in the patient in her character of guardian as relate to the custody, control, maintenance, and education A of her infant son. The costs may be allowed out of the estate of the patient.

ROMER and MAUGHAM, L.JJ., concurred.

Order accordingly.

Estate Duty—Passing—Accumulation of income during life of settlor—Application of rule in Lassence v. Tierney—Beneficial interests not changing hands—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 1.

Estate Duty—Passing—Property deemed to pass—Quantum taxable—Interest purchased or provided by deceased—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2 (1) (d). E

By a settlement dated Nov. 20, 1925, a settlor directed the trustee to hold the trust fund in trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of the settlor or the husbands or wives of such children or remoter issue at such age or time, or ages or times, and in such manner in all respects as the settlor should by deed or will appoint. In default of and F subject to any such appointment, the settlor directed the division of the trust fund into three equal shares and the appropriation of one such share to each of the settlor's three children, V., P. and F., but so that the trustee should retain the shares so appropriated and should hold the share of each such child on the trusts therein mentioned. By a revocable deed of appointment dated Sept. 26, 1928, the settlor directed the trustee to stand possessed of the trust fund on trust during the G life of the settlor to accumulate the yearly income as an addition to the capital and after her death to hold the trust fund (and the accumulations of the income thereof) in trust for her said three children, V., P. and F., in equal shares, but so that the trustee should retain the same and should hold the share of each child on trust to pay the income to such child during his or her life and after the death of such child in trust for the children or remoter issue of such child as such child H should appoint and, in default of appointment, in trust for the children of such child who being sons should attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters should attain that age or marry, in equal shares if more than one. The appointment also contained a provision for the accruer of any share in respect of which the said trusts should fail. On Oct. 15, 1930, the settlor died, and was survived by her three said children, who were unmarried. Estate duty was claimed in respect I of the principal value of the trust fund (including the accumulations) under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1. It was accepted that if estate duty were not exigible under s. 1 of the Act of 1894, duty would be chargeable under s. 2 (1) (d) of that Act, but the method of assessment under the latter provision was disputed.

Held: (i) the trust fund did not pass on the death of the settlor within s. 1 of the Act of 1894, and accordingly estate duty was not exigible under that section, because, applying the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (1) (1849), 1 Mac. & G. 551, V., P. and F. were both before and after the death of the settlor between them absolutely entitled to the trust fund subject to the same defeasance, and, therefore, in connection with that event there was no shifting of the beneficial interest in the trust fund;

(ii) estate duty was exigible under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Act of 1894, only on the amount (if any) by which the value of the life interests accruing to V., P. and F. by reason of the death of the settlor exceeded the value of those interests, if any, before the death.

Adamson v. A.-G. (2), [1933] A.C. 257, explained.

Notes. The quantum taxable under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d), was altered by the Finance Act, 1934, s. 28, under which provision the extent of any beneficial interest arising on the death of the deceased must be ascertained without regard to any interest in expectancy which the beneficiary may have had therein before the death. The proviso to s. 28 of the Act of 1934 safeguarded the rights of the parties in the present case.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HANWORTH, M.R., SLESSER and ROMER, L.JJ.) (reported 151 L.T. 268) upon the information herein set out, which stated as follows:

1. The object of this information is to recover estate duty and succession duty on the death of Josephine Lawrence Butler (hereinafter called "the deceased") in respect of the property below mentioned.

2. By an indenture of settlement dated Nov. 20, 1925, and made between the deceased of the one part and the above-named defendant of the other part (which said indenture is hereinafter called "the settlement"), after reciting that the deceased had caused to be issued to or transferred into the name of the nominee of the defendant twenty-thousand fully paid deferred shares of £10 each in a company called Butler Estates Co., Ltd., with a view to such shares being held upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions thereinafter declared and contained concerning the same for the benefit of the children and remoter issue of the deceased, and in order to make provision for such children and remoter issue, it was witnessed and it was thereby declared and agreed that the defendant should stand possessed of the said shares and the investments from time to time representing the same (hereinafter called "the trust fund") on the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions following, that is to say, in trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of the deceased or the husbands or wives of such children or remoter issue at such age or time or respective ages or times and in such shares and with such trusts for their respective advancement and maintenance and education at the discretion of the defendant or any other person or persons and in such manner in all respects as the deceased should from time to time by deed revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint; and until and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust to divide the trust fund into three equal shares and to appropriate one such share to each of the deceased's three children, namely, Vera Lawrence Butler, Patience Mourilyan Butler and Francis Charles Joseph Butler, but so that the defendant should retain the shares so appropriated and should hold the share of each such child upon trust until such child should attain the age of twenty-one years or, being a daughter, marry, to apply the income at the defendant's discretion for his or her maintenance, education or benefit and to accumulate the surplus, and after such child should have attained the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter have married, to pay the income to such child during his or her life (with a discretionary trust in the event of alienation) and at the death of such child in trust for the children or remoter issue of such child as such child should appoint with a provision in default of appointment and a provision for the accruer of any share in respect of which the above mentioned trusts should fail.

3. No dividend was declared in respect of the said shares between the date of the settlement and the date of the deed of appointment next below mentioned and consequently no income was during such period paid or applied in accordance with the above-mentioned provisions in default of appointment contained in the settlement.

4. By a deed of appointment dated Sept. 26, 1928, and made between the deceased of the one part and the defendant of the other part (which said deed is hereinafter called "the appointment") the deceased in exercise of the power for that purpose given to her by the settlement appointed that the defendant should stand possessed of the trust fund on the following trusts, that is to say, on trust during the life of the deceased to accumulate the yearly income thereof at compound interest as an addition to capital and after her death in trust for her three said children, namely, Vera Lawrence Butler, Patience Mourilyan Butler and Francis Charles Joseph Butler in equal shares, but so that the defendant should retain the said shares and should hold the share of each child on trust to pay the income to such child during his or her life and after the death of such child in trust for the children or remoter issue of such child as such child should appoint with a provision in default of appointment and a provision for the accruer of any share in respect of which the above-mentioned trusts should fail. The appointment contained a provision reserving power to the deceased at any time or times during her life by any deed or deeds or by will or codicil wholly or partially to revoke the appointment thereunder and to declare new trusts concerning the trust fund.

5. Pursuant to the direction contained in the appointment the defendant accumulated all dividends declared in respect of the said shares during the period between the date of the appointment and the death of the deceased and such accumulations form an addition to the capital of the trust fund.

6. The deceased died on Oct. 15, 1930, without having exercised the power reserved to her by the appointment to revoke the appointment thereunder and to declare new trusts concerning the trust fund.

7. The three above-named children of the deceased are all living.

8. In the circumstances aforesaid estate duty at the appropriate rate became payable under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the principal value of the trust fund (including the said accumulations) as property passing on the death of the deceased. Alternatively, estate duty at the appropriate rate became payable under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the life interests of the deceased's three children in the trust fund (including the said accumulations) as interests provided by the deceased and arising on the death of the deceased.

9. The aggregate value of the property which passed on the death of the deceased within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894 (exclusive of the trust fund and the said accumulations, the value of which is not known to the informant), was upwards of £270,000.

10. In addition, succession duty became payable in the circumstances aforesaid under s. 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and s. 58 (2) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, in respect of the life interests of the deceased's three children in the trust fund (including the said accumulations) as on a succession derived by the said children from the deceased as predecessor. The rate of duty is 1 per cent.

A 11. The defendant, as trustee of the settlement, is the person accountable for the said estate duty and the said succession duty. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have caused application to be made to the defendant for accounts and payment of the said duties respectively, but the defendant refuses to deliver any such accounts or to pay any such duty and contends that neither such duty is payable.

12. The defendant has in its possession or power divers deeds, accounts, writings, and B other documents relating to the matters in question in this suit and it ought to produce the same. The informant on behalf of His Majesty prays as follows:

(1) That it may be declared that on the death of the deceased estate duty at the appropriate rate became payable under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the principal value of the trust fund (including the said accumulations) or, alternatively, under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the life interests therein of the C three above-named children of the deceased.

(2) That it may be declared that upon the death of the deceased succession duty at the rate of 1 per cent. became payable under s. 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and s. 58 (2) of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, in respect of the life interests of the three said children of the deceased in the trust fund (including the said accumulations).

(3) That the defendant may be ordered to deliver accounts of the said property and D to pay the amount of the said estate duty and succession duty, with interest thereon respectively from the death of the deceased, to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the informant hereby waiving such penalties as the defendant may have incurred by reason of the said duties not having been paid up to the present time.

(4) That all necessary and proper inquiries may be made, directions given, and accounts taken for the purposes aforesaid.

E (5) That the informant, on behalf of His Majesty, may have such further or other relief in the premises as the case may require.

The Court of Appeal held, reversing FINLAY, J., and applying Adamson v. A.-G. (2), that it could not be said that the vested right given before B.'s death to the children was of no possible value, and, therefore, the question of estate duty payable on the interest deemed to pass on the death must be measured, as in Adamson's Case (2), by F the excess of the actual value after the death beyond the actual value of the expectant right or the right to an expectant beneficial interest which each child held before the death.

The Crown appealed.

G The House took time for consideration.

March 15. LORD ATKIN.—I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion which my noble and learned friend LORD TOMLIN has prepared, and which will be read by my noble and learned friend LORD RUSSELL. I entirely agree with it and have nothing to add.

H LORD TOMLIN (read by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN).—The questions raised by this appeal are concerned with the estate duty which became payable on the death of Mrs. Josephine Lawrence Butler, whom I will call the settlor, in respect of a fund settled by her in her lifetime.

The settlement in question was dated Nov. 20, 1925. The respondent was made the trustee of it, and the property settled consisted of 20,000 fully paid deferred shares of I £10 each in a company called Butler Estates Co., Ltd.

The trusts declared of the shares and of the investments for the time being representing the same were (subject to a special power of appointment by the settlor) to divide the trust fund into three equal shares and to appropriate one such share to each of the settlor's three children, namely, Vera Lawrence Butler, Patience Mourilyan Butler, and Francis Charles Joseph Butler, but so that the respondent should retain the shares so appropriated and should hold the share of each such child on trust until such child should attain the age of twenty-one years or, being a daughter, marry, to apply the income at the respondent's discretion for his or her maintenance, education or benefit, and to accumulate the surplus, and after such child should have attained the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter have married, to pay the income to such child during his or her life (with a discretionary trust in the event of alienation), and at the death of such child in trust for the children or remoter issue of such child as such child should appoint with a provision in default of appointment and a provision for the accruer of any share in respect of which the above-mentioned trusts should fail. A

No dividend was declared in respect of the shares between the date of the settlement and the date of the deed of appointment which I shall next mention, and consequently no income was during such period paid or applied in accordance with the above-mentioned provisions in default of appointment contained in the settlement. B

By a deed of appointment dated Sept. 26, 1928, the settlor in exercise of the power for that purpose given to her by the settlement appointed that the respondent should stand possessed of the trust fund on the trusts declared in the first five clauses of the appointment. C

The nature of the arguments developed before your Lordships' House renders it desirable to set out these clauses at length. They are as follows:

> "1. The [trustee] shall stand possessed of the trust fund upon trust during the life of the said Josephine Lawrence Butler to accumulate the yearly income thereof at compound interest by investing the same and the resulting income thereof in any of the investments authorised by the said settlement and from and after the death of the said Josephine Lawrence Butler the [trustee] shall stand possessed of the trust fund (which expression shall hereinafter include the accumulations of income thereof) in trust for the three children of the said Josephine Lawrence Butler namely Vera Lawrence Butler Patience Mourilyan Butler and Francis Charles Joseph Butler in equal shares but so that the share which after the death of the said Josephine Butler shall be so held in trust for each of the said three children shall not vest absolutely in such child but shall be retained by the [trustee] upon the trusts hereinafter declared concerning the same. D E
> "2. During the life of such child the [trustee] shall pay the income of such share of the trust fund to him or her and so that in the case of a daughter the same shall during coverture be without power of anticipation. F
> "3. After the death of such child the [trustee] shall hold such share and the future income thereof in trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of such child at such age or time or respective ages or times if more than one in such shares and with such future or other trusts for their respective advancement maintenance and education at the discretion of the [trustee] or any other persons or person and in such manner in all respects as such child shall from time to time by deed revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil (without transgressing the law as to remoteness) appoint and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for all or any of the children of such child who being sons or a son shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters or a daughter shall attain that age or marry if more than one in equal shares. G
> "4. Provided always that no child of such child of the said Josephine Lawrence Butler who or whose issue shall take any part of the said share of the trust fund under any appointment by virtue of the power of appointment lastly hereinbefore contained shall in default of appointment to the contrary be entitled to any share of the unappointed part thereof without bringing the share or shares interest or interests so appointed to him or her or to his or her issue into hotchpot and accounting for the same accordingly. H I
> "5. If the trusts hereinbefore declared concerning the share of such child of the said Josephine Lawrence Butler as aforesaid in the Trust Fund shall fail then subject to the trusts powers and provisions herein declared and contained or by law vested in the [trustee] concerning the same share of the trust fund and to every or any exercise of such respective powers the said share and any additional share or shares which may accrue or be added thereto by virtue of any provision for accruer herein contained and the income thereof respectively shall go and accrue by way of addition to the shares in the trust fund of the others of the said three children of the said

Josephine Lawrence Butler in equal shares and so that the share which shall so accrue and be added to each of such other shares of the trust fund shall be held upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions (including provisions as to accruer to other shares) herein declared concerning the same or as near thereto as circumstances will admit."

The appointment contained a power of revocation exercisable by the settlor by deed or will. This power was never in fact exercised and the settlor died on Oct. 15, 1930, leaving the appointment in operation, and survived by her three children named in the settlement and appointment. The three children are all living and none of them has ever been married.

The Crown by information claimed that on the death of the settlor, estate duty at the appropriate rate became payable under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the principal value of the trust fund including the accumulations or alternatively under s. 2 (1) (d) of the same Act in respect of the life interests therein of the three children of the settlor.

On the hearing of the information, Finlay, J., held that the property did not pass under s. 1 of the Act, but that the Crown was entitled to duty under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894, and that by reason of s. 4 of the same Act the accumulations ought not to be aggregated with the other interests. The formal order contained a declaration that upon the death of the settlor estate duty did not become payable under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the principal value of the trust fund, and also a declaration that on the death of the settlor estate duty at the appropriate rate became payable under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the life interests in the settled fund of the three children of the settlor, but that the accumulations were not to be aggregated with the value of such life interests or with any other estate passing on the death of the settlor.

On appeal by the Crown to the Court of Appeal Finlay, J.'s judgment was affirmed. Romer, L.J., however, pointed out that Finlay, J.'s order was in form too favourable to the Crown as it did not limit the payment of duty to duty on the increase of value that accrued to the interests of the children by reason of the settlor's death. There was, however, no cross-appeal before the Court of Appeal, and accordingly the formal order of the court merely dismissed the appeal and affirmed the declaration of Finlay, J., that no duty was payable under s. 1. Subsequently the respondent obtained an extension of time for appealing against Finlay, J.'s order and took the matter again to the Court of Appeal with a view to amending the second declaration in Finlay, J.'s order in the sense indicated by Romer, L.J. This appeal succeeded, and an order was made allowing the appeal and substituting for the second declaration of Finlay, J., a declaration that the beneficial life interest of each of the three children of the settlor in the trust funds (including the accumulations) to the extent to which the principal value of such beneficial life interest on the death of the settlor exceeded the actual value (if any) of the expectant beneficial life interest of each child prior to such death was an interest accruing or arising on such death and was therefore to be deemed property passing on the death of the settlor under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894, and that estate duty at the appropriate rate on the principal value of such excess was leviable and payable accordingly, but that for the purpose of determining the rate of estate duty to be paid on the property passing or deemed to pass on the death of the settlor the accumulations were not to be aggregated with such property.

The Crown now appeals to your Lordships' House against both orders of the Court of Appeal, contending that estate duty at the appropriate rate became payable under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of the principal value of the trust funds (including the accumulations), or alternatively, if this was not so, that duty became payable under s. 2 (1) (d), and that the second declaration of Finlay, J.'s order was in the right form.

The provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, to which I have referred so far as relevant are as follows:

s. 1: "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this Part > of this Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid, upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty, called 'estate duty,' at the graduated rates hereinafter mentioned, . . . A

> s. 2: "(1) Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say: . . . (d) Any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased." B

As was made clear by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Earl Cowley v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (3) ([1899] A.C. at p. 211), s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, gives effect to the principle C

> "that whenever property changes hands on death the State is entitled to step in and take toll of the property as it passes without regard to its destination or to the degree of relationship, if any, that may have subsisted between the deceased and the person or persons succeeding," while s. 2 is subsidiary, declaring that the expression "property passing on the death of the deceased" shall be "deemed to include" certain things classified under four different heads to no one of which rightly understood is that expression literally applicable. The property which is envisaged as passing is the beneficial interest in property. The first question to consider, therefore, is: Did any property in fact pass by reason of the settlor's death? D

Now on this part of the case the question seems to me to depend on the proper construction to be put on the appointment. On behalf of the Crown it is urged that the effect of the appointment is, first, during the life of the settlor to create a trust for the accumulation of the income of the fund by adding the same to the corpus for the benefit of those who take under the settlement which springs into existence at the settlor's death according to their respective interests under the settlement, and, secondly, to create as from the settlor's death a settlement of the original trust fund and the accumulations under which there then arise for the first time life interests in favour of the three children in the original trust funds and the accumulations followed by trusts for their issue with accruer clauses between the several stocks. On that view of the appointment it is contended that by reason of the death of the settlor property actually passed, because the trust for accumulation ceased and the life interests of the children sprang into being for the first time. E F

On the other hand, the respondent contends, first, that the rule commonly known as the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (1), approved and applied by your Lordships' House in Hancock v. Watson (4), operates in the present case, with the result that on the true construction of the appointment there is an absolute initial gift to the three children of the settlor in equal shares, and that the absolute initial gift of each share is only cut down if and when and while there is in existence some person qualified to take under the trusts of such share declared in derogation of the absolute gift and to the extent necessary to give effect to the rights of such person, and, secondly, that on this view of the construction nothing passed by reason of the settlor's death. G H

I am satisfied that the frame of the appointment is such as to attract the application of the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (1) which admittedly is to be regarded in construing non-testamentary instruments as well as in construing testamentary documents; the nature and effect of the rule is stated by LORD DAVEY in Hancock v. Watson (4) ([1902] A.C. at p. 22) in these terms: I

> "it is settled law that if you find an absolute gift to a legatee in the first instance, and trusts are engrafted or imposed on that absolute interest which fail, either from lapse or invalidity or any other reason, then the absolute gift takes effect so far as the trusts have failed to the exclusion of the residuary legatee or next of kin as the case may be."

In the present case it is to be observed that the gift is in the first instance absolute in form "in trust for the three children . . . in equal shares" and that in the engrafted trusts introduced by the words "but so that" there is a direction for dealing with the thing described as "the share which after the death of the settlor, Josephine Butler, shall be so held in trust for each of the settlor's three children," and throughout the clauses containing the engrafted trusts there are phrases indicating ownership such as "the share of each child" or "the shares in the trust fund of the others of the settlor's three children." Further, I cannot find in the language of the engrafted trusts anything appropriate to have effect if there be a failure of the stocks of all three children. Having regard to the language and circumstances to which I have called attention I am of opinion that the case is one to which the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (1) falls to be applied.

Further the result of applying the rule is, I think, that the absolute gift stands, or to employ Lord Davey's language "takes effect" except to the extent to which it is cut down by the events which actually happen. At the death of the settlor nothing had happened to cut down the absolute gifts beyond the fact that all three children were living.

No doubt in respect of each share the absolute gift was defeasible because it might be defeated to a limited extent by the other children surviving so as to enjoy a life interest in it or by the birth of issue becoming entitled under the trust, but the defeasibility was not ended by reason of the death of the settlor and even if it had been that would not have constituted a passing under s. 1 of the Act (see Adamson v. A.-G. (2)). But for the possibility of the birth of issue the three children together could in a settlor's lifetime have stopped the trust for accumulation and demanded a transfer to themselves of the whole fund and the accumulations. To-day, after the settlor's death, the position is the same. But for the possibility of the birth of issue the three children together could require that the whole fund and the accumulations should be transferred to them on their joint receipt. Their interests to-day are the same as they were before the settlor's death, i.e., they together own the whole fund and the accumulations subject to the same defeasance. Their position in this regard has not been altered by the settlor's death.

If there has been a passing of property on the death there must have been a passing or shifting of the beneficial interest in the fund from one to another. But if the only persons beneficially interested in the fund immediately before the death are also the only persons beneficially interested in the fund immediately after the death (subject though their title is to the same possibility of defeasance) where is any passing or shifting to be found? In my opinion, there is none.

It is admitted by the respondent that if there is no passing under s. 1 of the Act, s. 2 (1) (d) will come into operation. The question is how duty under that provision is to be assessed. It is, I think, clear that it is exigible only on the amount of the excess (if any) by which the value of the interest accruing by reason of the death exceeds the value of the interest, if any, before the death, and the order of Finlay, J., in this regard was wrong in form. The respondent though he has not appealed against the order of the Court of Appeal which dealt with this has criticised its form as possibly precluding him from saying that the excess in the present case is nil.

I do not think that in the circumstances your Lordships would desire to modify the form of that order, but as it has evidently been based on the declaration proposed by Lord Warrington of Clyffe in Adamson v. A.-G. (2) ([1933] A.C. at p. 278), I may perhaps be permitted to say that in my opinion Lord Warrington of Clyffe did not intend to hold that in every case within the ambit of s. 2 (1) (d), the value of the interest after the death must necessarily exceed the value of the interest before the death.

Further, having regard to some of the observations in the courts below, I may, perhaps, also venture to observe that the ratio decidendi in Adamson v. A.-G. (2) is not that on the execution of the settlement the beneficial interest in the whole fund passed out of the settlor but that it passed out of the settlor to the children whose interest was the same both before and after the death of the settlor subject only to this that a possibility of defeasance came to an end with the death and that the cesser of that possibility of defeasance did not constitute a passing.

A In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that this appeal fails on both points, and should be dismissed with costs.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN.—For myself I find myself in such complete agreement with the opinion which I have just read, both in its reasoning and in its conclusions, that I have not thought it necessary to trouble your Lordships with any observations of my own. B

LORD MACMILLAN.—I also am entirely in accord with the opinion of my noble and learned friend LORD TOMLIN and I have nothing to add.

LORD WRIGHT.—I also agree and I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Sale of Land—Restrictive covenant—Building scheme—Covenant void—Covenant by purchaser with himself and other persons—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 82. F

By conveyances dated Feb. 20, 1907, B., H., & S., tenants in common, conveyed to B. (one of their number) land subject to restrictive covenants. By a conveyance dated July 6, 1907, B., H., & S. conveyed to the plaintiff land adjacent to that the subject of the conveyances of Feb. 20, the plaintiff covenanting with the vendors, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, "owners for the time being of the lands now or formerly a part of the vendors' estate of which G the hereditaments hereby conveyed form part and so that every person for the time being entitled to any estate in any such lands shall have a right to the observance and fulfilment of" certain stipulations thereinafter mentioned "so far as they relate to their property," that he, his heirs and assigns would perform and observe those stipulations. The relevant stipulations were the same as those specified in the conveyances of Feb. 20. In 1933, B. conveyed to the defendant part of the H land comprised in the conveyances of Feb. 20, and shortly afterwards the defendant began to erect on that land houses which were in breach of the stipulations in the conveyances of Feb. 20 and July 6, 1907. In an action by the plaintiff for a declaration that the defendant was bound by a building scheme and for an injunction restraining him from building on the land houses which did not comply with the stipulations, I

Held: (i) although the covenants entered into by B. in the conveyances of Feb. 20, 1907, were in form with B., H., & S. jointly, and although each of the covenantors had at that time a separate interest in the land retained, the covenants could not be treated as joint and several, for a covenant with H. & S. alone would not create the necessary mutual obligation binding on the whole interest in the land conveyed and that retained; a man could not contract with himself: Ellis v. Kerr (2), [1910] 1 Ch. 529; and so the covenants in the conveyances of Feb. 20, 1907, were void and unenforceable when they were entered into; and, therefore, there were

A no restrictive covenants in existence relating to the land purchased by the plaintiff in 1907, and, as no subsequent covenants were entered into, no building scheme ever came into existence, and the action failed.

(ii) s. 82 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, did not operate to render sufficient to constitute a building scheme that which was insufficient to create such a scheme in 1907.

D Action for declaration and injunction.

The plaintiff, the owner of lot 26 and part of lot 27 on a building estate, which, by virtue of conditions of sale, were subject to restrictive covenants, claimed a declaration that the defendant, as owner and occupier of lot 25 adjoining the plaintiff's plots, was bound by the building scheme and by certain covenants by which the defendant's vendor was himself bound under a sale by the vendor and two others as tenants in E common to himself. These covenants were similar to those into which the plaintiff had entered with regard to his plots. The defendant pleaded that his property was conveyed to him free of any covenants or restrictions, that he purchased without notice of a building scheme, and that any restrictions affecting the land had ceased to apply.

Section 82 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, provides:

"(1) Any covenant, whether express or implied, or agreement entered into by a F person with himself and one or more other persons, shall be construed and be capable of being enforced in like manner as if the covenant or agreement had been entered into with the other person or persons alone. (2) This section applies to covenants or agreements entered into before or after the commencement of this Act, and to covenants implied by statute in the case of a person who conveys or is expressed to convey to himself and one or more other persons, but without pre- G judice to any order of the court made before such commencement."

Cur. adv. vult.

April 1.—LUXMOORE, J., read the following judgment. This action has been brought for a declaration that the defendant, as owner and occupier of certain land at Purley in H the county of Surrey, is bound by a building scheme, and for ancillary relief, including an injunction to restrain him from building upon the land more than two dwelling-houses with the appropriate stables, outbuildings and offices. The defendant denies the existence of a building scheme and says that if, contrary to his submission, there is such a scheme, the plaintiff has by his conduct deprived himself of the right to enforce it. He also says that the plaintiff has not suffered, and will not suffer, anything beyond I nominal damages if more than two dwelling-houses should be built on the land.

There is no dispute of fact except on the question of damage. The material facts are as follows. By a deed dated May 4, 1903, John Porteous Maley conveyed to Edward Hall, Edward James Sole and Harry Tom Freeman in fee simple as tenants in common, 19 acres 3 roods and 9 perches of land situate in the parish of Coulsdon, bounded on or towards the north-east by a road called the Higher Drive, on or about the south-west by a road called Old Lodge-lane, on or towards the north-west by land in the occupation of the Reedham Orphanage, and on or towards the south-east by land then or lately belonging to one Alfred Densham. The conveyance carried into effect an agreement for sale and purchase. Messrs. Hall, Sole, and Freeman subsequently sold the property comprised in the conveyance of May 4, 1903, to Mr. Frederick Betts, the said Mr. Edward Hall and the said Mr. Edward James Sole, and it was conveyed to them in fee simple as tenants in common by a conveyance dated Feb. 10, 1904. Between the date of this conveyance and Oct. 4, 1906, Messrs. Betts, Hall, and Sole sold and conveyed certain parts of the land comprised in the conveyance of Feb. 10, 1904, to various purchasers. The purchaser in each case was one or other of the vendors, Messrs. Betts, Hall, and Sole. No restrictions were imposed on any of these sales. On Oct. 4, 1906, the rest of the land comprised in the conveyance of Feb. 10, 1904, then remaining unsold was offered for sale by auction, subject to certain conditions which were attached to the particulars of sale. The property was described in the particulars as being "a valuable freehold building estate, comprising three freehold detached residences, and fifty-one freehold building plots, situated on the Reedham Park Estate, Purley, Surrey." The plan attached to the particulars comprised the unsold land, included in the conveyance of Feb. 10, 1904, lying between Higher-drive and Reedham-road. The last-named road is on the site of the Old Lodge-lane shown on the plan on the conveyance of May 4, 1903. The sale plan also shows the property as intersected by two roads running more or less at right angles to Higher-drive and Reedham-road. The fifty-one lots offered for sale are coloured pink on the sale plan and are numbered consecutively from 1 to 51 inclusive, while the three freehold residences are shown on the plan and are also coloured pink and are numbered 52, 53 and 54 respectively.

The conditions of sale, so far as material to this action, provided as follows: Condition 14:

> "The property, or every lot of property, is sold and shall be conveyed subject to the following stipulations and every purchaser shall covenant with the vendors their and each of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, owners for the time being of any of the lands now or formerly part of the vendors' estate of which the same form part, for the observance thereof, and so that every person for the time being entitled to any estate in any such lands shall have a right to the observance and fulfilment of such stipulations so far as they relate to such covenantors' property or lot or lots, namely: No lands shall be used or have any buildings erected thereon save for the purposes of private residences and stables, outbuildings, offices, and gardens, suitable and adapted for use therewith. In the event of a sale in lots . . . not more than two dwelling-houses with such stables, outbuildings, and offices shall be erected on any one plot. No such dwelling-house henceforth erected shall (exclusive of such offices, outbuildings, and stables, as aforesaid) be of less value, in prime cost of labour and materials at lowest current prices, than as follows, namely: In the case of houses fronting Higher Drive for each detached house £700 and for a pair of semi-detached houses £1,200; and in case of houses fronting any other road for each detached house £500 and for a pair of semi-detached houses £800. Nothing shall be done or permitted which shall be a nuisance, or damage, or annoyance to the neighbourhood, or any person resident, or owning property therein. Every purchaser shall forthwith erect and afterwards maintain a good and sufficient boundary fence or wall upon the frontage, and also on the side of the property (or of his lot) as marked 'T' within the boundary. Nothing other than bow windows or other architectural dressings, or a front boundary wall or fence, shall be erected between the building lines shown on the sale plan and the road. Provided always: (a) The vendors reserve the right as between themselves and any purchaser, and the owner or owners for the time being of any part of the estate at any time hereafter to alter, modify, release, or dispense with any of the stipulations aforesaid, and to lay out or deal with the estate or any lot or lots not sold in such manner as they, or any, or either of them shall think fit. (b) No purchaser shall be personally liable in respect of any breach or non-performance of any of these covenants occurring after he shall have parted with all ownership of his plot or plots. (c) The said covenant on the part of every purchaser shall be framed so as to give effect to clauses (a) and (b)."

None of the property offered for sale at the 1906 auction was sold on that occasion, but on Feb. 20, 1907, Frederick Betts, Edward Hall and Edward James Sole sold to Frederick Betts certain parts of the property which comprised lots 23, 24 and 25, and lots 45 to 51 inclusive at that auction. These lots were conveyed by two separate conveyances, each dated Feb. 20, 1907, and made between the said Frederick Betts, Edward Hall and Edward James Sole, of the one part, and the said Frederick Betts, of the other part. Each of these conveyances is in the same form. The habendum in each case is expressed to be "subject nevertheless to the obligations or liability aforesaid and to the covenants by the purchaser"—that is Mr. Frederick Betts—"hereinafter contained." The obligations or liability mentioned were or was in respect of the repair of Higher Drive and the maintenance of certain fences in that road. The covenants by the purchaser are in each case in these words:

> "The purchaser (but as to the stipulations set out in Part II of the second schedule hereto not so as to bind himself personally after he shall have parted with all ownership of the said hereditaments) doth hereby for himself his heirs and assigns covenant with the vendors their and each of their heirs executors administrators and assigns (owners for the time being of any of the lands now or formerly part of the vendors' estate of which the said hereditaments form part and so that every person for the time being entitled to any estate in any such lands shall have a right to the observance and fulfilment of the stipulations in Part II of the said second schedule so far as they relate to the said hereditaments hereinbefore expressed to be hereby granted) that the stipulations last aforesaid shall be observed so far as they relate to the hereditaments last aforesaid. . . . Provided nevertheless that as between the vendors and the purchaser and the owner or owners for the time being of any part of the said estate the vendors shall be at liberty at any time hereafter to alter, modify, release or dispense with any of the stipulations set out in Part II of the said second schedule hereto and to lay out or deal with the remainder (or any part thereof) of the said estate in such manner as they or any or either of them shall think fit."

The second part of the schedule contains stipulations similar to those set out in condition 14 of the conditions of sale. It is to be observed that the covenants contained in these conveyances were entered into by Mr. Frederick Betts, on the one hand, and Mr. Frederick Betts and the other two vendors on the other. A question, therefore, arises as to their validity. I propose to deal with this later.

On July 6, 1907, Edward Hall, Edward James Sole and Frederick Betts conveyed to the plaintiff, Eustace Ridley, a further part of the property offered for sale at the 1906 auction. The part so conveyed is described in the conveyance as

> "All that piece or parcel of land situate on the north-west side of the Burcott-road leading out of Higher Drive at Purley in the county of Surrey which said piece or parcel of land has a frontage on the south-east side thereof to the said Burcott-road of 60 feet and contains on the north-east and south-west sides thereof a depth of 170 feet, and measuring in width at the rear thereof 60 feet, and which is distant from the Higher Drive aforesaid about 210 feet computed from the south-east corner thereof which said hereditaments are more particularly described in the plan drawn on the second page of these presents and are thereon coloured pink and numbered lot 26 and part of 27."

The property in fact comprised lot 26 and also a part of lot 27 shown on the sale plan to which I have already referred. The plaintiff entered into a covenant in this form:

> "The purchaser hereby covenants with the vendors their and each of their heirs executors administrators and assigns owners for the time being of the lands now or formerly a part of the vendors' estate of which the hereditaments hereby conveyed form part and so that every person for the time being entitled to any estate in any such lands shall have a right to the observance and fulfilment of the stipulations hereinafter mentioned so far as they relate to his property or lot or lots that the > purchaser his heirs and assigns will henceforth perform and observe the stipulations mentioned in the first schedule hereto to the intent and so that the said stipulations shall be binding on the said lands and premises hereby assured into whosesoever hands the same may come but not so as to render the purchaser personally liable in damages for any breach thereof after he shall have parted with his interest in the premises." A

The first schedule contained stipulations similar to those set out in condition 14 of the conditions of sale, including the proviso reserving the right to the vendors to alter, modify, release or dispense with any of the said stipulations, and to lay out or deal with the estate or any lot or lots not sold in such manner as they or any or either of them should think fit.

Before this conveyance was executed, the plaintiff and his solicitors were informed C that Mr. Frederick Betts had purchased a part of the same estate, subject to the same restrictions as were to be imposed in respect of the land which the plaintiff was then purchasing. If the plaintiff and his advisers had inquired into the position, they would have ascertained, or ought to have ascertained, that a question arose as to the validity of this covenant.

After the conveyance to Mr. Frederick Betts, but before the execution of the con- D veyance in favour of the plaintiff, Messrs. Hall, Sole, and Betts executed a memorandum of deposit of title deeds in favour of the London and County Banking Company to secure the repayment of all moneys for the time being owing to the bank from the partnership of Messrs. Sole, Hall, and Betts. The documents deposited included the conveyances of May 27, 1902; May 4, 1903; and Feb. 10, 1904.

No further part of the property was sold until Dec. 24, 1908. On that date the E London and County Banking Co., with the concurrence of Messrs. Sole, Hall, and Betts, sold and conveyed to Messrs. Charles William Payne and Arthur Ingram a further part of the property offered for sale at the 1906 auction. The part of the property so conveyed comprised lots 9 to 22 inclusive, the remainder of lot 27 (being the part of that lot not sold to the plaintiff on July 6, 1907), and lots 28 to 40 inclusive at that auction. The conveyance to Messrs. Payne and Ingram was not made subject to any F stipulations or restrictions of any kind. It appears that before this conveyance was executed the property comprised in it, together with other property forming the rest of the property offered at the 1906 auction, was offered for sale by auction on Nov. 19, 1908, in three lots, and that the property conveyed by the conveyance of Dec. 24, 1908, formed lot 2 at that sale. No mention was made in the particulars or conditions of sale of any restrictions or stipulations affecting the property or any part of it, and the G conveyance of Dec. 24, 1908, is not expressed to be subject to any restrictions or stipulations, nor did Messrs. Payne and Ingram purport to enter into any covenants or stipulations restrictive of such user.

On May 6, 1909, the rest of the property offered for sale at the 1906 and 1908 auctions, then remaining unsold, was offered for sale by auction under an order of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, made in an action between Messrs. Sole and Hall H as plaintiffs against Frederick Betts as defendant. The property was offered in two lots without any restrictions or stipulations. It appears from a memorandum endorsed on the conveyance of Feb. 10, 1904, to which I have already referred, that that part of the property which formed lot 2 at the 1909 auction and lots 41 to 44 inclusive at the 1906 auction were sold and duly conveyed to Sir David Burnett in fee simple. I am informed that this conveyance was free from any restrictions or stipulations. On I Dec. 7, 1915, a small part of the land comprised in lot 23 at the 1906 auction was conveyed to the plaintiff by Mr. Betts and his then mortgagee. No mention is made in this conveyance of the restrictions sought to be imposed in respect of lots 23, 24, and 25 by the conveyance of Feb. 20, 1907. On Jan. 7, 1921, the remaining part of lot 23 was conveyed by Mr. Betts to Thomas Charles Mansfield. The habendum in this conveyance is expressed to be > to the indenture of conveyance dated Feb. 20, 1907, . . . , so far as the same are still subsisting and capable of affecting the premises" thereby assured. On Sept. 15, 1924, Mr. Betts conveyed to Percy Edward Ridley, the brother of the plaintiff, the land comprised in lot 24 at the 1906 auction, with a narrow strip facing part of and situate at the rear of the land comprised in lot 25 at the same auction. No reference is made in this conveyance to the restrictions and stipulations contained in the conveyance of Feb. 29, 1907, but, in answer to a requisition made on behalf of Mr. P. E. Ridley, before the conveyance, whether the stipulations and exceptions contained in the last-mentioned indenture had been observed, Mr. Betts' solicitors replied that they knew of no breach.

> "subject nevertheless to the stipulations and exceptions contained in the schedules

On Dec. 8, 1933, Mr. Betts agreed to sell the rest of the property comprised in lot 25 at the 1906 auction to the defendant, Henry William Lee. The agreement contained a statement that the property was or may have been formerly subject to certain stipulations as to building or otherwise, and provided:

> "The purchaser has notice thereof and shall not make any objection or requisition with regard thereto but the vendor guarantees that these stipulations have ceased to apply to the property sold and in the conveyance to the purchaser the land shall not be conveyed as subject to them."

In compliance with this provision the property was conveyed on Dec. 22, 1933, by Mr. Betts to the defendant without any reference to the stipulations or restrictions sought to be imposed by the conveyance of Feb. 20, 1907. Shortly after Dec. 22, 1933, the defendant lodged with the Coulsdon and Purley Urban District Council plans of four houses proposed to be erected on the land comprised in the conveyance of Dec. 22, 1933. Three of these houses were in course of erection at the date when the writ was issued, and the foundations of the fourth house were excavated or being excavated. The plaintiff issued the writ in this action on Jan. 20, 1934.

The first question to be determined is whether any building scheme was in existence when the plaintiff purchased the land comprised in and conveyed by the conveyance of July 6, 1907, and, if so, to what land does it relate. There can, I think, be no doubt but that at the time of the 1906 auction the then owners of the whole property laid it out with the intention of developing it as a building estate, subject to restrictions intended to be imposed on all the lots into which they proposed to divide it. The restrictions were consistent only with a general scheme of development, and I do not think that the fact that the vendors reserved a wide power to alter, modify, release or dispense with the restrictions is by itself sufficient to negative this view. Nothing, however, was sold at the 1906 auction.

Both the conveyances of Feb. 20, 1907, contain what purports to be covenants by Mr. Betts in accordance with the scheme enunciated in the 1906 particulars and conditions of sale. In form these conveyances were made upon the footing that the restrictions were entered into for the benefit of the other lots intended to be included in that scheme. The conveyance to the plaintiff on July 6, 1907, was made on the same footing, and, assuming that the covenants by Mr. Betts in the two conveyances were valid, it seems to me that Mr. Betts and those claiming under him as well as the plaintiff could in equity have enforced the restrictions in respect of the lands included in the conveyances, namely, lots 23, 24, 25, 26, and part of 27, and lots 45 to 51 inclusive, although the scheme was, under the general power reserved to the vendors, abandoned so far as the rest of the land was concerned.

A serious question, however, arises by reason of the fact that the covenants in the two conveyances of Feb. 20, 1907, were entered into by Mr. Betts with himself and two other persons. The covenants are in form with Messrs. Betts, Hall, and Sole jointly, and, although each of the covenantors had at that time a separate interest in the land retained, it is impossible to treat the covenants as joint and several, as it was suggested by counsel for the plaintiff could be done, on the authority of the decision in Withers v. Bircham (1), for a covenant with Messrs. Hall and Sole alone would not create the necessary mutual obligation binding upon the whole interest in the land conveyed and that retained.

A In my judgment, the covenants in the conveyances of Feb. 20, 1907, were void and unenforceable at the time they were entered into: (see Ellis v. Kerr (2)). It follows from this that there were no restrictive covenants in existence relating to any part of the land offered at the 1906 auction at the date when the plaintiff purchased lot 26 and part of lot 27, and, as no subsequent covenants were entered into, no building scheme ever came into existence.

B It is said, however, that any defect in the covenants entered into by Mr. Betts in 1907 has been cured by the provisions of s. 82 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. This section is as follows:

> "(1) Any covenant, whether express or implied, or agreement entered into by a person with himself and one or more other persons shall be construed and be capable of being enforced in like manner as if the covenant or agreement had been entered into with the other person or persons alone. (2) This section applies to covenants, or agreements entered into before or after the commencement of this Act, . . . but without prejudice to any order of the court made before such commencement." C

It was argued that the effect of this section is to constitute as from Jan. 1, 1926, a valid and enforceable building scheme in respect of lots 23, 24, 25, 26, and part of lot 27, and lots 45 to 51 inclusive, although such building scheme had in law no existence in July, 1907, or at any time between that date and Jan. 1, 1926. I am unable to accept this view. It may well be that, if Messrs. Hall and Sole were now seeking to enforce the covenants in the conveyances of Feb. 20, 1907, against Mr. Betts, they would be entitled to do so by reason of the express provisions of the section in question, and that to enable them to do so the covenant would be construed as having been entered into with them alone and not with them and Mr. Betts. But this is not such an action. As already pointed out, if the covenant had in the first instance been entered into between Mr. Betts, on the one hand, and Messrs. Hall and Sole, on the other, it would not have enured for the benefit of the whole of the interests in the land retained, because Messrs. Hall and Sole were only two out of three tenants in common, and covenants in such form would not have created that mutuality of obligation which is the essential ingredient for the enforcement of a building scheme by one purchaser from the common vendors against another purchaser from them: see Elliston v. Reacher (3). D E F

I am satisfied that there was no building scheme on July 6, 1907, affecting the property now vested in the defendant jointly with that belonging to the plaintiff, and that there is nothing in s. 82 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which compels me to hold that what was insufficient to create such a scheme in 1907 must by reason of that section be deemed from Jan. 1, 1926, to have constituted a building scheme as from the earlier date or from any intermediate date. G

In these circumstances I do not think it necessary to consider the conflicting evidence whether any and what damage might have been suffered by the plaintiff if I had held that there was in fact a building scheme binding the land of the plaintiff or defendant, or whether the plaintiff had by acquiescence or otherwise debarred himself from enforcing such scheme. H

In the result I dismiss the action and order the plaintiff to pay the defendant's costs.

Action dismissed.

Income Tax—Deduction in computing profits—Wear and tear—"Actual cost to the person by whom the trade is carried on"—Person receiving contribution to cost—Amount of deduction for wear and tear—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), Sched. D, Rules applicable to Cases I and II, r. 6 (6).

On April 19, 1920, an agreement was entered into by the B. Corporation with the D. Co. to lay a tramway to the works of the D. Co. on the terms that the D. Co. would pay the B. Corporation £10,000, and also £50 for each day prior to a stated date that the tramway service was in operation. The tramway was laid by the B. Corporation by direct labour at a cost of £54,752, and the D. Co. paid £10,806 to the B. Corporation. In 1922 the B. Corporation spent £271,399 on renewals of its tramway tracks, and received £46,238 from the Government Unemployment Grants Committee towards the cost.

In computing the profits of the B. Corporation in respect of their tramway undertakings, the question arose as to the allowance to be made for wear and tear in respect of the tramway tracks under the Income Tax Act, 1918, Sched. D, Rules applicable to Cases I and II, r. 6, i.e., whether the allowance should be based on the net cost to the B. Corporation after deducting the contributions from the D. Co. and the Government Unemployment Grants Committee, or whether such contributions should be ignored. It was common ground that the B. Corporation were entitled to an allowance on the footing that the tracks were new.

Held: the "actual cost" of the track to "the person by whom the trade is carried on" within r. 6 (6) was in each case the full amount without deduction of the contributions by the D. Co. and the Government Unemployment Grants Committee respectively, and, therefore, the aggregate amounts of the deductions allowable for wear and tear were £54,752 and £271,399.

Notes. The Income Tax Act, 1918, Sched. D, Rules applicable to Cases I and II, r. 6 (6), was replaced (as amended) by the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 288. See also s. 332 of the Act of 1952.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Slesser and Romer, L.JJ., Lord Hanworth, M.R., dissenting), reported [1934] 1 K.B. 484, on a Case stated under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149, by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice. The Case stated as follows:

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on Dec. 13, 1932, for the purpose of hearing appeals, the Corporation of Birmingham (hereinafter called "the corporation") appealed against assessments to income tax for the years ending April 5, 1931, and April 5, 1932, respectively, made upon it in respect of the profits of its tramway undertaking by the Additional Commissioners of Income Tax for the Division of Hemlingford under the provisions of the Income Tax Acts.

2. The sole question at issue on the appeal was the amount of the deductions to be allowed under r. 6 of the rules applicable to Cases I and II of Sched. D in respect of the A diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the respective years of the corporation's tramways tracks.

3. On April 19, 1920, the corporation entered into an agreement with the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd. to lay a tramway track and establish a tramway service between Salford Bridge, Erdington, and the company's works upon the terms that in view of the facilities which the tramway would give for the employees of the company to travel to B and from its works the company would pay the corporation the sum of £10,000 if the track was laid and a regular service established by June 1, 1920, and a further sum of £50 for each day the service was run prior to that date. The corporation fulfilled these requirements, and a sum of £10,806 was paid by the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd. The corporation laid the track by direct labour at a total cost of £54,752.

4. In the year ending March 31, 1922, the corporation spent £271,399 on renewals of C its tramway tracks, and received £46,238 from the Government Unemployment Grants Committee.

5. On Dec. 22, 1920, the Unemployment Grants Committee had issued a circular letter to county councils and other local authorities, drawing attention to an announcement made in Parliament that the Government had decided to provide a grant of £3,000,000 for the purpose of assisting local authorities to carry out at once works on D which a substantial number of the unemployed could be engaged. This letter described the conditions imposed upon or adopted by the committee to govern the distribution of the grant. These conditions were that works would be approved only in areas where the existence of serious unemployment which was not otherwise provided for was certified by the Ministry of Labour; that preference in employment must be given to unemployed ex-service men; that the grant must not in any case exceed 30 per cent. E of the wages bill of additional men taken on for work; that the works must be such as were approved by the appropriate department of the Government as suitable works of public utility; that the unemployed workmen taken on must remain on the registers of the employment exchanges and would be required to take other work at any time if the exchanges were in a position to offer them such work and that the actual working of the schemes and the accounts relating thereto should be open at any time to any inspection F required by the committee. Applications for a grant were invited, which were to be accompanied by a general description of the works to be undertaken; a statement of the estimated expenditure on the whole scheme, showing the cost of labour as a separate item; an estimate of the expenditure which would be incurred on labour during the next three months; an estimate of the average number of men likely to be continuously employed on the work during the next three months, or of the number of additional men G who would be taken on if a grant were made; information as to the manner in which the balance of the cost of the scheme would be defrayed, and the date when the scheme could be commenced or additional men taken on.

6. The corporation made applications to the Unemployment Grants Committee for assistance under the specified conditions and furnished the particulars required in regard to the works to be undertaken, and the committee assented to the grants. The schemes H in respect of which applications for assistance were made included, inter alia, works described as the reconstruction of tramway tracks in certain named roads, and in applying for the actual payment of the grants the proper officers of the corporation set out in the prescribed form the numbers of and payments made to workmen in respect of whose wages a claim was made, and certified that all workmen in respect of whose wages a claim was made had been taken through the agency of an employment exchange; that I the accounts and vouchers of the corporation relating to the work in question were available to be submitted to audit when required by the district auditor on behalf of the Unemployment Grants Committee; and that the payment of wages to workmen engaged for the work through the employment exchange had been duly made and accounted for as shown in the statement submitted.

7. As a matter of administrative convenience, the Board of Inland Revenue have from time to time agreed with representatives of local authorities and other persons working tramways schemes for the computation of the deductions to be allowed in

A respect of the wear and tear of the machinery and plant used for the purposes of such concerns. By para. 2 of a scheme adopted in 1922 it was provided that

> "From the date when the track, or any portion thereof, is or has been renewed, such renewal shall be recorded and dealt with as if it were a new track, and annual allowances shall be granted in respect thereof on the basis of the sum actually B expended and of the agreed life as provided in para. 3, provided that such allowances shall continue until the full cost has been allowed, notwithstanding that the said track or portion thereof may be again renewed before such aggregate cost has been allowed. This proviso shall apply also to expenditure on new track since 1908."

Paragraph 3 of the scheme dealt with the methods to be adopted in computing the life of the permanent way of a tramway undertaking. In the case of the corporation's C tramways the agreed life of the tracks has been taken as twelve years.

8. Between 1921 and 1926 several questions were under debate between the Board of Inland Revenue and various local authorities in regard to the manner in which grants from the Unemployment Grants Committee ought to be dealt with for the purposes of computing the liability to income tax of the authorities which had received them, and the determination of the amount of the deductions to be allowed to the corporation in D respect of the wear and tear of its plant was left in suspense. In October, 1926, the Special Commissioners heard an appeal by another local authority in which one of the questions at issue was whether the deduction to be allowed in respect of the diminished value of the permanent way of the authority's tramways by reason of wear and tear during the year under review ought to be based on the full value of the track or on the net cost to the authority of the relaying of the track after the deduction of the amount E of a grant received from the Unemployment Grants Committee towards the cost of the work. The commissioners who heard that appeal decided that they must fix the allowance under r. 6 on the value of the plant in question, irrespective of the fact that the cost of the plant was in part defrayed by some other person than the owner. In giving this decision they observed that the question of the actual cost to the appellant authority would become material in course of time when sub-r. (6) of the rule was F applied.

9. The principle of this decision was followed in settling the deductions allowed for wear and tear of the corporation's tramways tracks. A deduction at the rate of £4,563, or one-twelfth of the total cost of £54,752, was allowed for each of the years from 1921–22 to 1929–30 inclusive, in respect of the new track laid in 1920, and a deduction at the rate of £22,617, or one-twelfth of the total cost of £271,399 for each of the years from 1922–23 G to 1930–31 inclusive, in respect of the tracks renewed in 1921–22. These deductions amounted in the aggregate to £41,067 up to April 5, 1930, in respect of the new track laid in 1920, and to £203,553 up to April 5, 1931, in respect of the tracks renewed in 1921–22. The corporation, in making its returns for the purposes of assessment, claimed that similar deductions of £4,563, and £22,617 respectively should be allowed for each of the years 1930–31 and 1931–32. H.M. inspector of taxes, while admitting the claim H for a deduction of £22,617 for the year 1930–31 in respect of the tracks renewed in 1921–22 took the view that, in arriving at the actual cost of the tracks to the corporation, the amounts contributed by the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd., and the Unemployment Grants Committee respectively should be deducted from the total sums expended on the tracks; that the actual cost to the corporation of the new track laid in 1920 was £43,946 only, and the actual cost to the corporation of the tracks renewed in 1921–22 was I £225,161 only, and that consequently under sub-r. (6) of r. 6 of the deduction for wear and tear of the new track laid in 1920, should be restricted to the difference between £43,946 and £41,067, or £2,879 for the year 1930–31, and no allowance for wear and tear of that track should be made for the year 1931–32, and the deduction for wear and tear of the tracks renewed in 1921–22 should be restricted, for the year 1931–32, to the difference between £225,161 and £203,553 or £21,608. The Additional Commissioners of Income Tax, in making the assessments under appeal, restricted the deductions in accordance with the view taken by H.M. inspector of taxes, and disallowed the corporation's claims to the extent of £1,684 for 1930–31 and £5,572 for the year 1931–32.

10. In the corporation's accounts of its tramways department for the year ending March 31, 1921, the expenditure on permanent way during the year was entered in the capital account as £43,945 11s. 4d., and no mention was made of the sum of £10,806 received from the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd. In the accounts for the year ending March 31, 1922, the contributions from the Unemployment Grants Committee were credited to a separate renewals fund account, and the total expenditure of £271,399 on renewals of tracks was included in a sum debited to this account under the head permanent way reconstruction works. The renewals fund account showed a debit balance of £211,952 which was carried to the balance sheet.

11. Neither party sought to draw any distinction in principle between the payment received from the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd., and the grants received from the Unemployment Grants Committee.

12. It was contended on behalf of the corporation:

(a) That the actual cost to the corporation of the new track laid in 1920 was the total amount of £54,752 expended thereon.

(b) That the actual cost to the corporation of the tracks renewed in the year 1921–22 was the total amount of £271,399 expended thereon.

(c) That the whole of the amounts expended by the corporation in laying and renewing the tracks were moneys belonging to the corporation, and it was immaterial whether they were ultimately obtained by the corporation from contributions by other bodies, from loans, from rates, or from any other source.

(d) That the deductions allowed for wear and tear of the tracks in question did not amount in the aggregate to the actual cost thereof to the corporation.

(e) That the corporation was entitled to a deduction of £4,563 for each of the years of assessment in respect of the new track laid in 1920, and to a deduction of £22,617 for the year ending April 5, 1932, in respect of the tracks renewed in 1921–22 as claimed in its return.

13. It was contended on behalf of the Crown:

(a) That the sums received from the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd. and the Unemployment Grants Committee though passing through the hands of the corporation, were not at its free disposal, but were contributions by other bodies earmarked to the construction of the tracks on which they were required to be expended.

(b) That for the purpose of fixing the limitation of the amount of the deduction under r. 6 (6) regard was to be had not to the actual cost of the construction or renewal respectively of the tracks, but to the actual cost to the corporation of such construction or renewal.

(c) That in arriving at the amount of the actual cost to the corporation of such construction and (or) renewal the amount contributed by the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd. and the Unemployment Grants Committee towards the cost of such construction and (or) renewal fell to be taken into account and deducted from the said sums of £54,752 and £271,399 respectively.

(d) That the deductions allowed in the assessments when added to the deductions allowed for previous years, amounted in the aggregate to the actual cost of the tracks to the corporation.

(e) That the deductions had rightly been restricted to the amounts allowed in the assessments.

14. The commissioners who heard the appeals held that the actual cost of the tracks to the corporation was the net cost after deducting from the total amount expended on the construction of the tracks that part of the expenditure which was paid by the Unemployment Grants Committee and by the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd. They accordingly adopted the view that the deductions allowed amounted in the aggregate to the actual cost of the tracks to the corporation, and they rejected the appeal.

15. The corporation immediately after the determination of the appeal declared to the commissioners its dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law, and in due course required them to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149.

The Court of Appeal held, reversing the decision of FINLAY, J. (the MASTER OF THE ROLLS dissenting), that the actual cost to the corporation was the amounts paid for the work less the sums received from the company and committee. The Birmingham Corporation appealed.

March 8. LORD ATKIN.—The question in this case arises on the construction of a few words in one of the rules relating to the computation of income tax under Sched. D. It has evoked so far an equal division of judicial opinion, and no one therefore would be inclined to express his opinion as not admitting a doubt; but I have come to a conclusion which leads me to invite your Lordships to allow the appeal. The facts can be shortly stated. In 1920, the Birmingham Corporation laid a new tramway track between Salford Bridge, Erdington, and the works of the Dunlop Rubber Co., Ltd. They laid the track by direct employment of labour, and it cost for labour and materials £54,732. By agreement in writing between the Dunlop Company and the corporation dated April 19, 1920, the corporation agreed to construct the tramway, and the company agreed that if the corporation had completed the tramway and commenced a reasonable service on or before June 1, 1920, the company would pay the corporation £10,000, and a further sum of £50 a day for each day saved before June 1. £5,000 was paid on March 30, while the work was in progress, the balance, including £806 further dispatch money, was paid after the work was completed. There was no stipulation as to any express use to which the £10,000 was to be put, and so far as I can see the corporation were free to use it as they pleased. In fact, as was natural, they treated it as a receipt of the tramway undertaking, and their amount of expenditure on permanent way in the year 1920 shows a sum of £43,945 as being the total sum expended, being the actual sum less the payment made by the Dunlop Co.

In 1921 the corporation embarked on the reconstruction of certain tramway tracks, upon which they expended £271,399. In December, 1920, the Unemployment Grants Committee had intimated that the government had decided to provide a grant of £3,000,000 to assist local authorities to carry out works at which unemployed men could be engaged. The corporation applied for a grant in respect of the work on the tramway tracks just mentioned. The work began on Feb. 8, 1921; the application was made on Feb. 10. On Feb. 21, 1921, the Unemployment Grants Committee intimated that they were prepared to make a grant of £30,000 on certain conditions mentioned. From time to time further grants were applied for and were acceded to. Applications for payment of the promised grant were made on the appropriate forms, the substance of the matter being that the corporation certified that the stipulated number of unemployed men had been employed and that wages had been paid up to or in excess of the amount of the promised grant. Payments were made by the committee on these applications in respect of these tramway tracks to the amount of £46,238, thus reducing the amount actually borne by the corporation to £225,161.

The question that arises on these figures is as to the amount which the corporation is entitled to claim as an allowance for wear and tear in respect of these tramway tracks under r. 6 of the rules of Cases I and II of Sched. D of the Income Tax Act, 1918. I will not read the rules, but will premise that it is common ground that the corporation were entitled to an allowance for these tracks on the footing that they were new tracks. The allowance is claimed in computing the profits of the corporation in respect of their tramway undertaking.

In pursuance of r. 6 (1) an allowance has been made to the corporation year by year in accordance with a scheme adopted by the Board of Revenue in 1922 by agreement with representatives of the various local authorities possessing tramway undertakings. By this scheme allowances were granted "on the basis of the sum actually expended and of the agreed life" with a proviso that the allowances were to continue until the "full cost" had been allowed. The latter proviso was no doubt intended to give effect to sub-r. (6) of r. 6. It is not contended that this agreement can alter the true meaning of the rules: but it serves to illustrate the possible use of words the true construction

A of which has to be sought in the section. The life of the tramways under the agreement was computed at twelve years and each year the corporation received an allowance of £4,563 or one-twelfth of £54,732 in the case of the first tramway, and of £22,617, one-twelfth of £271,399, in the case of the second tramway. Apparently a question had arisen in 1926 before the commissioners as to the amount upon which an allowance should be made in the case of another local authority which had also received a grant. B The commissioners then decided that the grant must be based upon the total expenditure, leaving the question as to the limit of the aggregate to be determined when that question arose under sub-r. (6).

In the present case it arose in the case of the first tramway for the year 1930–31; in the case of the second tramway for the year 1931–32. The Inspector of Taxes claimed that "the actual cost to the corporation" must be measured by deducting C from the total expenditure in the first case the amount paid to the corporation by the Dunlop Co., in the second case the amount of the government grant. Added to the previous allowances the full allowances would make up for the years in question an aggregate in excess of the "actual cost" so ascertained. The question now is whether this meaning of "actual cost to the person" is correct. In my opinion the words "the actual cost to the person by whom the trade is carried on" used in this context D have no relation to the source from which that person has received the money which he has expended on the plant. One is assisted in the construction by the history of the legislation. In 1876 for the first time statutory authority was given for making an allowance to persons carrying on a trade in respect of diminution in value of their plant by reason of wear and tear. It was a deduction from profits which business men ordinarily make with a view of making good an essential capital asset which sooner E or later will have to be replaced. As it was given, in terms corresponding to sub-rr. (1) and (2), it had obviously nothing to do with the question how or with what funds the business man acquired the plant. In any case he would make a deduction from profits; and the deduction would be based on the value of the plant and its expected life. In 1906, however, there arose a case before WALTON, J., of John Hall Junior & Co. v. Rickman (1) in which a shipowner claimed depreciation allowance in respect of a ship F which being used as a hulk was held to be plant. The allowances had continued so long in respect of this ship that if granted for the tax year in question they would have exceeded 100 per cent. of the cost of the ship to the shipowner. The Inland Revenue authorities objected, but the judge, though thinking the objection reasonable, could find in the Income Tax Act no restriction on the aggregate of the allowances to be granted. He pointed out, as is conceded, that if the plant were sold the allowances G would begin again on the value of the plant to the new owner. After this decision, and undoubtedly in consequence of it, there was passed in 1907 a section in the terms of the present sub-r. (6). I entirely agree with the submission of the Attorney-General that you must not restrict the plain words of a remedial section so as to apply them only to the mischief which occasioned the enactment. But you may look at the mischief as one of the elements assisting you to construe the words of the remedy. You may also H look at the use of the same words in relation to the same subject-matter in the same enactment.

The word "actual" itself gives me no assistance. It serves, as Mr. Latter suggested, to give emphasis to the word following. It is to be the cost, the whole cost, and nothing but the cost. It removes any question of estimate, and in cases where the plant has been purchased for a lump sum, together with factory premises, it may give rise to a I difficult question of fact. The word "actual" is used in the same emphatic sense in r. 3 in respect of actual wages, actual expenditure, and actual loss. I do not read actual cost to mean anything more than cost accurately ascertained.

But it is said that the words "to the person" in the phrase "actual cost to the person" plainly indicate that the section is intending to confine the relief to an aggregate equal to the sum of money which the person has defrayed out of his own resources, the cost of which burden has ultimately fallen upon him. I confess I do not think that this is the natural meaning of the words. What a man pays for construction or for the purchase of a work seems to me to be the cost to him; and that whether someone has given him the money to construct or purchase for himself; or before the event has promised to give him the money after he has paid for the work; or after the event has promised or given the money which recoups him what he has spent. In the present case the corporation paid the whole of the cost of the tramways out of their funds unless the first half of the Dunlop contribution was so applied; as to which there is no evidence; nor is it material. I myself should not have thought the answer of Birmingham to the question put by ROMER, L.J., would have been what he suggests. On the hypothesis that the Dunlop Co. had recouped the corporation the whole of the cost of the first tramway I should have thought the answer to "what did it cost you?" or "what did it actually cost you?" would have been "it actually cost us £54,732, but none of the burden of that cost will fall on the corporation for the Dunlop Co. have paid us the full amount." I think the same result is arrived at by saying actual cost to the person is the same thing as the amount expended by the person. One is assisted in this construction by consideration of the words at the end of sub-s. (b) which, as pointed out by Mr. Blanco White, include in the actual cost any expenditure in the nature of capital expenditure. Here there are no qualifying words, and I think the phrase guides one to the conclusion that expenditure on capital improvements by the person regardless of source will be the same as actual cost to the person also regardless of source. No doubt you must give the whole phrase its full meaning. But I find the reference "to the person" fully satisfied when I remember that as pointed out by WALTON, J., in the case that gave rise to the new limitation the person claiming a reduction may vary from time to time, and that with each successive purchaser you are to begin again. The words also serve to make it clear that the cost is the cost to the person carrying on the business and will include a profit paid by him to a contractor if one has been employed.

I do not think that it is necessary for the purpose of this case to discuss the question which may arise where the person carrying on the business has acquired the plant by gift, a question that will arise probably if at all in respect of a gift under a will. Various problems arise involving amongst others the possible contention that where there has been no cost there is no measure, no yardstick, by which to restrict at all the allowance granted by sub-r. (1). I prefer, therefore, to say nothing on this topic. I find myself in the result in agreement with LORD HANWORTH, M.R., and FINLAY, J., and I move your Lordships that this appeal be allowed and the order of FINLAY, J., restored, and that the appellants have the costs here and in the Court of Appeal.

LORD TOMLIN.—I agree in all respects with the opinion which has just been delivered, and I have nothing to add.

LORD RUSSELL.—I also agree.

LORD MACMILLAN.—I also agree.

LORD WRIGHT.—I agree.

LONDON CORPORATION v. LYONS, SON & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Romer and Maugham, L.JJ.), May 30, 31, June 3, July 17, 1935]

Market—Auctioneer—Right to sell customer's goods in market—Right to sell outside market if entry refused.

There is a duty on the grantee of a market franchise to provide accommodation for members of the public who desire access to the market for the legitimate purpose of selling within it, and that is so whether the member of the public is a person wishing to enter the market for the purpose of taking thither and offering for sale and selling his own goods or is an auctioneer who seeks to sell by auction goods entrusted to him by other persons for such sale. Should the grantee fail in his duty, any member of the public who, by reason of such failure, is prevented from selling his goods in the market is entitled to sell them outside the market in circumstances which would otherwise constitute a disturbance of the grantee's franchise rights in the market and give the grantee a right of action against him. The owner of goods who desires to sell them in a market is entitled to sell them in any way that may prove to be the most effective and convenient way, by auction as well as by private treaty. An auctioneer has a special property in the goods entrusted to him for sale, and in respect of that property he has as good a right to use the market as is possessed by the owner of the goods.

Per MAUGHAM, L.J.: To establish the fact that a rival market is being levied it is necessary to show that the defendant is providing facilities for a concourse of buyers and sellers of goods ordinarily dealt with in the plaintiff's market so that there is a probability of the plaintiff being deprived of tolls, stallages, or other profits or emoluments appertaining to the market. There must be an element of rivalry in the case. The mere fact that the defendants cause to assemble a certain concourse of buyers at certain hours does not itself create a rival market.

Action for injunction to restrain the defendants from "disturbing" the plaintiffs' market at Spitalfields, in the city of London, by holding auction sales on their premises or from describing their premises as "within" the market. The defendants counterclaimed for a declaration that they were entitled to sell by auction within the market, D of which, they said, their premises formed a part.

LUXMOORE, J., held that the defendants were entitled, in common with all other persons, firms, and companies desiring to sell fruit, vegetables, and other like commodities within Spitalfields market, to conduct sales by auction within the market on payment of the customary tolls and subject to such byelaws as might from time to time be made by the plaintiff corporation for the conduct of the market, and that the premises E occupied by the defendants in Steward-street were not within the market.

The plaintiff corporation appealed against the first of these findings.

Cur. adv. vult.

F July 17. The following judgments were read.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This action was brought by the plaintiffs to secure protection to them in the maintenance of their rights and privileges as owners of Spitalfields market. The charge against the defendants is that they have held at Nos. 36 and 37, Steward-street, a street on the west side of the market, auctions of fruit, vegetables G and produce similar to those sold in the market and have thereby (a) levied a rival market, or (b) caused a disturbance of the rights and privileges of the plaintiffs in the maintenance of their market.

The defendant company admits that it has held sales by auction of fruit, vegetables, and other produce similar to those sold in the market at 36 and 37, Steward-street, and that it intends to continue this business. It contends that the premises on which their H auctions are conducted are within Spitalfields market, and thus that it is entitled to do what others do, or have done, in the market; or, alternatively, if the said premises are not within the market, it is justified in its actions, because the corporation has refused to allow it the necessary facilities for selling by auction within the market. The defendant company deny that they have levied a rival market, or have caused a disturbance of the rights and privileges of the plaintiffs. The company counterclaims for a declara- I tion that it is entitled to sell its goods by auction within the market upon payment of the reasonable and customary tolls.

The learned judge upon the material before him held that the part of 36 and 37, Steward-street which is occupied and used by the defendant company is not within the Spitalfields market, and from this conclusion there is no appeal. He also made a declaration that the defendant company are entitled in common with all other persons, firms, and companies desiring to sell fruit, vegetables, and the like, within Spitalfields market, to conduct sales by auction within the market upon payment of the customary tolls and subject to any such byelaws as may from time to time be made by the plaintiffs.

There was little dispute upon the facts of the case, and the learned judge recalled the principle that the question whether a rival market has been levied, or not, is necessarily a question of fact, and he stated his several conclusions that are relevant to the issues raised. It will, therefore, be useful to re-state the findings of the learned judge before considering the points to be decided upon the appeal.

The history of the market, for practical purposes, may be said to begin with the grant of the right to hold the market now known as Spitalfields market by King Charles II by letters patent dated July 29, 1682, to Balch and his heirs and assigns. That grant has been established as valid by the decision of the House of Lords in Great Eastern Rail. Co. v. Goldsmid (1). The rights thus granted are now vested in the plaintiffs. The market is now held on all days of the week upon an area which does not include 36 and 37, Steward-street. The main market, which the judge interprets to mean the original market, and the western extension of it, comprises sixty-eight shops or warehouses let to fifty different tenants and 188 stands let to 114 different tenants. He finds that "apart from the stands there is no space in the main market, or in the streets or buildings surrounding it, upon which members of the public desiring to sell fruit, vegetables or other commodities can expose their wares for sale." He states that the evidence satisfied him that auction sales both in the original market, and after the western extension was completed, in the main market, were held at least from 1897 onwards till the war of 1914–18, and were re-started again when the corporation had acquired control of the market, that is, on June 7, 1920. The earlier auction sales took place during the period when Robert Horner was conducting the market in that part of the original market which was occupied by stands, and were held once or twice a week between the month of September and the following April. They were held in spaces allotted for the purpose by Horner, and at times when the business in the market was slack, generally at about two o'clock in the afternoon.

Then comes an important finding of fact:

> "There was no difficulty in obtaining facilities for holding an auction, and no inconvenience was apparently caused to any one by the holding of these auctions. After the corporation took over the conduct of the market the same practice was followed. A trader desirous of holding an auction advertised the fact, and on the morning on which the auction was to be held the superintendent of the market allotted a space for it. Shortly before the auction took place a bell was rung by an official of the corporation to warn the persons in the market that the auction was about to take place. I am satisfied that no inconvenience was caused by any of these auctions."

The learned judge expressly says that he preferred the evidence given by the witnesses who were called by the defendant company on the question whether the auctions had become objectionable. After 1924 the auction sales were held in several different premises belonging to the corporation outside the main market, and caused no inconvenience to any one engaged in selling their goods in the original or in the main market. The judge states that the last sale by auction before the opening of the London Fruit Exchange took place on July 30, 1929. After that date the corporation has declined to allow any facilities for sales by auction to any person, company, or firm, other than those constituting, or interested in, the London Fruit Exchange Brokers' Association, Ltd.

The judge finds upon the evidence that there would be no difficulty in holding sales by auction in the market in exactly the same way as such sales were held before the London Fruit Exchange was built; and also that the corporation could properly assent to such sales taking place, so far as the defendant company is concerned, on the premises 36 and 37, Steward-street. He says:

> "I am satisfied that the refusal of the corporation to allow the defendant company to sell by auction is not due to any present want of accommodation or to any real apprehension of inconvenience within the market, but to a desire to give effect to the original understanding that the lessees of the London Fruit Exchange should have the sole right of selling by auction within the market."

He rejects evidence as to want of accommodation and the likelihood of inconvenience.

These findings of fact appear to be of primary importance. They were reached after a trial which was heard on ten days in March and April, 1934, and the learned judge gave his judgment after deliberation on Nov. 30, 1934.

They appear to me to connote this, namely, that: (a) The circumstances in which the auctions conducted by the defendant company were held must be examined in order to determine whether their purpose was to assert a right independent of and as a challenge to the plaintiffs' rights. (b) The holding of an auction on premises outside the main market ought not, under the circumstances of the case, per se to be treated as the levying of a rival market. (c) The assent of the corporation could have been given to the auction sales conducted by the defendant company on their premises at 36 and 37, Steward-street. (d) Such consent was withheld, not because of the likelihood of any inconvenience being caused, but for an ulterior motive, namely, in order to give effect to the original understanding that the lessees of the London Fruit Exchange should be protected in an exclusive right of selling by auction within the market. That understanding was expressed in the letter, dated June 20, 1930, addressed to the secretary of the London Fruit Exchange Brokers' Association as follows:

> "The corporation will be vigilant to see that their market rights as owners of Spitalfields market or otherwise are not infringed, and it is obvious that the special position of your association as lessees under the proposed lease will then be substantially safeguarded."

(e) Consequently, the action of the defendant company in selling by auction at 36 and 37, Steward-street was not to be attributed to setting up a rival market against, or as a challenge, to the plaintiffs' rights of market. The defendant company are ready and willing to pay the reasonable customary market tolls. It is admitted that the company tendered certain tolls which were refused by the plaintiffs. The defendant company have paid into court a sum to represent the tolls due from them. (f) Following the Islington Market Bill Case (2) (3 Cl. & F. at pp. 518 and 519), a good defence to an action for setting up a rival market, or for disturbance of a market, may be founded upon a plea of want of accommodation. (g) The action of the defendant company in selling by auction where they do was to be attributed to the refusal of the plaintiffs to afford them accommodation within the market, as they could do if so minded. That accommodation would enable the defendant company to carry on auction sales in the manner usual down to July 30, 1929, but now refused; not for any reason directly arising from the want of space in the market, but for the reasons, and with the purpose, already referred to. (h) This conduct of the plaintiffs was not adopted by the plaintiffs in the exercise of their consideration for the public attending the market, whether as vendors or purchasers.

In my judgment, there was abundant evidence upon which the judge could come to those conclusions of fact, and the inferences which he drew from them were also justified. It seems, therefore, that the question of law which remains for decision is whether the defendant company, when it was refused facilities for holding its auctions within the market, was justified in taking the course it did in holding auctions upon premises outside the market, or whether this conduct must be taken to amount to a disturbance of the market rights of the plaintiffs.

Prince v. Lewis (3) was decided in 1826. It was held that the lord of the market could not maintain an action against an individual for selling vegetables, in the neighbourhood of his market, where the space reserved for the market had been diminished by being appropriated to purposes other than those specified in the grant, and the remaining part of the market had become insufficient for the accommodation of the public. As BAYLEY, J., said (5 B. & C. at p. 371):

> "Whenever there is the franchise of a market, the lord has certain rights; but he has also certain duties to perform towards the public in respect of those rights. One of those duties toward the public is that the lord shall, as far as the limits of the market will allow of, take care that there is sufficient room for all the purposes of the market."

In Mosley v. Walker (4), where a man had a stall in the market which he might have occupied, but sold goods in a house adjoining the market, it was held, from the state of the market place, that the defendant had a reasonable cause for selling in the private house and not in the market.

> "It is always a question of fact whether there has been in the particular instance such an exclusion or not, and such an appropriation of a particular place"

(see Bayley, J., 7 B. & C. at p. 54). So far then as it is a question of fact, the learned judge has in his findings or conclusions (d), (e), and (g) held in favour of the defendant company.

Price v. Lewis (3) and Mosley v. Walker (4) were cited with approval by the learned judges in giving their answer to questions propounded to them by the House of Lords in the Islington Market Case (2), Littledale, J., on behalf of the judges' unanimous opinion, stated the law as follows (3 Cl. & F. at p. 518):

> "An obligation is cast upon (the grantee) by his acceptance of the grant to provide convenient accommodation for all who are ready to buy and sell in the public market. If he does not do so, or if after having once appropriated a particular site for the use of the public to a market place, he afterwards employs or permits it, or part of it, to be employed for other purposes, without providing as convenient a place for the public to buy and sell in elsewhere within the limits of his grant, the consequence would be first that there would be a good defence to an action brought by the grantee of the franchise against any persons for selling out of the market to the prejudice of his right, provided such person had been prevented from selling in the market by the want of convenient room."

The principle contained in these passages cited is clear. There is a duty on the grantee of a market franchise towards members of the public who desire access to the market for the legitimate purpose of selling within it. The grantee must not neglect this duty and attempt to justify his neglect by saying there is no sufficient space within the market for the applicant to have facilities for selling within it, and upon this point the grantee cannot rely upon the allocation of some of the space to other purposes than those which are appropriate to the proper user of the franchise. The grantee cannot charge a defendant with setting up a rival market or disturbing his market when the action of the defendant is due to the grantee's arbitrary conduct without due consideration of his duty to a member of the public.

Some passages in the speech of Lord Blackburn in Great Eastern Railway v. Goldsmid (1) were cited by counsel for the plaintiffs in support of his argument, in which, no doubt, that learned lord emphasised the principle that a person who holds the franchise of a market can maintain an action against one who sets up a rival market, or disturbs his market, so as to injure him, and whether it did so or not was a matter of evidence: "The question whether it did actually injure him or not being a matter of fact" (9 App. Cas. at p. 958).

It is true that it is not necessary for the owner of the franchise, who seeks protection, to prove actual damage: see Dorchester Corpn. v. Ensor (5) (L.R. 4 Exch. at p. 343); Yard v. Ford (6) (2 Saund. at p. 174); Morpeth Corpn. v. Northumberland Farmers Auction Mart Co. and Donkin, Ltd. (7). Lord Blackburn also points out (ibid.) that in an action by the lord to obtain protection for his market, an averment that the plaintiff has provided sufficient stalls in the market is not necessary; or that he had kept the market open in such a way that persons might enter into it (see 9 App. Cas. at p. 960); and Lord Selborne said that mere insufficiency of accommodation, although it might affect the quantum of damages,

> "yet that cannot possibly be an answer justifying an infringement of the market right."

But upon the point that I am dealing with, whether a defendant who has been arbitrarily refused facilities in the market can justify selling outside it, Lord Blackburn says (9 App. Cas. at p. 961):

> "If you read carefully what Littledale, J., giving the opinion of himself and Parke, B., says, it is impossible not to perceive that they did not consider that in Prince v. Lewis (3), the fact that the plaintiff did not maintain the market in good and sufficient order was a bar to an action such as this for disturbing the market, or even to an action against an individual for disturbance; but only that if it was the fact that it did prevent a person from using the market, that might disprove the allegation that he had disturbed the market by selling as he did, inasmuch as he could not have sold in the market but was prevented from doing so. That is what they pointedly say, and that I think no one would quarrel with."

But then it is argued that, although a trader may claim facilities for selling his goods within a market, it is quite otherwise when the claim is made by an auctioneer to carry on the business of auctioneering within the market such goods as all and sundry may place in his hands to sell by auction, of which he is not the grower or the owner. This objection needs consideration. It is not concluded by the previous practice that obtained down to July, 1930. It must be recognised that business is now carried on in a market in ways manifoldly different from the days of Edward III when the market originated or in the days of Charles II when the grant was made to Balch. The quantum of produce to be dealt with has reached proportions unknown in simpler days.

Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, in Elwes v. Payne (8) (12 Ch. D. at p. 473), states his opinion in clear terms that selling cattle by auction amounts in certain circumstances to establishing a rival market.

> "I do not think that any possible definition of the word 'market' would exclude what the defendants are doing. They are inviting the public to send their cattle, their horses, and their sheep, and other animals for sale to this place which they have built as a place of sale for cattle and horses. They invite people to come in and buy the cattle. It makes no difference, in my opinion, whether there is a sole seller, or a sole stall-keeper. In fact, in many ancient markets you could only sell before the clerk of the market or other officer of that kind. It was necessary to do that in order to make a valid sale at all, and therefore the mere fact that all the sales are to take place before one individual does not appear to me to make any difference."

These observations of the learned Master of the Rolls arose from considering the activities of an auctioneer from a point of view different from that which is under discussion; but they clearly indicate that in his view auctioneering was what may be called a market operation, and not a method of dealing in goods which is alien to the carrying on of a market.

It is an insufficient statement of the position and duties of an auctioneer to say that he is a mere seller of goods not his own, for other owners of them. He has a possession coupled with an interest in goods which he is employed to sell, not a bare custody like a servant or shopman: see per Lord Loughborough in Williams v. Millington (9) (1 Hy. Bl. at p. 84). He has a special property with a lien for the charges of the sale, the commission, and the auction duty which he is bound to pay. He must receive payment. If he gives credit to the purchaser it is at his own risk. He may maintain an action for goods sold and delivered against a buyer, and he can maintain trespass or trover against persons wrongfully interfering with or converting the goods (ibid.), and see Consolidated Co. v. Curtis & Son (10). He has power also to sign a sufficient memorandum under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 4: see McManus v. Fortescue (11) ([1907] 2 K.B. at p. 4).

A consideration of these features and duties of an auctioneer's work leads me to the conclusion that he can claim rightly to be admitted to a market to exercise his calling as much as the growers and owners who enter it to sell their own goods to purchasers attending it.

In Nicholls v. Tavistock Urban Council (12), my brother Romer, sitting as a judge of first instance, held that a person who was by the common law entitled to access to a market for the purpose of selling his goods by auction without any restriction whatever being placed upon his user of it was not liable to have this right curtailed, even though the restriction imposed by the byelaw was only to require the consent of a superintendent officer to the manner in which, and persons by whom, the auction should be conducted. One of the plaintiffs in that action was an auctioneer who was to sell the cattle of, and for, the other plaintiff. Romer, J., held the byelaw invalid as repugnant to the laws of that part of the land in which the market was situated, and he decided that the defendant council were not entitled to prevent the one plaintiff, who was the farmer and owner, or the other plaintiff, the auctioneer, from selling their cattle in the market by public auction, or to impose the limitations intended by the byelaw. In my judgment, this decision was right. It goes far to establish that an auctioneer as such has the right of access to and user of a market, and from this case and the other considerations that I have also advanced, I think that no objection or exception is to be taken to the defendants who are and intend to act as auctioneers, and have been excluded from the market, not from direct, but from ulterior motives by the plaintiffs.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of Luxmoore, J., was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—This appeal raises a question of market law that is one both of novelty and difficulty. It can, as I see it, be stated in the following way. Every member of the public has a right of access to Spitalfields market for the purpose of selling such goods as are commonly dealt with there. The market is not one limited by metes and bounds, and the plaintiffs as the owners of the market are under an obligation to provide accommodation for the public for that purpose. Should they fail to do so, any member of the public who, by reason of such failure, is prevented from selling his goods in the market is entitled to sell them outside the market in circumstances that would otherwise constitute a disturbance of the plaintiffs' franchise rights in the market and that, but for such failure, would give the plaintiffs a right of action against him. The plaintiffs' failure to provide adequate accommodation in the market would, in other words, be a good defence to any action instituted by them for such disturbance. All this is settled law: see Prince v. Lewis (3); Mosley v. Walker (4); and the Islington Market Bill Case (2).

At the time when these propositions of law were first established it is probable that the ordinary method of sale was by private treaty, and that sales by public auction were rare, even if they were not unknown. But the owner of goods who desires to sell them in a market must be entitled to sell them in any way that, having regard to the changing habits of the times, may prove to be the most effective and convenient way, and the propositions of law would seem to be as applicable to sales by auction as to sales by private treaty. I so held in Nicholls v. Tavistock U.D.C. (12), and I see no reason for altering the opinion that I expressed in that case.

The question to be determined on this appeal is, however, a somewhat different one. It is the question whether those propositions of law apply to a person who desires to sell, not his own goods, but goods of others entrusted to him for that purpose.

In the Tavistock Case (12) to which I have just referred, the right of an auctioneer to sell by auction in a market goods entrusted to him by others for sale in that manner was upheld by me. There were two plaintiffs in the action, one of them was a farmer and the other an auctioneer. The farmer sought to establish the right of having his cattle sold in the market by the auctioneer, and the auctioneer sought to establish his right to sell cattle by auction on behalf of his co-plaintiff or any other person who might think fit to employ him for that purpose. The owners of the market denied that either the farmer or the auctioneer had any such right, relying upon a byelaw made by their predecessor in title, which purported to prohibit sales by auction by any person whoever he might be without the consent therein mentioned. The defendants did not contend that in the absence of the byelaw sales by auction were illegal. The only question, therefore, that I had to decide was whether this byelaw was valid. The defendants do not appear to have suggested that in this respect the case of the auctioneer differed in any way from that of the farmer. Nor, indeed, was it material to do so. For the byelaw was indivisible, and if it was bad as regards the farmer it was bad altogether. But in the course of my judgment I appear to have said this:

"I have, therefore, to consider whether that byelaw is valid or invalid. If it be > invalid, then, as I understand the law, the plaintiff and Mr. Callaway can attend at the cattle market and other parts of the market at which cattle may be sold and dispose of cattle by auction, except in those parts of the cattle market which may have been validly leased for the purposes of sales by auction to the auctioneer-lessees exclusively."

If this be right, and further reflection has not made me think that it is not, the defendants have a right of access to Spitalfields market for the purpose of selling by auction marketable goods entrusted to them for sale, and the plaintiffs are under an obligation to provide them with accommodation necessary to enable the sales to take place. As was said by Lord Loughborough in the case of Williams v. Millington (9) to which the Master of the Rolls has referred, an auctioneer has a special property in the goods entrusted to him for sale, and in respect of that property I see no reason why he should not have as good a right to use the market as is possessed by the owner of the goods. But the question still remains to be decided whether the refusal by the plaintiffs to provide such accommodation justifies the defendant company in conducting such sales outside the market.

The considerations relevant to the decision of this question are as follows. In the Islington Market Case (2), Littledale, J., in delivering the opinion of the judges, called in to advise the House of Lords on the second occasion, enumerated the consequences that ensue upon the failure of the owner of a franchise market to fulfil his duty of providing convenient accommodation for those entitled to use it. One consequence is that there would be a good defence to an action brought by the owner against any person for selling out of the market to the prejudice of his rights. A second consequence is that the breach of duty, if persisted in, might furnish a ground for a scire facias to repeal the patent by which the market was granted. Thirdly, it is possible that the breach of duty might render the owner liable to an indictment. But these, said the learned judge, are the only consequences of the breach of duty. It cannot operate in point of law as a ground for granting a new charter to another to hold a market within the common law distance. If the breach of duty does not enable the Crown to grant such a charter, a fortiori it will not enable a member of the public to act as though such a charter had been granted to him. It may be observed that the plaintiffs in this respect are also protected by the charter of Edward III, which has statutory effect. In these circumstances the question to be determined is whether the defendants in the present case can properly be said to be levying a rival market. As to this the plaintiffs place reliance upon certain authorities that must be considered.

In Dorchester Corpn. v. Ensor (5), the plaintiffs as owners of an ancient market complained that the defendant was creating a disturbance of the market by conducting sales by auction of marketable chattels in a field adjoining a market. In giving judgment Channell, B., said this:

> "Now the evidence showed that the defendant Ensor was an auctioneer, who at one time sold cattle by auction, under the authority of the corporation, at their market, but that latterly he had held, at another place close by, a fortnightly sale of cattle by auction, which appeared to have been regularly advertised. There can be no question that this is substantially another market, and that it differs very much from the case of a man selling his own goods out of the market, which may or may not be a wrongful disturbance, according to the circumstances. The cases, therefore, as to the right of persons in some boroughs, where there is an ancient market to sell marketable goods on their own premises and the like, do not, we think, apply; because what is complained of is, not that the defendants sell their own goods, but that they provide a means for others to sell their goods without bringing them to the market."

Much to the same effect are the observations made by Sir George Jessel, the Master of the Rolls, in Elwes v. Payne (8).

In neither of these cases, however, did the court have to determine whether the defendant could justify his acts on the ground that the owner of the market had failed in his duty of providing adequate accommodation. In both cases the question was whether the defendant's acts constituted a disturbance of the plaintiff's market, and the description of those acts as being, or being substantially, the levying of a rival market may well have been used for the purpose of emphasising how widely those acts differed from ordinary sales of marketable goods at a shop outside the market, sales which do not as a rule amount to a disturbance of the market. It may well be that in both cases the defendant was in fact behaving, or threatening to behave, as though he possessed a franchise of market, but I cannot regard the cases as authorities for the proposition that every auctioneer selling goods by auction is necessarily so behaving. In Wilcox v. Steel (13), the acts of the defendant were also described both by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and ROMER, L.JJ., as the setting up of a rival market, but the defendant had done no more than sell by auction in a place adjoining the plaintiff's market a number of cobs, ponies and colts consigned to him by a Welsh breeder of such animals. He had, indeed, caused a disturbance of the plaintiff's market by acts that differed widely from an isolated sale in a shop—as was pointed out by ROMER, L.J.; but those acts bore little resemblance to the acts of a man who possesses a charter market, and, as I read the Islington Market Case (2), it is only acts of that character that cannot be justified by a breach of duty on the part of the market owner.

It may not always be easy to say in any particular case whether a person is committing acts of that character, but, in my judgment, the defendants in the present case are not doing so. They sell by auction fruit entrusted to them for that purpose by two persons only. They do not seek to attract to their auction rooms fruit sellers in general. There is no concourse of sellers in their auction rooms. The notices of their sales expressly state that buyers only will be admitted, or that goods are being offered to wholesale buyers only. "A market," said CHATTERTON, V.-C., in Downshire v. O'Brien (14) (19 L.R. Ir. at p. 390),

> "is, properly speaking, the franchise right of having a concourse of buyers and sellers to dispose of commodities in respect of which the franchise is given."

It is admitted that the defendants are willing to pay to the plaintiffs tolls in respect of the goods they sell, and I cannot think that what they are doing can truly be said to resemble the acts of an owner of a franchise market. This was the conclusion at which LUXMOORE, J., arrived, after hearing the evidence, and in my opinion his conclusion was right.

The appeal, in my judgment, fails and must be dismissed.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—By this appeal on behalf of the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the city of London, plaintiffs in the action, an injunction is sought perpetually to restrain the defendants, who are fruit brokers, from holding sales by auction of fruit, vegetables, or other like commodities in or upon their premises Nos. 36 and 37, Steward-street, in the city of London, and from establishing or carrying on any market for fruit or vegetables upon the said premises and from using, or permitting to be used, such premises or any other premises in such manner as to disturb or interfere with or prejudicially affect any of the rights or privileges of the plaintiffs in or in respect of the market known as Spitalfields market. This is the main subject of the appeal, but the plaintiffs also sought to have discharged a declaration made by the learned judge upon the counterclaim that the defendants, in common with all other persons, firms and companies desiring to sell fruit, vegetables, and other like commodities within Spitalfields market, are entitled to conduct sales by auction within the market upon payment of the customary tolls and subject to any such byelaws as may from time to time be made by the plaintiffs for the conduct of the market. The declaration was made without prejudice to the rights conferred by the plaintiffs on their lessees and on the respective tenants of stalls, warehouses, and other premises within the limits of the market. Having regard to the careful and accurate statement of the title and the facts by LUXMOORE, J., and to the summary of the facts by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, which I have had the advantage of reading, it does not seem to me necessary to do more than state some of the basic facts on which the fate of the appeal must depend.

I will content myself with saying that the right to hold the market known as Spitalfields market was granted by King Charles II, by letters patent dated July 29, 1682, to one Balch, his heirs and assigns. The validity of the grant was finally established by a decision of the House of Lords in Great Eastern Rail. Co. v. Goldsmid (1). The franchise included the right to keep two general markets in every week, the first on Thursday and the other on Saturday, in or near (in sive juxta) a certain place called the Spittle Square in the parish of Stepney, together with all tolls, tolns, piccage, stallage, and other profits advantages and emoluments whatsoever, to such markets in any wise belonging, appertaining, issuing or arising or with the same usually had and enjoyed. The House of Lords held in another case, A.-G. v. Horner (15), that the market granted by the letters patent was not a market limited by metes and bounds and that the grant permitted the extension of the market beyond Spittle Square into the surrounding area if the market owners thought fit and had the means of so doing.

The franchise of market and the freehold lands forming the then site of the market were transferred to the use of the plaintiffs, the corporation, in fee simple by a conveyance dated May 8, 1902. Four private Acts of Parliament have been passed with reference to the market. The first which I think it necessary to refer to is the City of London (Various Powers) Act, 1922. This Act contains in s. 3 a definition of the undertaking. It conferred by s. 5 power to the corporation to acquire the undertaking so far as not already acquired by the corporation. By s. 9 the corporation was also given power to purchase any lands which they might require for the purpose of enlarging and improving the market or the approaches thereto. By s. 16 power was given to the corporation to make such byelaws as they might think fit for a number of purposes; but no byelaws have in fact been made. Section 29 provides that the corporation should not let or otherwise dispose of any stall or standing in Spitalfields market for a longer period than one week. By the City of London (Various Powers) Act, 1914, the corporation was, amongst other things, empowered to execute certain improvements, and by s. 12 the corporation was empowered to take and use certain specified lands for the purposes of providing space for the erection of buildings adjoining or near to the market or for the purpose of recoupment or exchange or for any purpose in connection with Spitalfields market. Under this Act the corporation duly acquired certain lands.

By the City of London (Various Powers) Act, 1922, various further powers were given to the corporation, and by s. 19 it was provided that it should be lawful for the corporation on every day of the week, except Sunday, to hold, keep and maintain the market. It also contained a provision empowering the corporation to levy, receive and recover market dues, tolls and such like payments at or in respect of the market from the sellers or salesmen of commodities in the market. This was subject to the corporation completing certain improvements which they did in fact complete. It should perhaps be mentioned that at the date of the trial the main market comprised 68 shops or warehouses and 188 stands, let on weekly tenancies to a number of tenants. The learned judge held that apart from the stands there was no space in the main market or in the streets or buildings surrounding it upon which members of the public desiring to sell fruit, vegetables and other commodities could expose their wares for sale. The market is now held on every weekday and is used for the sale of fruit, vegetables and other like commodities. It has never in recent times been used as a general market. The corporation is, we were informed, the owner of several other markets in the city, including those well known by the names of Smithfield, Billingsgate and Islington. It may be mentioned that the other important fruit and vegetable and flower market in London is Covent Garden market, which is in private hands.

According to the finding of the learned judge, auction sales of fruit and vegetables were carried on from time to time in the original market and in the western extension of it though the business of selling such commodities has mainly been carried on by private treaty by the tenants of the shops and stands. There was no difficulty in obtaining facilities for holding such an auction generally about two o'clock in the afternoon, and no inconvenience was proved to have been caused to anyone by the holding of these auctions. The learned judge did not accept evidence on behalf of the corporation that the auctions became very objectionable owing to the ringing of a bell used to inform persons in the market that the auction was about to take place. The bell in fact was rung by the directions of the corporation. After the year 1924 the auction sales were held in several different premises belonging to the corporation in the vicinity of the A market, and these sales again caused no inconvenience to anyone engaged in selling goods in the original market or in the western extension. The last sale by auction before the opening of a building called the London Fruit Exchange, used for a purpose which I must deal with in some detail, took place on July 30, 1929.

The London Fruit Exchange is erected on a site which with other premises was acquired by the corporation under the Act of 1914 above referred to. By a lease dated B July 4, 1930, and made between the corporation, of the first part, the London Fruit Exchange Brokers' Association, Ltd., of the second part, and five companies and a firm who collectively are described as the guarantors, of the third part, the corporation demised to the London Fruit Exchange Brokers' Association, Ltd., the basement, ground, first and second floors of a building which had been erected, known as the London Fruit Exchange and Auction Sales Building, together with a number of other C facilities for the term of twenty-one years from Sept. 29, 1929. The annual sum payable by the lessees during the continuance of the term is £24,000, of which £14,000 is expressed to be in respect of rent and £10,000 is expressed to be in lieu of any tolls. The lessees covenant, among other things, not to use the premises for any other business than that of sale by auction or otherwise of fruit, vegetables or other commodities of the like nature and as offices in connection therewith, and they covenanted at all times to D develop to the utmost of their power the business of the sale by auction of fruit, vegetables or other commodities of a like nature and to comply with the byelaws, rules, orders and regulations for the time being in force governing Spitalfields market, so far as the same might be applicable to the said business. The lessees went into possession of the demised premises some months before the lease was granted and sales by auction in the premises started in September, 1929. The lessees and the guarantors endeavoured E to obtain from the corporation the sole and exclusive right to sell by auction in the market fruit, vegetables and such like commodities and the corporation was not unwilling to concede this right, but was advised that it was inexpedient to enter into any covenant to that effect, on the ground that such a covenant was illegal. The lease was finally granted in its present form on the faith of a letter written on behalf of the corporation dated June 20, 1930, in the following terms: F

> "As requested, I am writing to record the result of the conference with the Central Markets Committee on Dec. 11, 1929, which was attended by Mr. Isaacs, Mr. Greenwood, Mr. Simons, and Mr. Drake. It is understood that the protection which your Association and its constituent members desired before moving to Spitalfields was that no trade or business of any kind in fruit or vegetables, or other G like commodities, should at any time be carried on in the parts of the London Fruit Exchange and Auction Sales Building, not included in the lease to your Association, and further that the corporation would take all measures within its power to secure that no auction sale of fruit, vegetables or other like commodities should at any time be held in the Spitalfields market or in the City of London or in any market under the control of the corporation. The corporation are advised that H they cannot either by way of provision in the lease to be granted to your Association, or otherwise, undertake that your Association shall have this measure of protection. You may, however, rest assured that the corporation will be vigilant to see that their market rights as owners of Spitalfields market or otherwise are not infringed, and it is obvious that the special position of your Association as lessees under the proposed lease will then be substantially safeguarded." I

Since July 30, 1929, the corporation have consistently refused to consent to the holding by any person, firm, or company of any sale by auction of the commodities in question in or near the market, except by one of the companies or firms (whom I will refer to as "the six brokers") constituting the London Fruit Exchange Brokers' Association, Ltd. In effect, the corporation claims by virtue of its privilege a right to confer upon any companies or firms at its pleasure the monopoly of carrying on the well-known business of auctioneers of fruit and vegetables within the market or near the market. It should be added that the London Fruit Exchange Brokers' Association, Ltd., only permit persons armed with cards to obtain admission to their sale rooms and that the cards or tickets contain the following clause:

> "The user of this ticket undertakes not to sell to or buy from or attempt to trade with any person or persons while in the Fruit Exchange except the brokers who are members of this Association."

The granting or refusing of tickets of admission to the Exchange is apparently a matter left to the will and pleasure of the six brokers, and it was proved that an application for a ticket of admission was refused to one J. Lyons, the managing director and promoter of the defendant company.

The defendant company was incorporated on Sept. 30, 1931, and since its incorporation has carried on business as fruit brokers in rooms at Nos. 36 and 37, Steward-street, in close proximity to the market. The learned judge has held that there is no evidence to support the defendants' contention that the corporation have included in the market area that part of Nos. 36 and 37, Steward-street, which is in the occupation of the defendants. The business of the defendants consists in selling by auction fruit belonging in part to themselves, but chiefly to other persons, in which case the sales are, of course, on commission. These sales have mainly been sales by sample of imported fruit to wholesale dealers. The defendants have always been ready and willing to pay to the plaintiffs the reasonable and customary market tolls in respect of the business carried on by them at Nos. 36 and 37, Steward-street, but the plaintiffs have refused to accept the same. It should be added that the corporation, since it acquired the market in the year 1920, has demanded and obtained sums of money, designated in the books of the corporation as tolls, from persons or firms engaged in the sale of fruit and vegetables in shops and premises outside the area occupied by the market and the surrounding streets, and the learned judge has drawn the inference that the corporation by imposing and accepting the payments has agreed to treat the premises in respect of which payments were made as included within the market, at any rate, so long as the respective agreements to make such payments remained in force.

It is well settled that when a market ought lawfully to be held, every member of the public has of common right the liberty to enter and frequent the market place for the purpose of exposing for sale and selling or of buying such commodities as are vendible in the market: see Austin v. Whittred (16), Townend v. Woodruff (17), Prince v. Lewis (3), Duke of Newcastle v. Worksop Urban Council (18). It follows, in my opinion, that the London Fruit Exchange has never been used for the purposes of a market, since the public has never been allowed access thereto, either for the purpose of buying or selling.

The claim of the corporation amounts to this—that the selling by auction of fruit and vegetables is a course of dealing which the corporation is at liberty to prevent, both in the Spitalfields market and elsewhere within the common law limits of a market. The corporation bases its contention on the ground that the acts of the defendants amount to the levying of a rival market. If this is correct, the corporation would be entitled to rely upon the decision of the House of Lords in Great Eastern Rail. v. Goldsmid (1), by which it is established that, if a rival market is set up, this is such a disturbance of the original market rights that, even if it is proved that there is not such accommodation provided by the owners of the franchise in their market, that circumstances would afford no answer to the action for an injunction. On the other hand, it is not in dispute that an obligation is cast upon the owners of a market to provide convenient accommodation for all who are ready to buy and sell in the public market, and that, if he does not do so or if he allows the market or part of it to be employed for other purposes without providing as convenient a place for the public to buy and sell in elsewhere within the limits of his grant, one consequence will be that there would be a good defence to an action brought by the grantee of the franchise against any person for selling out of the market to the prejudice of his right, provided such person has been prevented from selling in the market by the want of convenient room. I am here in substance quoting from the opinions of the judges in Islington Market Bill Case (2) (3 Cl. & F. at p. 518). The judges approved of the decision of the court of King's Bench in Prince v. Lewis (3) a case which related to Covent Garden market. The distinction, in my opinion, is between establishing a rival market at which the public or a section of the public is invited to come for the purpose of buying and selling, and the carrying on by an individual, firm, or company of the business of selling goods for their own benefit. If the present case were one of mere disturbance of market, the corporation would, I think, have considerable difficulty in establishing that the disturbance is of an actionable kind, since it was not done with intent to evade payment of a toll: Brecon Corpn. v. Edwards (19), but, however this may be, it cannot be doubted that if there were a mere disturbance primâ facie actionable it would be excused, since at the time and under the circumstances of the sales by the defendant he was being excluded from selling goods by auction in the place at which the market was held.

The question then arises as to the meaning of the phrase "levying a rival market." There is no doubt that a franchise of market involves a right to be protected from the setting up of a rival market within a distance of seven miles or, more strictly, six and two-third miles: Bracton, Book IV, Chap. 46; Comyn's Digest Market C.2; and if the rival market is held on the same day or days and within the common law distance, it is not necessary to prove actual damage: Dorchester Corpn. v. Ensor (5) (L.R. 4 Ex. 335, at p. 343). In Great Eastern Rail. Co. v. Goldsmid (1) and in Wilcox v. Steel (13), the Lords of Appeal and the Lords Justices seem alike to have taken the view that it was necessary to consider the facts and to see whether as a matter of substance the defendant had established a new market rivalling the old market. In other words, it is a question of substance in each case whether the defendant is establishing a new rival market within the common law distance of an old market. No doubt a rival market held within the limit on the same day or days is primâ facie injurious to the old market, since it is an invasion of a franchise; and, on the other hand, it is clear that it is not necessary that the rival market should purport to be a franchise market, nor is it necessary that the defendant should have any intention of setting up a rival market if what he does amounts to such a rival market.

I must here observe that unless the question whether or not a rival market has been established is a question of fact to be considered having regard to all the circumstances of the case, as the authorities cited seem to show, the results in law are very extraordinary. In the present case (as in many others) the market is a general market under the Charter of Charles II, though confined, as I have said, in practice to the sale of fruit and vegetables and like commodities. The common law right to restrain the setting up of a rival market extends to the whole radius of nearly seven miles, and if there is no necessity to establish any pecuniary damage, or the probability of such damage, the monopoly conferred upon the corporation under the franchise would primâ facie extend to a right to prevent the setting up of markets of every character over an area of some 150 square miles containing a vast population, and although the goods sold were not fruit and vegetables. Further, if the corporation is right in its contention that every sale by auction amounts to the levying of a rival market, it would seem to follow that within the common law limit, every sale by the hundreds of auctioneers who carry on business within the limit might be restrained by the corporation, although such sales in no way injure the corporation and although the auctions were of goods which have never been sold at Spitalfields market. We were invited not to be surprised at such a result, having regard to the peculiar nature of market rights; but, for my part, in the complete absence of any authority to show that the rights of market owners are so extensive in character I hesitate before acceding to the contention. It seems to me that in order to establish the fact that a rival market is being levied it is necessary to show that the defendant is providing facilities for a concourse of buyers and sellers of goods ordinarily dealt with in the plaintiff's market, so that there is a primâ facie fraud upon the market owner (to use an old phrase), in other words, so that there is a probability of his being deprived of tolls, stallages, or other profits or emoluments appertaining to the market. To put it in another way, there must be an element of rivalry in the case. I do not doubt that a man may set up such an auction mart as to amount to a rival market. Great Eastern Rail. v. Goldsmid (1) and Wilcox v. Steel (13) are examples. I do, however, deny that an auction sale or periodical auction sales necessarily amount to the levying of rival markets, and I do not see any reason for thinking that the hundreds of auction rooms where chattels and goods are sold in London, and in most of the cities and towns of England were established by and exist on the sufferance of market owners.

Do the acts of the defendants in this case amount to the levying of a rival market? Their business consists, as alleged by the plaintiffs, "in selling by auction fruit belonging mainly, if not entirely, not to themselves, but to a large number of persons, such sales being on commission." The sales are stated to have been extensive, and the defendants, no doubt, to some extent take advantage of the concourse of buyers at the market and of the fact that their premises are in the neighbourhood of the market. The defendants advertise their sales by advertisements or notices. The sales are mainly of imported fruit. The premises of the defendants, as I have already stated, are not included in the market area, because the corporation declines so to include them. The sales they effect are in a private room to wholesalers only, and they are sales by sample. The notices of the sales have been distributed through the medium of the post office. The defendants, I repeat, have no desire to avoid payment of the customary tolls, and they have been in effect forced to take the action they have taken because of the refusal of the corporation to include their premises in the market or to allow them to sell by auction in the market area.

It is matter of common knowledge that sales by auction by auctioneers selling on commission have been a common practice in markets in London, and I would add, all over the country. For example, such sales are and have for many years past been the ordinary way of disposing of large quantities of fruit and vegetables in Covent Garden market, originally founded, like the Spitalfields market, by a charter of Charles II. Nearly all imported fruit is sold to wholesalers in that market by auction. At Billingsgate everyone knows that the sales of trawl fish are effected by auction, and that land borne fish are sometimes sold by auction and sometimes by private sale. The same is true of the markets at Hull and Grimsby. It is also matter of common knowledge that at markets and fairs for the sale of cattle and horses such animals are to a large extent sold by auction in the market. I have not been able to find in the evidence in this case any ground for the view that a vendor in the market is not entitled to sell his goods by auction to the highest bidder. On the other hand, nobody has ever suggested that a vendor of goods in a market is entitled only to sell his own goods. So long as the proper toll is paid, how is the market owner prejudiced? I do not understand why there should be any objection to a salesman in a market acting as agent for the sale of the goods of others, whether for a commission or otherwise. Commission agents, in fact, abound in large markets. No good reason has been suggested for the view that an auctioneer is making an improper use of a market if he sells the goods of others by auction in the usual way. In all the many authorities upon market law, I have not found any suggestion in any judgment that such sales by auction are not, subject, of course, to reasonable regulations, permissible to all members of the public who attend the market, and it is quite certain that such sales in the case of fish, cattle, and horses have been perfectly usual all over the country for many years, if not from time immemorial. The reason is not far to seek. Where the circumstances are such that the goods sold or intended to be sold in the market cannot in practice be removed, if unsold, by the persons who have brought them to the market, private sales afford a most unsatisfactory method of dealing with the commodities in question, because the vendor, if he is unable to sell by auction, is bound when buyers are scarce or hesitating to keep on reducing his prices, sometimes to a ruinous extent during the time the market continues in order to get rid of them. These considerations apply with great force to foreign fruit. Cargoes of fruit arrive day after day at the London docks, and the importers have to get rid of them to the wholesale distributors without delay. It is plain from the evidence that, with regard to the enormous business of the sale of imported fruit, a very large proportion is now sold by auction to wholesalers in London. An illustration of the modern tendency in regard to imported fruit is to be found in the report, dated Jan. 29, 1928, by Major Millman, the clerk and superintendent of Spitalfields market, to the chairman and members of the Central Markets Committee. He stated, among other things, that at that date the total imports of fruit from abroad amounted to nearly fifty millions per annum, and were rapidly increasing. On Dec. 17, 1929, after the six brokers had commenced their business, Major Millman in a memorandum of that date stated that the six brokers in one week had sold as many packages as Mr. Lyons had sold in six years, and that the six brokers had sold 70,000 packages in one day, these goods being, of course, disposed of in the ordinary way by auction. The amount of fruit and vegetables now sold by the six brokers at the Fruit Exchange has grown to huge figures.

The decision of Romer, J., in Nicholls v. Tavistock Urban Council (12) supports the view that sales by auction are a proper exercise of the rights of salesmen in a market. I have already noted that auction sales were held in the main market at Spitalfields at least as early as the year 1897, and were permitted by the corporation after they took over the conduct of the market till July, 1929. The London Fruit Exchange was built by the corporation for the express purposes of giving adequate facilities for the sale by auction of foreign fruit, and I draw the inference that at the present time foreign fruit cannot in practice be sold to the large wholesalers in any other way.

In my opinion, then, such sales by auction as the defendants have effected would have been a proper exercise of the rights of salesman in Spitalfields market, and therefore the declaration granted on the counterclaim of the defendants should stand. It does not necessarily follow that such sales by auction outside the market do not amount to the levying of a rival market; but, as I have said, all the circumstances of the case must be considered and the element of rivalry in some sense must be established. For reasons of their own the corporation have ceased to permit sales by auction of fruit in the market; it is a branch of the trade no longer carried on in the market, and they are in no way prejudiced, as matters stand, by the defendants' acts. To this fact it should be added, first, that the defendants have offered to treat their premises as added to the market, and, in any event, to pay lawful tolls, and, secondly, that their sales are held in private, and to wholesalers only. The mere fact that the defendants cause to assemble a certain concourse of buyers (though not of sellers) at certain hours does not itself create a rival market. If it did, every large shop within the common law limit, or, at any rate, every large shop which by its nearness to a market takes advantage of the existence of the market might be forced by the market owner to close its doors. It is too late to set up any such contention in our courts, though it might, perhaps, have succeeded three hundred years ago, when shops were few and goods were generally bought and sold in a market. It may be here observed that markets in ancient days were usually employed for the purpose of selling goods retail, and that the tolls were payable in respect of goods which were brought into the market for that purpose. Markets in modern times have largely been used for the purpose of sales to wholesalers, and I repeat that the modern trade in relation to imported fruit, involving as it does an elaborate system of distribution, is generally effected by sales by auction to wholesale distributors, the sales being by sample. Although in an action for disturbance by setting up a rival market it is not necessary to show that the defendant should have intended to evade the payment of toll, I am of opinion that the fact that he is willing to pay the proper tolls, whatever they may be, and that he is not selling in the market only because the market owner declines to allow him to sell his goods in the way in which he desires to sell them, namely by auction, is a circumstance of great importance which has to be borne in mind in considering whether as a fact his acts amount to a setting up of a rival market: see Brecon Corpn. v. Edwards (19) and particularly the judgments of Baron Bramwell and Baron Wilde.

I have not thought it necessary to repeat the remarks made by my brother Romer on the various authorities relied on by the corporation as tending to show that any auction sale within the common law limit of the market amounts to the establishment of a rival market. In most of these cases the element of rivalry clearly existed, tolls were being evaded, and it was reasonably plain that the defendants' actions were calculated seriously to damage the market owner. The Court of Appeal in Elwes v. Payne (8) (overruling Sir George Jessel and thus, I think, diminishing the value of his dicta) declined to grant an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants from holding auction sales within half-a-mile of the plaintiffs' market on a day different from the usual market day.

The judgment of JAMES, L.J., seems to me strongly to support the view that unless damage is proved or can be inferred, the market owner has no right to complain.

In all the circumstances I come to the conclusion that whatever the defendants are doing does not, as a fact, amount to the levying of a rival market. As I understand the judgment appealed from, the learned judge arrived at that conclusion of fact, and I not only do not differ, but for the reasons I have endeavoured to give, I have arrived at the same finding. I wish to add for myself that, even if I thought that technically the defendants' acts do amount to the levying of a rival market, I should not in the special circumstances of the case have thought it right to grant the injunction claimed by the corporation. The remedy by injunction is an equitable remedy, and when it is sought to protect a monopoly such as a franchise of market, I think it is the duty of the court to decline to grant the injunction if the owners of the franchise are seeking, not to protect their own rights, but to carry out an understanding with third parties to whom they have in effect promised a monopoly which they could not properly confer on them. Those, I think, are the facts in this remarkable case. In the result the appeal must be dismissed.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Atkin, Lord Tomlin, Lord Thankerton, Lord Wright and Lord Alness), May 28, 30, 31, July 4, 1935]

Invitee—Negligence—Invitee going outside scope of invitation—Barge—Discharge of cargo—Hatch coverings wrongfully used in process of loading—Collapse of hatch coverings owing to weight of superimposed cargo—Injuries caused to stevedores—Whether barge crew had authority to invite stevedores to use hatch covers—Liability of barge-owners—Docks Regulations, 1925 (S.R. & O. 1925, No. 231), reg. 34 (b)—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Edw. 7c. 22), s. 79.

Trespasser—Negligence—Extent of duty to—Invitee going outside scope of invitation—Stevedores wrongfully using hatch covers as loading stage.

The plaintiffs, who were stevedores, were employed by the owners of the steamship D. in loading cargo from a barge belonging to the defendants. After some of the cargo had been removed from the hold of the barge the crew put some of the hatch covers on again, but did not put on the fore and aft beams used to support these hatch covers. At the suggestion of the engineer of the barge the plaintiffs used the hatch covers, which had been put on in this way, as a stage from which to load cargo. During the loading the hatch covers collapsed and the plaintiffs and the engineer were thrown into the hold and severely injured. The plaintiffs knew that it was wrongful and dangerous to put cargo on hatch covers, and to load off them. On a claim by the plaintiffs for damages for their injuries,

Held: the plaintiffs' claim failed because (i) while the plaintiffs were invitees of the barge-owners on the barge, and the barge-owners owed them a duty as such, this duty to an invitee only extended so long as, and so far as, the invitee was making what could reasonably be contemplated as an ordinary and reasonable use of the premises for the purposes for which he had been invited;

(ii) any invitation to use the hatch covers for loading given by the crew of the barge was wholly without the authority of the barge-owners and quite outside the ostensible scope of the authority of the crew;

(iii) as the plaintiffs' use of the hatch covers was to their knowledge wrongfully dangerous and improper, they were trespassers, and not invitees, thereon;

(iv) the only duty of the occupier of land to a trespasser is that of abstaining from doing an act which is intended to injure him, and, when the trespasser is known to be present, of abstaining from doing an act which, if done carelessly, must reasonably be contemplated as likely to injure him, the barge-owners had no reason to anticipate the plaintiffs' use of the hatch covers for loading cargo and so were not bound to provide against it;

(v) furthermore (per Lord Alness), the plaintiffs, even if they were invitees, were guilty of contributory negligence.

Per Lord Atkin (Lords Tomlin, Thankerton and Wright concurring). The owner of a barge does not clothe the crew with apparent authority to use it or any part of it for purposes which are known to be extraordinary and dangerous.

If (a servant) saw a trespasser unwittingly entering into danger upon the employers' property he might owe a moral duty to the trespasser to warn him. But for breach of a servant's moral duty an employer is not vicariously liable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1934] 1 K.B. 455) affirmed, but on other grounds.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Scrutton, Lawrence and Greer, L.JJ.), reported [1934] 1 K.B. 455. The plaintiffs, who were stevedores, claimed damages in respect of personal injuries sustained by them while loading cargo from a barge belonging to the defendants. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Atkin.

The Court of Appeal held, reversing the decision of Goddard, J., that the illegality of the operation of loading from the hatch coverings, known as it was to the workmen, excluded any duty on the barge-owners other than that of abstaining from doing acts to injure the workmen. There was no obligation on the part of the barge-owners to make the illegal operation of loading from the hatch coverings safe for the workmen.

The workmen appealed.

D. P. Maxwell Fyfe, K.C., and G. H. Oliver for the workmen.

Viscount Erleigh, K.C., and F. A. Sellers for the barge-owners were not called upon to argue.

The House took time for consideration.

July 4. The following opinions were read.

LORD ATKIN:—I am asked to say that my noble and learned friends LORD THANKERTON and LORD WRIGHT concur in the opinion which I am about to deliver.

This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, who reversed a judgment for the workmen, the two plaintiffs given by GODDARD, J., at a trial in Liverpool with a common jury. The two workmen, the plaintiffs, now appellants, were dock labourers employed by the Pacific Steam Navigation Company to load the steamship Darro. They were members of a stevedores' gang working under a foreman named Senior. On the day in question they were directed to assist in loading cargo on the Darro from the barge Hibernia lying alongside. The Hibernia was owned by the defendants, and her cargo consisted of soda in kegs and bags, the kegs being on top. She had one hold and a hatch 41 ft. long and about 11 ft. 6 ins. wide, which was covered by twenty hatch covers. There were two hatchway beams athwart the hatch and fore and aft beams in three sections which passed along the centre of the hatch resting on the crossbeams, and served to support the hatch covers when in position. They had to be removed when the barge was being loaded or unloaded. The hatch had coamings about 1 ft. 3 ins. high. The hold was about 15 ft. deep. The barge had a crew of three, master, mate and engineer. The stevedore foreman required the bags to be hoisted on the Darro before the kegs. The kegs were therefore placed apparently by hand on the narrow deck of the barge, a passage about 3 ft. wide; and the bags were conveyed to the Darro in canvas slings carried by the ship's derricks. The barge cargo for the Darro was contained in the after third of the hold, abaft the after transverse beam. The remainder of the hold was occupied by cargo for two other vessels to which the barge was to proceed after completing her discharge to the Darro. After the bags for the Darro had been transported in the slings the crew of the barge put the hatch covers on the after portion, which had been uncovered. They did not put on the fore and aft beams. The kegs still remained to be shipped from the barge to the Darro. The engineer threw a sling on to the covered hatch and assisted the two workmen to place eight of the kegs in the sling. He probably told them it was all right. When seven kegs were in the sling and the eighth was being put in, two of the hatch covers gave way, and the two workmen and the engineer fell through into the hold. One of them, Pettigrew, received very serious injuries. The workmen brought separate actions, afterwards consolidated, against the barge-owners on the ground that the barge-owners were negligent in providing unsafe hatch covers, or at any rate in not warning them that the hatch covers were not at the time supported by the fore and aft beam.

The judge left to the jury the question whether the workmen had voluntarily incurred the risk and danger. Other questions, including a plea of contributory negligence, were apparently left for decision to the judge. In a considered judgment he found that there was a duty on the crew of the barge to warn the workmen of an added risk, namely, the absence of support to the hatch covers of which they were ignorant, and gave judgment for the damages found by the jury.

On appeal the members of the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that by the terms of rule 34 (b) of the Docks Regulations, 1925, made under s. 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, it was unlawful to use the covered hatch for the purpose of discharging cargo from it; and that no duty towards the workmen in those circumstances could be established against the barge-owners.

The rule is:

> "(b) Hatch coverings shall not be used in the construction of deck or cargo stages, or for any other purpose which may expose them to danger."

The rules admit of doubt as to whether this wording is applicable to hatch covers placed in position. It is suggested that the other purpose must be some such purpose as the construction of a stage where the rule seems to contemplate their separate use when removed from the hatch. Your Lordships did not find it necessary to ask counsel for the barge-owners to discuss the construction of the rule, and express no opinion upon it; as it seems sufficient to decide this case upon a ground which does not involve a finding of illegality. I do not therefore propose to canvass the judgments in the Court of Appeal on this matter.

The rights of the parties appear to me to be ascertained when reference is made to the admission of the plaintiff workman Hillen.

> "I know it is not the right thing to do to load off hatch covers. . . . I have seen cargoes put on hatch covers, it is wrongfully dangerous, and should not be done."

This evidence is confirmed by the foreman. The workmen's claim against the barge-owners is based upon the theory that they were invitees of the barge-owners for business purposes, and that the barge-owners consequently owed them a duty to take reasonable care to see that the barge was reasonably safe, or at least to warn them against any hidden danger of which they were unaware but which was known, or ought to have been known, to the barge-owners or their servants. In my opinion this duty to an invitee only extends so long as, and so far as, the invitee is making what can reasonably be contemplated as an ordinary and reasonable use of the premises by the invitee for the purposes for which he has been invited. He is not invited to use any part of the premises for purposes which he knows are wrongfully dangerous and constitute an improper use. As SCRUTTON, L.J., has pointedly said (The Carlgarth, The Otarama (1), [1927] P. at p. 110): "If I invite a man to go down my staircase I do not invite him to slide down the banisters." So far as he sets foot on so much of the premises as lie outside the invitation or uses them for purposes which are alien to the invitation he is not an invitee but a trespasser, and his rights must be determined accordingly. In the present case the stevedores knew that they ought not to use the covered hatch in order to load cargo from it: for them for such a purpose it was out of bounds: they were trespassers. The barge-owners had no reason to contemplate such a use: they had no duty to take any care that the hatch when covered was safe for such a use: they had no duty to warn anyone that it was not fit for such use. I know of no duty to a trespasser owed by the occupier of land other than when the trespasser is known to be present, abstaining from doing an act which if done carelessly must reasonably be contemplated as likely to injure him, and, of course, abstaining from doing acts which are intended to injure him. The owners of the barge, therefore, were not guilty of any breach of duty to the workmen.

It is said, however, that whatever may have been the scope of the general invitation of the owners to the stevedores' men, in this case the owners' servants, the crew, extended a special invitation to the workmen to use the hatch for the particular purpose: and neglected to warn them of the danger which they knew and the workmen did not. I am far from satisfied that anyone so invited the workmen. I think the engineer's part was confined to a friendly suggestion that they should all do something irregular together. But whether there was an invitation by the crew, or any member of the crew, I am quite satisfied that it was wholly without the authority of the owners: and quite outside the ostensible scope of the authority of the crew. The owner of a barge does not clothe the crew with apparent authority to use it or any part of it for purposes which are known to be extraordinary and dangerous. The crew could not within the scope of their employment convert it into a dancing hall or a drinking booth. They could not invite stevedores to work the engines or take part in the navigation. The most that could be said of the engineer is that if he saw a trespasser unwittingly entering into danger upon the employer's property he might owe a moral duty to the trespasser to warn him. But for breach of a servant's moral duty an employer is not vicariously liable. In the circumstances of this case it matters not whether the fore and aft beams had or had not been at any time in position: any action of the crew in respect of them imposed no liability upon the barge-owners. I am of opinion that the facts proved disclosed no cause of action against the owners of the barge, and that this appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD TOMLIN.—I have had an opportunity of considering in print the opinion which has just been delivered by my friend on the Woolsack and I concur in it in all respects.

LORD ALNESS.—In my judgment the workmen's claims fail. In the first place, I am of opinion that they have not proved negligence on the part of the barge-owners. The evidence demonstrates that the hatch was put by the workmen to a use which the barge-owners had no reason to anticipate, and against which they were therefore not bound to provide. No duty having been left undischarged by the barge-owners, no liability attaches to them. As regards the invitation which the engineer is alleged to have given, I am of opinion that that invitation is not proved, and, further, that, if it had been proved to have been given, it was outside the scope of the engineer's authority to give it. If these views be sound, no negligence on the part of the barge-owners is established, and that in itself is sufficient for the disposal against the workmen of the case.

But, in the second place, on the evidence of the plaintiff Hillen—and the other plaintiff Pettigrew, who was too ill to be examined, was taken as concurring with Hillen's evidence—a case of contributory negligence, persisting up to the time of the accident, is disclosed. Said the workman Hillen:

> "I know it was not the right thing to do to load off hatch covers. . . . I have seen cargoes put on hatch covers; it is wrongfully dangerous, and should not be done."

That, in my opinion, is an unqualified admission of contributory negligence on the part of Hillen.

It is to me a novel doctrine of law that an employer in the position of the barge-owners is bound to foresee and provide against a course of conduct on the part of an employee of another employer which is admitted by him to be wrong and dangerous. The workman Hillen's admission, in my judgment, puts him out of court, and disentitles him from recovering damages from the barge-owners. To hold otherwise would be to subvert the principles upon which, as I apprehend, the law of reparation is based. The plaintiff Pettigrew's case must, in the circumstances, share the same fate as that of the plaintiff Hillen.

I find it difficult to understand why the learned trial judge neither dealt in his judgment with the plea of contributory negligence, nor submitted it to the adjudication of the jury. The plea is none the less effective, even at this late hour, on that account. It furnishes, I think, a complete answer to the plaintiffs' claims.

I therefore arrive at the same conclusion as my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, and I concur in the motion which he has moved.

Appeal dismissed.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Langton, J.), May 2, 3, 7, June 7, 1935]

Shipping—Bill of lading—Damage to cargo—"Shipped in good order and condition"—"To be delivered in like good order and condition"—Insertion of "condition unknown"—Arbitration clause—Shipowners not estopped from denying that goods shipped in good order and condition—Short delivery—"Conclusive evidence" clause.

A cargo of timber was shipped at Parrsboro, Nova Scotia, on board the defendants' vessel S. for carriage to Manchester under bills of lading the form of which was prescribed by the charterparty, which was in the common form of charterparty of the Chamber of Shipping British North American (Atlantic) Wood Charterparty, 1914. The cargo was described in the bills of lading as "shipped in good order and condition," and the bills of lading further contained the words "to be delivered in like good order and condition," and "quality, description, and measurement unknown." On arriving at Parrsboro to load the cargo the master found that it "was in a very bad state," and he inserted the word "condition" in front of the words "quality . . . unknown" in the bills of lading, so that the clause read: "condition, quality . . . unknown." The plaintiffs bought the timber from the shippers on contracts which contained clauses providing that in the event of any dispute the plaintiffs should not reject the goods, but should refer the dispute to arbitration. They received and took up the bills of lading before the timber arrived. Subsequently, they brought this action against the defendants claiming in respect of 72,889 pieces of timber delivered in a damaged condition and 1,892 pieces short delivered, the claim being based on breach of contract and estoppel. As to the two parcels of timber short delivered, one contained 1,398 pieces and the other 494. The bills of lading were expressed to be subject to the terms of the charterparty, which provided that the bills of lading should afford conclusive evidence of the number of pieces delivered to the ship. Both parcels had been lost from a scow alongside the ship during a storm before shipment. The bill of lading in respect of the 1,398 pieces made this clear, and as regards the second parcel as to which there was a shortage, the clause in the bill of lading was "494 pieces of these lots not on board, being included in specification as being part of scow 5 lost from the ship."

Held: (i) the words "shipped in good order and condition" were not words of contract: dictum of CHANNELL, J., in Compania Naviera Vasconzada v. Churchill and Sim (1), [1906] 1 K.B. 237, at p. 247, applied; there was, therefore, no ascertainable antecedent state to which the words "to be delivered in like good order and condition" could be referred to make them capable of a contractual meaning; and, accordingly, the claim in contract failed because the words "to be delivered in like good order and condition," when reference could not be had to any antecedent state to discover what was the order and condition to which "the like" could be compared, could not stand alone so as to make a contract to deliver in good order and condition;

(ii) the insertion of the word "condition" in the way in which it was inserted by the master before the words "quality, description, measurement unknown" was not such a qualification of the original statement "shipped in good order and condition" as to convey to the mind of anybody reading the document that the goods were, or even appeared to anyone who had seen them to be, as in fact they were, damaged goods, and, if the plaintiffs had acted on the statement to their detriment, the defendants would have been estopped from denying that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, but in view of the arbitration clause in the contract of sale (which could be referred to for its terms and analysed, since it was the res out of which the complaint in the action arose), the plaintiffs could not show that they had acted upon the statement to their detriment;

(iii) as regards the 494 pieces short delivered the bill of lading was not so worded as to bring it to the notice of the plaintiffs that these pieces were not delivered to the ship; that the defendants were bound by the "conclusive evidence" clause; and that the plaintiffs succeeded as to 494 pieces, but failed as to the shortage of 1,398 pieces.

Action for damage to and short delivery of cargo.

The plaintiffs, the owners of the cargo lately laden on board the Norwegian steamship Skarp, claimed damages from the defendants, the owners of the Skarp, in respect of 74,781 pieces of timber of which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants acknowledged shipment in good order and condition for carriage from Parrsboro, Nova Scotia, to Manchester, but of which they delivered 72,889 pieces in a damaged condition and failed to deliver 1,892 pieces at all.

The facts and the contentions of counsel appear in the judgment of the learned judge.

June 7. LANGTON, J.—This case has given me no little amount of trouble. It arises out of a shipment of certain parcels of spruce deals and ends. These goods were shipped in the Skarp at Parrsboro, Nova Scotia, by George McKean & Co. for delivery at Manchester. So far as I am concerned with them the parcels were sold, and I will detail later the process of sale. The damage complained of was, as regards certain parcels, that they were delivered wet and mouldy, and, as regards two other parcels, that they were short delivered.

The main part of the case centres round the damaged goods. To deal first with the business of the matter, this was put before me by the cashier in the firm of one of the receivers or assignees of the bills of lading. His evidence was that the method of conducting the business (and I understand it was accepted on both sides that the business in all cases in this litigation was the same) was this—the receivers bought on a sale note and there was then a formal contract. Much turns upon the formal contract. Then the documents—that is to say, the policy of insurance, and the bills of lading—were seen by the buyers. The sale was on the usual c.i.f. terms, and the buyers were entitled to the policy of insurance and bill of lading. There were some ten bills of lading; nine of them were in one form and one of them was in another form. Owing to the conclusion to which I have been reluctantly forced it makes no difference which A form of bill of lading one adopts. But the point of difference was that in nine bills of lading the document was qualified by the insertion of the word "condition" in type before the printed words "quality, description and measurement unknown, steamer not responsible for splits and shakes."

The plaintiffs' case was put in two or three ways, but the principal controversy as regards these damaged goods centres upon the question whether the shipowners were B estopped by the statement in the bills of lading that the goods were "shipped in good order and condition" from asserting that they were shipped in a different condition, namely, a damaged and wet condition. For the purposes of that argument it is a matter of prime importance whether this qualification produced by the word "condition" appeared in the bills of lading or not. I mention this in passing to show that I have considered all the cases that were put before me, and have not omitted the single C instance where the word "condition" did not appear in the bill of lading.

I will now consider the business from the other end. The shipowner carried these goods under the common form of charterparty of the Chamber of Shipping British North American (Atlantic) Wood Charterparty, 1914. Under cl. 18 of the charter:

> "bills of lading in the form endorsed on this charterparty, shall be signed by the master: freight and all conditions, terms and exceptions as per this charterparty"; D and then, curiously enough, the clause goes on to detail certain clauses that are to be in the bills of lading. It was a feature not much stressed in argument, but in this charterparty there are two clauses incorporated on the back of the bills of lading in the form prescribed, and it is interesting to note that the first of them is

> "quality, description, and measurement unknown. Steamer not responsible for E splits and shakes."

That actually appears in cl. 18 of the charterparty, and it is a matter which, in another case, may be interesting as a subject for argument, whether with a charterparty of this kind in which all conditions are to be, "as per charterparty" the shipowner can have any right at all to alter the form set out in that charterparty, and introduce into the bill of lading terms for which there is no provision in the charterparty itself. However, F that is not the line upon which the case was argued here.

To continue the history from the shipowners' point of view, when the master arrived at Parrsboro he found the cargo in anything but a good condition, and in fact he entered in his log "the cargo lay in lighters, so a tallyman had to be kept at each hatch to tally each sling. Moreover, the cargo was in a very bad state; very black, wet and partly musty." In that difficult state of affairs the master appears to have sought counsel G from a gentleman who was connected with his insurance company, and between them they seem to have determined that they would deal sufficiently with the rights of parties who might ship, or receive, the goods, and at the same time protect the owners of the ship, by inserting the word "condition" in the place I have indicated, namely, in front of the qualification "quality, description and measurement unknown."

The goods arrived at Manchester preceded by the bills of lading, which, so far as their H condition was concerned, had no other qualification upon them than the insertion of this typed word "condition." They were, in all cases, taken up by the buyers, and, now that the condition of the goods is known, the buyers claim against the shipowners and say: "You, the shipowners, are estopped from saying that these goods were otherwise than in a good order and condition because you so asserted on bills of lading, and have led us to act to our detriment." That shortly is the contention upon which the I first dispute is founded.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, oppressed by the difficulty which I shall have later to notice, put his case at first upon a different ground from that which I have indicated, and I do not wish to suggest that he ever retracted from his first point; on the contrary he emphasised it very much in his reply. He said:

> "I do not need any estoppel here, and I do not need to rely upon the doctrine of estoppel. Further, I agree that the words 'shipped in good order and condition' are not words of contract."

Indeed, that matter was made abundantly clear by Channell, J., in Compania Naviera Vasconzada v. Churchill and Sim (1) ([1906] 1 K.B. at p. 247). In a judgment which, so far as I know, has never been criticised, and was never taken to the Court of Appeal, Channell, J., said:

> "The words 'shipped in good order and condition' are not words of contract in the sense of a promise or undertaking. The words are an affirmation of fact, or, perhaps rather in the nature of an assent by the captain to an affirmation of fact which the shipper may be supposed to make as to his own goods."

Counsel's contention, however, was that the words "to be delivered in like good order and condition" are words of contract, and that, if the goods are not delivered in good order and condition, there is a breach of contract. It is nothing against this point that it is an entirely novel one. I do not even know that it is a serious criticism of the point that, although it has been open for many years to be taken in cases of this class, it apparently never has been taken until this case. But I cannot accept it. "To be delivered in the like good order and condition," if one is to base anything upon it at all, must refer to some antecedent state—one cannot cut out the words "the like," and give any sense to these words of contract. Unless one refers to some ascertainable antecedent state, there is no standard of comparison, and I am at a loss to understand how a shipowner can be said to be under a contractual obligation to deliver goods "in the like good order and condition" when regard cannot be had to any antecedent state to discover what was the order and condition to which "the like" is comparable. It is for that reason, therefore, upon its merits, and not because of any quality of novelty, that I have been driven to believe that this point is a false one.

The controversy then centred upon this main question of estoppel. The textbooks do not show any case in which a shipowner has attempted to clause his bill of lading by the introduction of the word "condition" in these circumstances. For, be it observed, one is dealing here with timber goods, and there is no question that there are many classes of goods as to which there may be a distinction when one is speaking of their apparent condition and of their real condition. Potatoes in sacks may be in apparent good order and condition because the outside of the sacks is dry and in good condition, although in fact the condition of the potatoes inside the sacks may be deplorable. But we are here dealing with goods as to which the condition must refer to real condition, and the bills of lading, as they stand, make two completely contradictory statements: (i) "shipped in good order and condition," and (ii) "condition unknown." Counsel for the defendants, in an adroit argument, said that this is the way in which a shipowner ought to deal with a matter of this kind. If he wants to say that he has not measured the goods he says "measurement unknown"; if he wants to say that he has not weighed them he says "weight unknown"; and, if he wants to say that he makes no representation as to condition, he puts in "condition unknown." It is the method sanctified by usage and time. I have considerable doubt as to the soundness of that contention. Still more have I doubt when in the charterparty itself the clauses to be incorporated in the bills of lading are in terms laid down. Furthermore, I think that it is profitable in this case to take account of how and why the master came to insert this word in the bills of lading.

The master was confronted with the fact that the goods were certainly damaged. The straightforward thing to do was surely to put upon the bills of lading, in the ample margin which is apparently provided for that purpose, a clause which would clearly advertise to any buyer of a particular bill of lading that the goods he was going to receive were not in good order and condition. It would not have been beyond the master's power to take the entry from his own log, and to put upon the bills of lading "very black, wet and partly musty." If he could see it for the purposes of his log, he could with the same eye have seen it for the purposes of the bills of lading. But in truth and in fact he was much worried about his own employers' interests, and it was for that reason that he took this circuitous route of putting the word "condition" in what is, to my mind, a most obscure place. That is the genesis of the matter.

One must look at it as a matter of construction. What would those words in a bill of lading convey to anybody who read them? What, in the first place, would "shipped in good order and condition" followed by "condition unknown" convey? Speaking for myself, they would have conveyed nothing at all to me. The only witness who was called (although I think he was an entirely honest man, I cannot place much dependence upon him, because he was the cashier and did not appear to have had any long experience of the business side of this class of transaction) said that he had regarded the bill of lading as "clean." To my mind, having regard to the well-known method which is always at the disposal of the masters of steamships to describe damaged goods, this is a wholly unsuitable method—a most ambiguous method—and does not convey at all that the goods are damaged or even may be damaged. If I had to speculate as to what was the most probable effect on the mind of anybody who read the bill of lading so phrased, I should say that he would think that this master had got some idea that he was responsible for the condition of the goods, whether it was ripe or overripe or something of that sort; but I cannot imagine that it would bring to the mind of the reader the fact that a man who had been at no pains to clause the bill of lading in the natural way meant to convey that the goods were or might be damaged. Another and, perhaps, clearer way of putting it is that it is difficult to understand why the affirmation or acceptance of one untruth should be cured by a deliberate statement of another untruth. It is true that the words "shipped in good order and condition," as CHANNELL, J., pointed out, are not words of contract, but they are an affirmation or assent to an affirmation of fact, and in this case they were an affirmation of an untruth. They were words which to the plain knowledge of the master were totally untrue; the goods were not shipped in good order and condition, and well he knew it. It is argued that he escaped from any difficulties occasioned by this assent or affirmation of an untruth by making of his own free will another statement which he knows quite well to be untrue, namely, that "the condition was unknown." The condition was not unknown. The condition was stated clearly, forcibly and lucidly in his log, and it would be deplorable that a person should be allowed to escape from the penalties, if any, attached to the first assent to one untruth by a deliberate statement of another.

Primarily, however, this is a matter of construction, and I hold that the insertion of the word "condition" in the way it was inserted here, is not such a qualification of the original statement "shipped in good order and condition" as to bring to the mind of anybody reading that document that the goods were, or even might be apparently, and to the knowledge of anyone who had seen them, damaged goods.

Counsel for the plaintiffs further argued that there was another ground upon which he could claim estoppel. He said that, even assuming that the argument of counsel for the defendants would hold good as to the word "condition," there was still the word "order" in the bills of lading, and upon LORD MERRIVALE'S judgment in The Tromp (2)—and, indeed, upon general principles—he could argue that the insertion of the word "condition" did not cover the whole of the area of a representation made by the words "shipped in good order and condition." It is only fair, in case this case goes higher, to say that counsel for the plaintiffs was equally tenacious of this point as of the other points and that it was by no means a subsidiary point. I am afraid that it does not appeal to me. Counsel for the defendants was quick to rejoin that in the old form of bills of lading it was not unusual to find the word "condition" in one part of the document and "order and condition" in another. There is, too, the unfortunate feature that in this very judgment in The Tromp (2) LORD MERRIVALE goes out of his way—true, it is only obiter—to fasten upon the case of timber goods as an illustration of where the words "good order" and "good condition" may perhaps have the same meaning. There is another point which counsel for the defendants was too chivalrous to press; the able and careful pleader had clearly not envisaged this subtle argument of his leader, because he also had fallen into the somewhat common fallacy, if counsel for the plaintiffs is right, of regarding the two words as covering a similar area. I deprecate excursions into dictionaries or into philological matters which are beyond my ken, but I can see no ground on which one can stand to differentiate in this case between the words "order" and "condition." I am, therefore, against the plaintiffs upon that contention, though I go wholeheartedly with them when they say, as a matter of con-

A struction, that the bills of lading should be construed in the way for which they contend.

I come to the second part of this question of estoppel. I called attention during the argument to LORD RUSSELL's recent pronouncement in Nippon Menkwa Kabushiki Kaisha v. Dawson's Bank, Ltd. (3) in the Privy Council upon this subject, and because it is, so far as my knowledge goes, the most lucid statement of the matter in a small compass, I will quote it again here. LORD RUSSELL said (51 Ll.L.Rep. at p. 150):

> "Estoppel is not a cause of action. It may (if established) assist a plaintiff in enforcing a cause of action by preventing a defendant from denying the existence of some fact essential to establish the cause of action, or (to put it in another way) by preventing a defendant from asserting the existence of some fact the existence of which would destroy the cause of action. It is a rule of evidence which comes into operation if (a) a statement of the existence of a fact has been made by the C defendant or an authorised agent of his to the plaintiff or someone on his behalf, (b) with the intention that the plaintiff should act upon the faith of the statement, and (c) the plaintiff does act upon the faith of the statement."

I have no difficulty here with regard to the first of the three conditions there laid down. I am satisfied that "a statement of the existence of a fact," namely, that the D goods were shipped in good order and condition, has been made by the defendants, or an authorised agent of theirs, to the plaintiffs or to someone on their behalf. I have equally no difficulty with regard to the second, that it was made "with the intention that the plaintiff should act upon the faith of the statement." But the crux comes over the third condition. Did the plaintiffs act upon the faith of the statement? As to that, a consideration of the dicta of the Court of Appeal in Silver v. Ocean Steamship E Co. (4) ([1930] 1 K.B. at pp. 428, 434, 441) is important. In that case all three judges of the Court of Appeal went further, I think, than anyone had gone up to that date in assisting plaintiffs placed in the difficult circumstances in which merchants are placed by these misstatements in bills of lading. SCRUTTON, L.J., said:

> "The last objection was that the witness did not say he relied on the bill of lading being a clean bill of lading by reason of the statement as to good order and con- F dition. The mercantile importance of clean bills of lading is so obvious and important that I think the fact that he took the bill of lading, which is in fact clean, without objection, is quite sufficient evidence that he relied on it."

GREER, L.J., stated much the same doctrine, though with a little doubt. He said this:

> G "I think, however, though with some doubt, that the court would be entitled to conclude on the grounds of high probability that he was influenced by the statement that the goods were shipped in apparent good order and condition, and that he must have believed that they were free from reasonably discoverable damage when shipped, and that in accepting the bill of lading and taking delivery he acted to his detriment, but I am not satisfied that all such damage would be apparent on any H reasonable examination. On the other hand, I am satisfied that if there was any considerable damage when the goods were shipped, in excess of the fifty cases that were rejected, a substantial part of such damage would have been discovered on a reasonable examination."

SLESSER, L.J., said:

> I "The appellant took the bill and may be assumed to have relied upon it to his detriment in the absence of any evidence to the contrary."

These observations certainly assist the plaintiffs in this case. The evidence was meagre, and, indeed, so far as this matter was concerned, confined to the evidence of the cashier of one of the shippers, who went so far as to say for his part that, had the bill of lading notified to him that the goods were shipped in bad condition, his principals would have claimed total rejection. I have no reason to suppose that that is not a perfectly bona fide statement on the part of the cashier. But at this point counsel for the defendants brought into play the contract upon which these goods had been bought, and I cannot see that he is not entitled to take the contract and analyse it for A the purpose of this case. Counsel for the plaintiffs said, among other things, that this contract is res inter alios acta. That is a perfectly fair comment, but, on the other hand, it is the res out of which the complaint here springs. The plaintiffs say: "We acted to our detriment in the matter of this contract owing to your misstatement." The whole of their estoppel must be based upon this contract, and I cannot see that it is wrong to examine the features of this contract, or, indeed, that one could act otherwise, B to test whether the plaintiffs are right in saying that they acted to their detriment. The doctrine laid down by the Court of Appeal in Silver v. Ocean Steamship Co. (4) gets the plaintiffs so far that they are entitled to say that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the court must assume that the plaintiffs did act to their detriment in taking up the bills of lading. It cannot take them far enough to be able to say that no evidence to the contrary can be considered. C

The contract says in the clearest possible terms:

> "Should any dispute arise respecting the fulfilment of this contract, or should the shipment be delayed beyond the time stipulated, the buyers shall not reject the goods, nor refuse immediate payment for same in manner stipulated. When due payment has been made, the dispute shall be referred to two arbitrators for settlement, one to be named by each party, with power to name a mercantile umpire. D The decision of such arbitrators or of their umpire to be conclusive and binding upon all disputing parties, the expense of such arbitration to be equally divided, and the decision may, and shall, be made a rule of His Majesty's High Court of Justice, on the application of either party."

Counsel for the plaintiffs cited several cases which, he says, go to show that the courts E would never allow such a clause to be weighed against the plaintiffs in these circumstances. He cited, among others, Amis, Swain & Co. v. Nippon Yusen Kabushiki Kaisha (5); the well-known decision of BIGHAM, J., in Vigers Bros. v. Sanderson Bros. (6); and the dictum of WRIGHT, J., in Evans v. James Webster Bros., Ltd. (7). I have looked through those cases with care and with sympathy with counsel's contention, but I cannot see that any of them have any real bearing upon this point. The circumstances F of those cases are widely different, and the only points of general doctrine to be collected were, first, the well-known doctrine that where goods were not of merchantable quality a buyer would be entitled to reject, and, secondly, that courts would not be astute to suppose that any merchant would be eager to break his contract. Counsel was bound to argue that he might have been in a better position if he had broken his contract. I cannot think that this is a tenable argument. It is difficult to see how courts of law are G to prosecute their business if they are to speculate upon what the rights and duties of persons are, not upon the theory that they keep their contracts, but on the theory that they break them. That is introducing, to my mind, a novel and most unwelcome class of speculation.

I think I must assume that the plaintiffs would have kept their contracts and, if so, in view of these wide words "should any dispute arise respecting the fulfilment of this H contract," and in view of the undisputed fact that these goods were goods within the contract description, I fail to see how they could have acted otherwise than as they did, even if the bills of lading had been what I prefer to call honestly claused rather than ambiguously claused. If they had been honestly and clearly claused as appertaining to damaged goods, so long as they did not suggest that the goods were unmerchantable or of different quality, and of different sizes to the contract goods, so far as I can see the I plaintiffs would have been obliged to do what they have done, namely, take up the documents, pay for the goods, and then seek an allowance by way of arbitration.

I am sorry to have had to come to this conclusion, but since the days when CHANNELL, J., gave his decision in Compania Naviera Vasconzada v. Churchill & Sim (1) it is common knowledge that there has been a great advance in this matter of commercial arbitration. It is not for me to say whether that is wise or unwise, but I cannot shut my eyes to it, and merchants cannot have it both ways. If they prefer to submit their disputes to commercial arbitration and to put clauses of this character into their contracts, I do not think that they can be heard to say that their position has been in any way altered by the fact that the bill of lading fails to give them information which would not have enabled them, in the circumstances, to act in a different way.

That, I think, disposes of what is really the main dispute, the question of the damaged goods. Because they cannot fulfil the third condition, showing that they have acted to their detriment, the plaintiffs cannot, I think, rely upon this question of estoppel. If they have not got estoppel and they have not got the ground of contract, there is nothing left of their case upon the question of damage.

The second point—the question of shortage—can, I think, be dealt with much more quickly. Here, again, there is really a question of construction. The point arises as regards two bills of lading only, one of them relating to a comparatively large parcel of 1,398 pieces. The bill of lading in that case stated the full number as being on board, but as to these 1,398 pieces it was claused in this way: "Being our order II and not on board of ship being lost from scow 5 during storm alongside." The description of the pieces was quite clear upon that bill of lading—1,320 deals and 78 ends, making 1,398. The second parcel as to which there was a shortage was as regards 494 pieces, and there the clause is "494 pieces of these lots not on board, being included in specification as being part of scow 5 lost from the ship." The question of construction as to what would be conveyed to persons reading these documents seems to me to be largely a question of first impression. Indeed, I am not sure that first impression is not really the safest guide—the natural and ordinary meaning when the document is presented to a merchant in the course of business. Applying this test, the two cases seem to me to fall upon different sides of the line. As regards the 1,398 pieces, I, personally, would, I think, have been perfectly clear as to what was intended, namely, that they never were on board the ship and were lost from the scow during a storm alongside. As regards the second, the 494 pieces, I am quite certain that my first feeling upon reading that clause would have been one of complete bewilderment, and I cannot imagine that that bewilderment would have been resolved if I had read further or studied more, and, therefore, I do not think, as regards the 494 pieces, that the bill of lading has been so claused as to bring to the mind of the person reading it that the 494 pieces were not shipped on board at some time. The importance of this ruling is that the charterparty contains a conclusive evidence clause, and there is, therefore, no doubt that the shipowner is bound by the quantity in the bills of lading, unless the bills make it perfectly clear that some portion of what is there stated as shipped on board was not delivered to the ship at all, and the undisputed effect of that conclusive evidence clause was to put the burden on the shipowner when once the number of pieces shipped has been stated in the bill of lading. My decision, therefore, on this matter of shortage is that the plaintiffs succeed as to the 494 pieces, but fail as to the shortage of 1,398 pieces.

DEWAR v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Romer and Maugham, L.JJ.), July 3, 1935]

[Reported [1935] 2 K.B. 351; 51 T.L.R. 360, 536; 153 L.T. 357; 104 L.J.K.B. 645; 79 Sol. Jo. 272, 522]

Surtax—Income for purposes of surtax—Interest payable on legacy—Legatee undecided whether to accept or disclaim interest.

By his will dated Oct. 22, 1927, a testator appointed J. A. D. and another to be his executors, and bequeathed to J. A. D. a legacy of £1,000,000 free of legacy duty and also two-thirds of his residuary estate. On April 11, 1930, the testator died, and accordingly as from April 11, 1931, the legacy carried interest at four per cent. per annum. On April 14, 1932, acting on advice, J. A. D. decided to allow the question of interest on the legacy to stand over, but on that date he commenced to draw sums on account of the legacy. The estate was at all material times sufficient for the payment of the interest, but J. A. D. did not in fact receive interest. For the year ending April 5, 1933, J. A. D. was assessed to surtax in a sum which included £40,000, representing interest at four per cent. on the legacy.

Held: the £40,000 was wrongly included in the assessment and was not liable to surtax because (a) J. A. D. had not received the interest, (b) he had not exercised any dominion over it, and (c) the money was not under his control; and, therefore, J. A. D. had not enjoyed the £40,000 so as to render it taxable, it being irrelevant that the money had not been received or placed at his disposal owing to his own voluntary act or omission.

Appeal by the Crown from an order of FINLAY, J., dated April 5, 1935, reported 153 L.T. 357. The matter came before FINLAY, J., on a Case Stated under the Finance Act, 1927, s. 42 (7), and Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149, by the Commissioners for the

A Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on May 10, 1934, Mr. John Arthur Dewar (hereinafter called the taxpayer) appealed against an assessment to surtax in the sum of £50,180 for the year ending April 5, 1933.

2. By his will dated Oct. 22, 1927, Lord Dewar, after appointing the taxpayer and Mr. B Peter Dewar to be the executors and trustees thereof, bequeathed to the taxpayer the sum of £1,000,000 free of legacy duty. Under the said will the taxpayer was also residuary legatee to the extent of two-thirds of the residue of Lord Dewar's estate.

3. Lord Dewar died on April 11, 1930, and his said will was proved on May 30, 1930.

4. As from April 11, 1931 (one year from the date of the death of Lord Dewar), the said legacy of £1,000,000 in law carried interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum C on such part of it as for the time being was unpaid.

5. The first payment received by the taxpayer in respect of the said legacy was made on April 14, 1932.

6. The estate of Lord Dewar was at all times material to this case sufficient to enable interest to be paid on the said legacy.

7. On or about April 14, 1932, the taxpayer, acting on the advice of his accountant, D decided to allow the question of interest on the said legacy to stand over and he has not at any time received any sum in respect of interest thereon. It was stated by the taxpayer's counsel on his behalf that the taxpayer at the date of this appeal had made no election as to whether or not he would claim the interest.

8. In the assessment under appeal there is included a sum of £40,000 representing interest at four per cent. on the said legacy of £1,000,000.

E 9. It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer that: (a) In computing the taxpayer's total income for the purposes of surtax no sum fell to be included in respect of interest on the said legacy. (b) The assessment should be reduced by £40,000.

10. It was contended on behalf of the Crown that: (a) The said sum of £40,000 was at all material times at the disposal of the taxpayer, and was, therefore, correctly included in the computation of his total income for the purposes of surtax for the year ending F April 5, 1933. (b) The assessment was correct in principle and amount and should be confirmed.

11. Having considered the evidence and arguments adduced before them, the commissioners decided as follows:

> "(1) The question for our decision in this case is whether a sum of £40,000, representing interest at four per cent. on a legacy of £1,000,000 bequeathed to the [taxpayer] under the will of his uncle Lord Dewar, should be included in the assessment to surtax made upon the [taxpayer] for the year 1932–33.
> "(2) Under the said will the [taxpayer] was appointed an executor and also became entitled to two-thirds of the residuary estate.
> "(3) It was admitted that as from April 11, 1931 (one year from Lord Dewar's H death), the [taxpayer] was entitled to interest at four per cent. on the legacy of £1,000,000, and it was further admitted that the estate was at all material times able to pay the said interest.
> "(4) Acting on the advice of his accountant, the [taxpayer] on April 14, 1932, decided to allow the question of interest on the legacy to stand over, but on that date he commenced to draw sums on account of the legacy.
> I "The [taxpayer] has not in fact received any sum on account of interest on the legacy.
> "(5) In our opinion the principle laid down in such cases as St. Lucia Estates v. St. Lucia (Colonial Treasurer) (1) and Lambe v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (2) does not apply to a case such as the present where there has been no default in payment.
> "In this case the [taxpayer] has for the present for reasons of his own voluntarily waived his right to receive the payment of interest, and on these facts we hold that the voluntary foregoing of the interest ought to be regarded simply as being an application of the interest: (see Reade v. Brearley (3), 17 Tax Cas. at p. 693, per FINLAY, J.). A

"(6) We, therefore, hold that the said sum of £40,000 has been correctly included in the assessment under appeal which will stand confirmed."

12. The [taxpayer] immediately after the termination of the appeal declared to the commissioners his dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law, and in due course required them to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to B the Finance Act, 1927, s. 42 (7), and Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149.

FINLAY, J., held that the £40,000 was not liable to surtax and should not have been included in the assessment.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and R. P. Hills for the Crown.
Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., A. M. Latter, K.C., and A. Andrewes-Uthwatt for the taxpayer. C

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of FINLAY, J., upon a Case Stated, and the question that has to be determined is whether or not the taxpayer, Mr. John Arthur Dewar, is liable under an assessment in respect of a sum of £40,000 which was an item included in an assessment made upon him for a total sum of £50,180 for surtax in the year ending April 5, 1933.

Lord Dewar by his will, which was dated in October, 1927, appointed the taxpayer D and Mr. Peter Dewar to be executors and trustees of his will, and he bequeathed to the taxpayer a sum of £1,000,000 free of legacy duty. Under the will the taxpayer was also residuary legatee to the extent of two-thirds of the residue of Lord Dewar's estate. Lord Dewar died on April 11, 1930. His will was proved on May 30 of the same year, and what may be called the executors' year expired on April 11, 1931, and from and after that time the executors had to pay the sum of £1,000,000, the legacy which had E come to the taxpayer, and it is stated in the Case that this legacy carried interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum for such time and upon such part of it as remained unpaid. It is perhaps not unimportant to bear in mind that this right to be paid interest is an old-established, I think I may say, custom. It is not derived under the statute of Will. 4. In Wood v. Penoyre (4) decided in 1807, SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., said:

> "Wherever legacies are given out of personal estate, consisting of outstanding F securities, those legacies cannot be actually paid until the money due upon such securities is actually got in; but by a rule that has been adopted for the sake of general convenience this court holds the personal estate to be reduced into possession within a year after the death of the testator. Upon that ground interest is payable upon legacies from that time, unless some other period is fixed by the G will."

To quote a modern confirmation of that same rule, this is to be found in Re Stokes, Bowen v. Davidson (5), where it was held that the ordinary rule was that a legacy carried interest only from a year after the death. That is based upon the definite rule which has been adopted now for so long.

Therefore, the position on April 12, 1931, was that the taxpayer was entitled to receive H his legacy and if and so long as the payment of the legacy or a part of it was in default, he would be entitled to ask for and to receive under that rule interest on the delayed portion of the legacy at the rate of four per cent. As a matter of fact, the payments that had been made on account of the legacy were small. During the course of the year 1932–33 the total sum that was paid on account of it was, if my figures are correct, £115,000, paid in comparatively small sums. There is one cheque of £30,000, one cheque I of £20,000, one cheque of £28,000, and the other cheques are all of smaller sums.

On April 14, 1932, the taxpayer, acting on the advice of his accountant, decided to allow the question of interest on the legacy to stand over, and he has not at any time received any sum in respect of interest thereon. It was stated by his counsel that the taxpayer at the date of appeal had made no election as to whether he would or would not claim interest. But in spite of that in this assessment, which is made upon him for the year ending April 5, 1933, an assessment to surtax, he is treated as having received £40,000, representing the interest on the total value of the legacy delayed for a total time of twelve months. In fact, the taxpayer, as is found in the case, has not received any sum on account of interest on the legacy.

The way in which it is claimed that he ought to be subject to assessment in respect of £40,000 is that the £40,000 was at all material times at his disposal. Exactly what does that mean? The taxpayer in his capacity as legatee could demand from the executors, of which he was one, that from and after April 12, 1932, the legacy should be paid, and if and when it was not paid he could demand that there should be interest on the aliquot portion not paid or handed over to him. The fact is found that the estate was in a position under which it could have paid the interest and I suppose the legacy too. The actual terms of the findings are:

> "It was admitted that as from April 11, 1931 (one year from Lord Dewar's death) the [taxpayer] was entitled to interest at four per cent. on the legacy of £1,000,000, and it was further admitted that the estate was at all material times able to pay the said interest."

I pause there, upon these facts, to consider what the position is. He has made, in his capacity as legatee, no demand for the full payment of the legacy, or at the material times he had not, and he has made no demand for payment of interest upon it. He has been quiescent in that. He has occupied a position which is neutral. Ought that £40,000 then to be included in the assessment upon him and on what ground? It is said that it was at his disposal. Now observe the facts. It is not a case in which the legatee, exercising his own volition, has told the executors to put the money into a bank or to hold it in a bank to his use; he has not made any direction of any sort or kind in respect of the £40,000. The money is left in this way, that if he were minded to ask for £40,000, or a part of it, it would have been possible for him to have been paid and to have received it. But the fact is he has not done anything at all in respect of that and the money has not been appropriated to his use, it has not been deposited at his direction, and it is not lying under his name, either in the hands of the bank or any other agent.

It is not quite easy to see why this total sum of £40,000 should be claimed, because upon the facts indicated on the table of payments, it does not appear that the £40,000 is a sum which would have been payable if the taxpayer had made a demand, which as I say he has not done. But I pass over that entirely, and I treat it like this: can there be a liability to pay super tax in respect of this sum not received, not lying to his use or to his order, but in respect of which the Crown say that he should have exercised his powers, and so it is to be treated as at his disposal?

I want to make two observations in reference to income tax and surtax generally. As has often been pointed out, if the subject is within a charging section, he must pay; if he is not within the charging section he has not got to pay. No doubt there can be cases in which some specious documents have been executed for the purpose of appearing to have effected a disposal of money or property so as to, what is called, evade a tax which ought to be paid. But where there is no such device resorted to, it is not true to say that a man who does not pay is evading the tax. You have got to show that the tax is exigible in the facts of the case, and if it is not exigible it is not a case of evasion at all. The words of LORD HALSBURY in Bullivant v. A.-G. for Victoria (6) ([1901] A.C. at p. 202) make that abundantly plain:

> "People are not bound to continue in the same condition of things, either as regards their direct or indirect taxation, which will render either the consumption of articles in the one case, or the property they have in the other, always liable to the tax," and he points out that the word "evasion" is not an accurate word to use with regard to cases where the facts do not bring the charge down upon the subject.

The other observation I want to make is this, and it is the answer which SIR LESLIE SCOTT gave to the proposition advanced by the Attorney-General, that there would be a serious danger in this case, or some other cases if, the subject not being liable under the words of a particular section of a statute, this court were to hold, for instance, that the words which are to be found in Sched. D of the Act of 1918, under cl. 1 of Sched. D, "the annual profits or gains arising or accruing," words which are not found in cl. 1 (b) ought to be carried over and made applicable to (b), although they are not there. SIR LESLIE SCOTT pointed out that if the words are not there you cannot, in a taxing Act, bring them forward for the purpose of the Crown. Either in the clear words of a taxing statute the subject is liable, or if he is not within the words he is not liable.

Some observations made in the speech of LORD SUMNER in Ormond Investment Co., Ltd. v. Betts (7) are relevant upon this point. That was a case in which in this court we had applied a certain rule, which was applicable to Cases I and II of Sched. D to the rules which are applicable to the receipt of dividends of foreign securities, and we had treated it as analogous. LORD SUMNER says ([1928] A.C. at p. 158):

> "In its express terms this rule applies to trading profits. The contention is that by analogy it can be applied to foreign shares, which are not in themselves stock-in-trade and the dividends of which are not trading profits. I cannot accept this. The analogy between the date of starting a trade, which is an aggregate of many operations, and the date when an investor buys a stock to hold, is too remote to be applicable, and in any case the Crown does not tax by analogy but by statute, and there is nothing in the Act which says what is here contended for. It is said that singular results and even a loss of tax will occur on the appellants' contention, and that this cannot have been intended by the legislature, but it is not for us to say, nor do we know, what the legislature may or may not have meant, apart from their words, by which we are bound alike to what they say and in what they do not. Words which impose tax in general terms may still receive a particular limitation where the computation rules omit the directions appropriate and indispensable to levying the tax in the particular case."

That passage is very important. It supports the view presented by SIR LESLIE SCOTT that you must construe the taxing Act strictly and you cannot apply a doctrine of analogies to it. You cannot impute what you may think the legislature may or may not have meant; you are bound by the words as to what they have done and what they have not done.

I, therefore, turn to see whether or not the statutes which apply to surtax cover this case upon the facts which I have recounted. I have come to the conclusion, in association with FINLAY, J., that they do not, and I think FINLAY, J.'s judgment is right. Surtax is the successor of super tax. Super tax was originally established by the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, s. 66, which imposed a further income tax called super tax. When the Income Tax Act, 1918, was passed, ss. 4 and 5 imposed the super tax. Section 4 of the Act of 1918 provides:

> "In addition to the income tax charged at the rate prescribed for any year, there shall be charged, levied, and paid for that year in respect of the income of any individual, the total of which from all sources exceeds £2,500, an additional duty of income tax (in this Act referred to as super tax). . . ."

Section 5 (1) provides:

> "For the purposes of super tax, the total income of any individual from all sources shall be taken to be the total income of that individual from all sources for the previous year, estimated in the same manner as the total income from all sources is estimated for the purposes of exemption or abatement under this Act. . . ."

That is how super tax originated.

We have got its successor, surtax, and surtax was imposed, or the plan of surtax was imposed, because it enabled a single return to be made which could be used for the income tax and for the surtax. The result is that by the Finance Act, 1926, there were modifications made in the matter of the super tax, and by the Finance Act, 1927, we have the first reference and imposition of what is called surtax. In the Finance Act, 1927, s. 38 (1) (b) it is provided that if the tax payable in respect of the total income of the individual > "is greater than the amount which would have been payable by him in respect thereof if income tax had been chargeable at the standard rate only, the difference > between those two amounts (in this part of this Act referred to as 'surtax') shall be computed, assessed, charged, collected and paid as a deferred instalment of income tax according to the provisions of this part of this Act relating to surtax."

In its essence, therefore, whether it is super tax or whether surtax, it is a deferred instalment of income tax, and it is to be assessed, charged, collected and paid as an instalment, but a deferred instalment, of income tax.

Under s. 100 of the Act of 1918 it is provided that there shall be a return made by "every person chargeable under this Act," and the correct statement in writing is to contain > "the amount of the profits or gains arising to him, from each and every source chargeable according to the respective schedules."

Observe, it says, "arising to him." If it has not arisen to him, if he has not become the dominus of this sum, if it does not lie to his order in the hands of his agent, can it be said that it has arisen to him? I think the answer definitely upon the facts must be: No, it has not. Then

> "the amount of the profits or gains arising to him according to the provisions and rules of this Act."

We turn, therefore, to Sched. D to see what is charged by Sched. D. Sched. D, under cl. 1 (a), deals with annual profits or gains arising or accruing from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, but it goes on under cl. 1 (b) to say that the tax under this schedule shall be charged in respect of "all interest of money, annuities and other annual profits." This is undoubtedly interest of money. It, therefore, falls under cl. 1 (b) and not under cl. 1 (a). Clause 1 (b) does not contain, as I have already pointed out, the words "profits or gains arising or accruing," and following the direction of LORD SUMNER, I am quite unable to introduce those words into cl. 1 (b).

Then under cl. 2 we have that general direction broken up into the various cases, and the suitable case in respect of this sum is Case III,

> "tax in respect of profits of an uncertain value and of other income described in the rules applicable to this case."

One turns, therefore, to the rules applicable to this case, and one finds that r. 1 provides:

> "The tax shall extend to—(a) any interest of money, whether yearly or otherwise, or any annuity or other annual payment whether such payment is payable . . . either as a charge on any property or as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract, or whether the same is received and payable half-yearly or at any shorter or more distant periods."

I think the words "received and payable" there are cut down by "half-yearly or at any shorter or more distant periods." The word "payable" there does not mean: if you like to put out your hand and ask for it it will then be payable to you; it is dealing with a sum which, whether yearly or otherwise, is in fact received, whether it is payable and in fact received half-yearly or at any shorter or more distant periods. That is the rule which applies here. Can it be said here that there has arisen a personal debt or obligation? Something more is required than the mere fact that there is a capacity on the part of the estate to pay the money if it should be demanded. But it does not say—it cannot be said—that there is a debt when there has been no demand.

I turn on to Case IV for the purpose of illustrating by way of contrast what is provided and laid down as to income tax. Case IV relates to income arising from securities out of the United Kingdom, and you find in r. 1 under Case IV:

> "The tax in respect of income arising from securities in any place out of the United Kingdom shall be computed on the full amount thereof arising in the year of assessment, whether the income has been or will be received in the United Kingdom or not."

This and other provisions have been enacted for dealing with a practice which obtained whereby persons who were entitled to dividends or income arising from securities situate abroad gave a direction that those dividends or income should be paid to an agent or bank abroad and left there. The sums were at their disposal, the sums were had and received to their use, but they were not brought over to this country in the hope thereby of escaping the tax which would have fallen upon them. Rule 1 and other provisions have prevented that device from succeeding and a taxpayer must include in his return sums which are lying at his disposal, whether the income or dividend has been remitted to this country or not. But so far one has not found anything in Sched. D which says that a sum of money which is not a debt and has not been received and is not in the hands of an agent, is to be taxable. Case V also deals with profits or gains not falling under any of the foregoing cases, and it is complementary to Case IV.

In the Miscellaneous Rules applicable to Sched. D, r. 1 is:

> "Tax under this Schedule shall be charged on and paid by the persons or bodies of persons receiving or entitled to the income in respect of which tax under this Schedule is hereinbefore directed to be charged."

Some emphasis is placed upon those words "entitled to." When all conditions have been fulfilled it may be treated as his income. But the words are sufficiently fulfilled by your treating the "receiving" as applicable to the money which has been paid over to the subject, and "entitled to" means moneys which the subject has got at his disposal but which have not at the present time been remitted from another country to him. It appears to me that there is no emphasis to be placed either one way or the other upon that.

Then reference is made to the declaration under cl. 17, which is to be found in the Dowell's Income Tax Laws (9th Edn.), at p. 787. Here there is required to be made by the subject, first,

> "A declaration of the amount of value of property or profits or gains returned, or for which the claimant has been, or is liable to be, assessed."

Then, secondly, sums "in respect of which the claimant is liable to allow the tax, with the names of the respective persons by whom such payments are to be made"—that gives information to the Revenue authorities—and, thirdly, ground rent and the like; and, fourthly, the ultimate statement, when those steps have been gone through indicated in the first, second and third declarations, of the amount of income derived according to the three preceding declarations. I do not dwell upon the actual machinery sections, but those are the sections which are material for the return by the subject of moneys which are subject to, or caught by, or rendered chargeable to income tax or surtax, and in none of those do I find the apt words to deal with this sum which has not yet been reduced at least into possession, and which is not a matter of a dividend arising from a foreign possession.

The matter is not without some guidance from authority. In Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Blott; Same v. Greenwood (8), there is a statement by Lord Finlay ([1921] 2 A.C. at p. 195) where he says this:

> "There can be no super tax upon income unless it has been received by the taxpayer."

Then he quotes the passage from Pitney, J., in Eisner v. Macomber (9). No doubt those words must be taken in relation to the whole paragraph. It could not be taken as an exhaustive statement because there can be super tax on some sum which has not been actually received into the pocket over here of the subject, but which is received in this sense that it is under his control and standing in his agents' hands. But it is plain, from the whole passage, that Lord Finlay is seeking first to find out whether there has been in any case a sum actually received or potentially received in the sense that it is at the disposal of the subject. In Simpson v. Maurice's Executors (10) (14 Tax Cas. at p. 601) there is the following passage:

> "The facts must be taken as they are in truth and in substance: then, if income tax attaches, it can be recovered; but if it does not attach then the income tax is lost from it," and you cannot torture the facts in order to see how the aliquot part of it can be received by the Crown.

In St. Lucia Usines and Estates Co. v. St. Lucia (Colonial Treasurer) (1) Lord Wrenbury applied a test, and says ([1924] A.C. at p. 512):

> "The words 'income arising or accruing' [words which we have not got in the present case] are not equivalent to the words 'debts arising or accruing.' To give them that meaning is to ignore the word 'income.' The words mean 'money arising or accruing by way of income.' There must be a coming in to satisfy the word 'income.'"

Again, those words must be taken in their true sense, because that is not an exhaustive definition of what is taxable under an Income Tax Act. Profits and gains are taxable, although they do not in the true sense come in. The profit and gain which arises from the occupation of property, and which falls under Sched. A, is subject to income tax, although there is not something actually coming in, but there is something enjoyed, and that is the gain which is covered by the tax. Nor is it literally true to say what Lord Macnaghten said in London County Council v. A.-G. (11), words which have been often quoted and misquoted. Lord Macnaghten is dealing in that case with the proposition which was made by the then Attorney-General, that income tax could be a tax upon capital. The Attorney-General had said that it is a tax not only on income, but on capital, and Lord Macnaghten, answering that, said that income tax was a tax on income, and not meant to be a tax on anything else. Again that is not intended to be an exhaustive definition and must be treated in the sense in which it is used. But all those observations tend in this direction, that you must find something which is in the enjoyment of the subject. He could make use of the money which lies abroad to his use. It is in that sense in his enjoyment. At the present time, upon the present facts, there is no enjoyment by him, there is no gain by him, he has derived no profit and there is nothing in his hands which will answer the test of what you mean by "income."

Then I come to Leigh v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (12), in which Rowlatt, J., whose experience and knowledge of the Income Tax Acts was quite unrivalled, says ([1928] 1 K.B. at p. 77):

> "It is to be remembered that for income tax purposes 'receivability' without receipt is nothing. Before a good debt is paid there is no such thing as income tax upon it."

I agree with those words. It appears to me that the reason why you make up the return for the particular year is that you look to see in the course of that twelve months what has been received, and it may be that a good debt will be paid in a subsequent twelve months and not in the twelve months in respect of which you are making your declaration, and you cannot anticipate that the money will come in in its proper place in the following twelve months. I think Rowlatt, J., was right in saying that for income tax purposes receivability without receipt is nothing.

Finally, with regard to Lambe v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (2), I do not want to say anything about that case. If the subject had in any way intervened so as to say what was to be the disposal of this sum, he would have become liable to tax. You cannot, by the use which you make of a sum which has been received or which has come into your disposal, escape tax. But the truth here is that upon the facts there has been no receipt and there has been no disposal by the taxpayer, of this sum of money. There are no apt words in respect of that which would fit the case, and I cannot mould or adapt the words which do not exist in the relevant sections from sections where they do exist so as to make the taxpayer liable to this sum. The truth of the matter is that it either falls within the table which is to be returned of sums which he has received and in respect of which he is liable to tax, or it does not, and upon the facts of this case it does not fall within that table and therefore I have come to the conclusion that tax is not exigible and the decision of Finlay, J., is right. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. For the purposes of this case, it does not appear to me to be necessary to ascertain the origin or the precise nature of a legatee's right to receive interest on an unpaid legacy as from the expiration of one year from the testator's death. I am perfectly willing to approach this case on the footing that the taxpayer had £1,000,000 owing to him upon which interest was payable at the rate of four per cent. per annum as from April 11, 1931. The question which has to be determined in those circumstances is whether, no such interest having, in fact, been paid to the taxpayer or placed at his disposal—the taxpayer contemplating the possibility, though he has not definitely made up his mind about it yet, of releasing his debtor altogether from the claim to interest—he is nevertheless assessable in respect of such interest, or the interest for the year ending April 5, 1932, assessable in respect of that interest to surtax.

Surtax, as the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, as distinct from super tax, was first heard of when the Finance Act, 1927, was passed. I do not intend to read the relevant sections of Part III of that Act. It is sufficient to say that no item of property is assessable to surtax in any year unless income tax at the standard rate could be claimed in respect of that item of property for that year. So that the question to be determined on this appeal is whether, in respect of the interest for the year ending April 5, 1932, the taxpayer, I will not say became liable to be assessed, because in no case would he be liable to be assessed as I understand the law, but whether interest for that year became liable to income tax at the standard rate. If it did it must be by virtue of the Income Tax Act, 1918, Sched. D, cl. 1 (b), namely, as being interest of money. So far cl. 1 (b) of Sched. D does not throw any light upon the question of what interest of money is brought into tax, nor is any further light thrown on that subject by cl. 2 of the schedule which contains the cases under which tax under the schedule is to be charged. The particular case that applies here, if the schedule applies at all, is Case III:

> "Tax in respect of profits of an uncertain value and of other income described in the rules applicable to this case."

It is not until you come to look at the rules applicable to the case that light is thrown upon the question of what interest is chargeable under Sched. D, cl. 1 (b).

Rule 2 of the rules applicable to Case III is as follows:

> "The tax shall, subject as hereinafter provided, be computed (a) as respects the year of assessment in which the profits or income first arise on the full amount of the profits or income arising within that year; and (b) as respects subsequent years of assessment, on the full amount of the profits or income arising within the year preceding the year of assessment."

Interest, therefore, for the year ending April 5, 1932, is not taxable under Sched. D, unless it can be properly described as being "profits or income arising within that year."

We are not without assistance from the authorities upon the question as to what is income. I will not read the passages with which the Master of the Rolls has already dealt, with the exception of the statement made by Lord Wrenbury in St. Lucia Usines and Estates Co. v. St. Lucia (Colonial Treasurer) (1) ([1924] A.C. at p. 512). He is dealing with the meaning of the word "income," and he says:

> "The words 'income arising or accruing' are not equivalent to the words 'debts arising or accruing.' To give them that meaning is to ignore the word 'income.' The words mean 'money arising or accruing by way of income.' There must be a coming in to satisfy the word 'income.'"

Much to the same effect was said by Rowlatt, J., in Leigh v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (12) ([1928] 1 K.B. 73) and Lord Finlay in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Blott (8) ([1921] 2 A.C. 171), and Finlay, J., in Lambe v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (2) ([1934] 1 K.B. 178). Has there been a coming in of interest for the year ending April 5, 1932? Assuredly there has not. That being so, it appears to me that the interest for that year is not brought into tax by Sched. D.

It is said, and said truly, that it has not been received by the taxpayer or placed at his disposal owing to his voluntary act or omission; that is to say, the interest has not been paid, not because the debtor cannot pay it, but because the taxpayer has not thought fit to ask for payment, and, further, has intimated the possibility of his releasing the creditor altogether from payment of that interest. But for the purposes of income tax, one does not take an account of a possible income on the footing of wilful default. The question is what income the man has received, and not what income he has received or but for his wilful default might have received. The truth of the matter here is that no one owes a duty to the State to maintain his assessment for surtax at the highest possible figure. If a subject thinks proper so to do he assuredly may get rid of an income-bearing security for the purposes of avoiding the addition of the income from that security to his assessment for surtax purposes. That is admitted. A tenant for life, if he thinks fit, may surrender his life interest. If he does so, most assuredly he does not remain liable to be assessed to income tax in respect of the income which he has surrendered, and I for myself can see no reason why a man should not, if he thinks fit, retain the corpus of an income-bearing fund and release his right to receive the income, either for one year or two years or altogether. If he does so, in my opinion, he does not receive the interest. For that reason that interest cannot be assessed for surtax.

For those reasons, it seems to me the learned judge arrived at a right conclusion in this case and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I am of the same opinion and desire to say only a few words in reference to the case. I do not want, in what I am going to add, there to be any doubt as to the correctness of what has fallen from my brother ROMER on the more general propositions. But I want, in a few words, if I can, to explain grounds on which, I think, without going quite so far, the judgment of the learned judge can be supported.

We are dealing here with a claim for surtax for the year ending April 5, 1933, and I think it is beyond dispute that the claim is based on a claim of right to tax levied under Case III of Sched. D. The sum involved is a large sum of £40,000, interest said to be due in respect of a pecuniary legacy of £1,000,000.

For my part I attribute some importance to the fact that the taxpayer cannot be compelled to receive interest on that legacy. The legal position, as explained in the rather quaint language of SHEPHERD'S TOUCHSTONE at pp. 284 and 285, is that the law will not compel a man to take property bequeathed to him by will against his will. I concede that there is no doubt at all that in the case of pecuniary legacies the legatee is entitled to disclaim part of the legacy, if he likes, and to disclaim in particular the interest on the legacy, being a pecuniary legacy, if he so wishes. The disclaimer may be inferred from the conduct of the party, and it certainly may arise from a parol statement by the legatee, and no release under seal, or anything of that sort, is required in such a case.

Having said that, I want to observe that it is beyond doubt that the standard of the assessment varies according to the source from which the taxable income is derived and that we are not dealing here with a case which might well have a different result, of interest payable in respect of a foreign possession, because there there are exceptional words. The point that arises is whether the principle which is to be derived from such cases as the St. Lucia Usines and Estates Co. v. St. Lucia Colonial Treasurer (1), Lambe v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (2), and I will add Leigh v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (12)—all cases which decided that tax was not leviable where income of the nature therein mentioned was not received—does not apply to such a case as the present, for the reason given by the Commissioners for Special Purposes, that there has been no default in payment. For my part, I accept the view that there has been no default in payment, and I understand the finding in the Special Case "the [taxpayer] has for the present for reasons of his own voluntarily waived his right to receive the payment of interest," as meaning no more than this, that he has not claimed such interest.

For the reasons given, in particular by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, who has dealt with those cases in some detail, I am of opinion that the cases were correctly decided and that they do not depend on or relate solely to cases where there has been a default in payment by a debtor. I think they have a wider range than that, and include cases where the debtor, if there is a debtor, for some reason other than default, and without any act on behalf of the creditor which might be alleged to amount to an exercise of dominion over the debt, has not in fact paid the sum of interest in question during the year of assessment.

As I have said, I do not want to elaborate what has already been said in the cases. I accept as correct the judgment of FINLAY, J., in Lambe's Case (2) and for the reasons he states there. I accept the decision of ROWLATT, J., in Leigh v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (12) as also being correct for the reasons he gave. I do not regard those decisions as limited to cases where there is a debt and the debtor has committed default. I think in the present case two circumstances may be accurately stated in regard to the sum of £40,000 which it is said can be brought into charge. The first is that the sum of £40,000 was not during the year of assessment a debt due by the executors to the taxpayer, and, secondly, that the sum in question may never be paid or received at all.

In those circumstances, I think the decisions, which I follow, are sufficient to give reasons for the dismissing of the present appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Tomlin, Lord Russell and Lord Macmillan), December 7, 13, 1934, February 14, 1935]

Will—Gift of share to person "leaving issue him surviving"—Inclusion of issue en ventre sa mère at person's death.

Words in a testamentary disposition referring to children or issue "born" before, or "living" at, or "surviving," a particular point of time or event will not, in their ordinary or natural meaning, include a child en ventre sa mère at the relevant date, but the ordinary or natural meaning of the words may be departed from and a fictional construction applied to them so as to include therein a child en ventre sa mère at the relevant date and subsequently born alive if, but only if, such fictional construction will secure to such child a benefit to which it would have been entitled if it had been actually born at the relevant date. The only reason and justification for applying such a fictional construction is that where a person makes a gift to a class of children or issue described as "born" before or "living" at or "surviving" a particular point of time a child en ventre sa mère must necessarily be within the reason and motive of the gift. So, if the person who uses the words confers no gift on the children or issue described, but confers the gift on someone else, it is impossible (except in the light of subsequent events) to affirm either that the fictional construction will secure to the child en ventre sa mère a benefit which, if born, it would be entitled to, or that the child en ventre sa mère must necessarily be within the reason and motive of the gift made. In those circumstances the words used must bear their ordinary or natural meaning.

The testatrix, who died in 1912, by her will, in exercise of a power of appointment given to her under her father's will, appointed that a fund subject to the power should after her death be held in trust for all or any of her children who should survive her and, being male, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being female, should attain that age or marry under it, and if more than one in equal shares. She directed that the income on a share should be paid to each child of hers during the period of twenty-one years from her death, and, if any child of hers should die within the twenty-one years without having appointed his or her share as mentioned in the will, then (a) in the event of such child of hers "leaving any issue him or her surviving," in trust for such child of hers absolutely; and (b) in the event of such child of hers "not leaving issue him or her surviving" such share should go to the share or shares of any other child or children of the testatrix who should survive her. The testatrix left a son who died intestate before the termination of the period of twenty-one years, leaving a widow, who was enceinte at his death and gave birth to a posthumous child thirty-two days afterwards. On the question whether this son's share of the appointed legacy should go to the representative of his estate, or accrue by way of addition to the shares of other children of the testatrix.

Held: if the fictional construction were applied to the words "issue him surviving" in the will the result would be, not to bring the posthumous child within the benefit of the bequest as a direct participator therein, but to benefit his father's estate; the child's interest in that estate as his father's next of kin was not sufficient to bring him within the reason and motive of the bequest; and, therefore, the gift over must take effect.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Lawrence and Romer, L.JJ.).

The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Russell.

The Court of Appeal held, affirming the decision of Clauson, J., that the basis of the rule that a devise or bequest to children born or to children living at a given period included a child en ventre at that period and born afterwards was that the potential existence of such a child placed it within the reason and motive of the gift, and it was enough that there should be an interest, not in the child considered alone, but an indirect benefit to it by a benefit given to its parent or parents.

H. B. Vaisey, K.C., and Norman C. Armitage for the trustees of the will.

The House took time for consideration.

Feb. 14. LORD TOMLIN.—I have had the advantage of considering the opinion which has been prepared and is about to be read by my noble and learned friend, Lord Russell. In the conclusion of that opinion, and in the reasoning on which it is based, I concur in all respects. It is, therefore, unnecessary for me to do more than state shortly the main reasons why I think, as I do, that the courts below have erred.

I may note here that the attention of the courts below was not directed to the fact that Mrs. Elliot was domiciled in Scotland and that her will falls to be construed by Scots law. This oversight, however, raises no difficulty. Your Lordships' House, as the ultimate appellate tribunal both of England and of Scotland, does not require proof of the law of either country, whether the case under consideration be an English case in which a question of Scots law arises, or a case from Scotland in which a question of English law arises, see Cooper v. Cooper (1) (13 App. Cas. at p. 101).

The first question raised by the will under consideration is one of construction. The critical words are found in the two phrases:

> "In the event of such child of mine leaving any issue him or her surviving [and] in the event of such child of mine not leaving any issue him or her surviving."

I cannot think that upon the true construction of these words a posthumous child of a child of the testatrix is issue left by the parent him surviving. The expression "leaving any issue him or her surviving" is not in its ordinary and natural meaning appropriate to include a posthumous child, and there is nothing, in my opinion, in the context to justify extending the meaning. On the one hand, it is no answer to say that the testatrix intended to cover every contingency, because upon either construction every contingency is covered. Nor is it permissible to adapt the meaning to give effect to what it may be thought would have been the wish of the testatrix if her attention had been called to the possibility of that happening, which in fact happened. On the other hand, the period of distribution is the date of the death of the parent of the posthumous child. The parent or the brothers of the parent are, according to the event, the donee or donees under the appointment. The posthumous child is not a donee nor even an object of the power. There is nothing in the language of the will to suggest or justify the holding up of the distribution to meet the contingency of the birth of a posthumous child who, when born, will not be and cannot be a donee under the appointment.

It remains, therefore, to consider whether there can be applied to this case the doctrine based upon the maxim "fœtus in utero habetur pro jam nato ubi agitur de ejus commodo." So far as the English law is concerned the doctrine in question was explained in your Lordships' House in Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2). If the decision in Burns's Trustees v. Burns (3) is to be accepted as good law the doctrine is not recognised in Scotland. Having regard to the view which I take as to the limits of the doctrine, it is not necessary for the purposes of this case expressly to deal with the decision in Burns's Trustees v. Burns (3), but I desire to say that as at present advised it seems to me to be in conflict with the statements of writers of authority (e.g., see Lord McLaren's work on Wills and Succession, 3rd ed., vol. 1, p. 696), and to be unsupported by any earlier decision.

A But, assuming that the doctrine has effect in Scotland and that in regard to it English law and Scots law are the same, I am of opinion that the doctrine cannot be applied in the present case.

It is admitted that there is no example in the books of the doctrine, which is really an artificial rule of construction, being applied to the word "surviving" or to the phrase "leaving surviving," but, assuming that in appropriate circumstances it is B applicable, as I think it is, to this word or phrase, the question is: Are the circumstances appropriate here, or, in other words, is it within the meaning of the rule for the child's benefit to apply the rule? The child does not take, and could not take, any benefit directly under the gift. The courts below have taken the view that it must be for the child's benefit as a general proposition that its parent's estate should be increased. The application of this artificial rule of construction cannot, of course, depend upon the C way in which the parent in fact disposes of his estate or upon his domicil at his death or upon the accident of the law applicable to his estate at his death. I do not think the enrichment of the parent's estate is a benefit to the child within the meaning of the rule. In my opinion, the rule contemplates a benefit taken by the child under the instrument as a result of the application of the rule. To give to the rule any other operation would be to make it a rule of great uncertainty and difficult of application.

D The courts below have based themselves upon a decision of CHITTY, J., in Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4), and a decision of JOYCE, J., in Re Griffiths, Griffiths v. Waghorne (5). The former decision given before Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2) came to your Lordships' House, in my opinion, was wrong, and cannot stand with Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2), while the decision of JOYCE, J., was one construing a section of the Wills Act and therefore not strictly in pari materia, though it must not be understood that as E at present advised I accept it as correct.

The result is that, in my opinion, this appeal should succeed. For the reasons about to be indicated by my noble and learned friend, LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, the order to be made by your Lordships' House should be in the form which he has prepared, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

F LORD RUSSELL.—Under the will of her father (who died in the year 1881) Mrs. Elliot had a special power of appointment over certain funds exercisable in favour of her issue born in her lifetime. The funds in question represented a legacy of £50,000 and a share of residue which had been bequeathed by her father's will and in which she took a life interest.

She made her will on March 1, 1910, being then the wife of Thomas Robert Barnewell G Elliot, of Harwood, Hawick, in the county of Roxburgh, and thereby appointed the funds which were subject to her power by providing that the trustees of her father's will should hold them in trust for her children who should survive her and, being male, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being female, should attain that age or marry under it, and if more than one in equal shares. After certain provisions cutting down shares of daughters and younger sons which need not be referred to in greater H detail, she proceeded to settle the shares of her children in manner following. She directed that during the period of twenty-one years from her death the said trustees should pay the income of each child's share to such child if he or she should so long live, and if such child should die within the said period of twenty-one years then (I quote the words of the will)

> "the said trustees shall hold such share and the income thereof in trust for such I person or persons for such purposes and in such manner in all respects as such child shall by will or codicil appoint and in default of and subject to any such appointment upon the trusts following (namely) in the event of such child of mine leaving any issue him or her surviving in trust for such child of mine absolutely, but in the event of such child of mine not leaving any issue, him or her surviving, then such share and the income thereof shall go and accrue by way of addition to the share or shares in the appointed funds of my other child or children who shall survive me" as therein mentioned. If the child in question survived the said period of twenty-one years the said trustees were to hold the share or shares (whether original or accrued) of such child in the appointed fund and the income thereof in trust for such child absolutely.

Mrs. Elliot died on Jan. 12, 1912, and her will (with a codicil thereto) was registered in the Books of Council and Session in Scotland on Jan. 23, 1912. Confirmation of the executor therein named was granted by the Sheriff Court of the county of Roxburgh on April 13, 1912, and was resealed in England on April 30, 1912.

Mrs. Elliot had five children who survived her, namely, three sons and two daughters, but the daughters, by reason of the codicil, are not interested in the question now under debate. Of the three sons one, Thomas, died intestate and domiciled in Scotland on May 11, 1932, that is to say within the period of twenty-one years from his mother's death. He had married on April 14, 1931, but no child of the marriage was born during his lifetime. On June 12, 1932, his widow gave birth to a son who is still alive. In consequence of the death of Thomas during the period of twenty-one years the trusts quoted above came into operation, and the question which has arisen is who in the events which have happened became entitled under those trusts to the funds in question.

If the birth of the posthumous child fulfils the event described in the will as the event of Thomas "leaving any issue him surviving," then the absolute trust in favour of Thomas takes effect and the fund forms part of his estate. If, on the other hand, the birth of such a child does not fulfil the event, the fund must go over, because the failure of the event upon which the first trust takes effect necessarily involves, in my opinion, the happening of the event upon which the trust for accruer becomes operative.

Before proceeding to consider the true construction of the clause in question I would call attention to the fact that the will of Mrs. Elliot is a Scottish will, the construction of which falls to be determined according to Scots law. This seems to have been overlooked in the courts below; at all events the matter appears to have been there argued and treated throughout as one to be decided according to English law. I think, nevertheless, that it may be convenient to see how the matter stands under English law before considering how far, if at all, the position is altered under Scots law.

There are many cases decided by the courts in England in which posthumous children have been held to be included in gifts to children born in a father's lifetime, or to children living at a father's death. The foundation of these decisions, however, as has now been clearly and definitely settled, is not that the natural or ordinary meaning of the words used is such that they include a posthumous child, but that an artificial meaning must be placed upon the words because > "the potential existence of such a child places it plainly within the motive and reason of the gift."

These are the words used by LEACH, V.-C., in Trower v. Butts (6), and subsequently approved with a defined limitation by LORD WESTBURY in Blasson v. Blasson (7). Both these authorities have, as will appear, been accepted as correct in your Lordships' House.

There is not, so it happens, any authority precisely covering the event postulated by Mrs. Elliot, namely, the death of a parent "leaving any issue him or her surviving." The word "surviving," however, which, in my view, according to its ordinary meaning requires that the person who is to survive shall be living both at and after a particular point of time, ought, as it seems to me, to be governed by the same considerations as those which have been applied to the word "living," where the event postulated has been that there should be a child living at a particular point of time, e.g., at its father's death.

To refer to all the relevant authorities, which are numerous, would be a useless task. The earlier years show decisions not altogether uniform. It will, I think, suffice if I mention only a few earlier in date to Trower v. Butts (6) and Blasson v. Blasson (7).

Millar v. Turner (8) was the case of a provision in a marriage settlement in favour of such child or children of the marriage as should be living at the death of the father. It was decided that a child born after the death of the father shared with the rest. LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., stated in regard to a posthumous child:

> "in all cases relating to his advantage he must be considered as in esse, according > to the rule of the civil law; so on the statute of distribution he shall be considered as living; the intention being to provide for all the children; and if that be so the same reasoning will hold in a marriage settlement, where the intention was to provide for all the children of the marriage."

In Doe v. Clarke (9) it was stated that it seemed then settled that an infant en ventre sa mère should be considered, generally speaking, as born for all purposes for his own benefit. That was a case in which a devise was made to a man for his life and after his death to all and every such his child or children as should be living at the time of his decease (other than an excepted named child) as tenants in common and the heirs and assigns of such child for ever.

In Thellusson v. Woodford (10) the matter was debated in your Lordships' House in connection with the question of perpetuity. Peter Thellusson had by his will directed accumulation to take place during the lives of the survivors and survivor of his three living sons, his one living grandson and (putting it shortly) his (the testator's) other issue who might be living at his decease or born in due time afterwards. It was contended amongst other things that this period of accumulation exceeded the limits allowed by law, since the persons born in due time after the testator's decease could not be considered as persons actually born in his lifetime. The opinion of the judges was sought. Their unanimous opinion was delivered by the LORD CHIEF BARON MACDONALD, who reviewed the authorities and concluded the relevant portion of that opinion thus (11 Ves. at p. 141):

> "It seems then that if estates for life had been given to the several cestuis que vie in this will, and after their deaths to their children, either born or en ventre sa mère at the testator's death, they would have been good. No tendency to perpetuity then can arise in the case of such lives being taken, not to confer on them a measure of the beneficial interest, but to fix the time, during which the vesting of the property, which is the subject of this devise, shall be protracted; inasmuch as the circulation of real property is no more fettered in one case than in the other."

It will be observed that this case had nothing to do with any question of construction analogous to the question now in issue; it related solely to the question of the period of gestation in relation to perpetuity. LORD ELDON, L.C., however, in moving that the decree appealed from be affirmed, used certain language which has been quoted in other cases relating to construction, including the case in debate before us to-day. He spoke thus (at p. 149):

> "But, if it is necessary, I have no difficulty in stating, as a lawyer, that the rule of law has been properly laid down, that the time of gestation may be taken both at the beginning and the end; and that is what was meant in Gulliver v. Wicket (11) in which case the devise was to a child en ventre sa mère, and to go over, if that child should die under the age of twenty-one, leaving no issue. In the construction of that limitation, expressly to a child en ventre sa mère, suppose that child had at the age of twenty married, and died six months afterwards leaving his wife enceinte, that property, absolutely given to him, would not be divested merely because the child was not born till three months after his death. In fair reasoning, therefore, that is the construction of the words."

Trower v. Butts (6) is a case of great importance in view of the references to it in subsequent cases. The will of May Smith bequeathed a sum to trustees to invest and pay the dividends to Maria Heathcote for life and after her death to hold the corpus in trust for all the children of Robert Trower "born" in the lifetime of the testatrix. She died in October, 1821, at which time the wife of Robert Trower was enceinte. There were children of Robert Trower already in existence when the testatrix died. In February, 1822, a son was born to Robert Trower. LEACH, V.-C., held that that son was entitled to a share of the legacy; but the grounds of his decision need to be noted. He states the law as "fully settled" in regard to gifts to children living at the death of a testator, namely, that a child en ventre sa mère is within such a gift not because such a child answers the description of a child living, "but because the potential existence of such a child places it plainly within the reason and motive of the gift." He then points out A that the courts in other cases have acted as on the footing that there was no difference between the expressions "born in the lifetime" and "living at the death," and holds that the rule of construction which places a child en ventre sa mère within the intention of a gift to children living at the death of a testator, because plainly within the reason and motive of the gift, should equally apply and for the same reason so as to bring such a child within the intention of a gift to children born in the lifetime of a testator. In B other words, the Vice-Chancellor held that, departing from the ordinary meaning of the words, a gift to children "born in the lifetime" of a testator and a gift to children "living at the death" of a testator stood upon the same footing in this regard, that a child en ventre sa mère at the testator's death is within the gift, but only for the reason that such a child is plainly within the reason and motive of a gift to children described as above. C

Lord Westbury considered Trower v. Butts (6) when Blasson v. Blasson (7) came before him on appeal from Kindersley, V.-C. A testatrix had bequeathed moneys to be invested and accumulated during a period the termination of which was the attainment of twenty-one years by the youngest of the children of three named nephew and nieces "who shall have been born and living at the time of my decease," when she directed the fund to be equally divided among all such children of the three nephew and D nieces "as shall be then living, share and share alike." She died on Jan. 8, 1844. The nephew and nieces all had children then actually born, and the youngest of those attained twenty-one on Aug. 20, 1863. One niece had a child born on June 11, 1844, and another subsequently. The other niece had a child born on Aug. 2, 1844, and six others subsequently. Kindersley, V.-C., had held (i) that the period of division was Aug. 2, 1865, when the youngest child en ventre sa mère attained twenty-one, and (ii) that E all children whether born before or after the death of the testatrix who were living at the period of distribution were entitled. Lord Westbury affirmed the Vice-Chancellor on the second point, but held that the trust for accumulation ceased when the youngest of the children actually born and living at the death of the testatrix attained majority. He specifically approved of the decision in Trower v. Butts (6) as right and well warranted by previous decisions; but he points out that F

> "the fiction or indulgence of the law which treats the unborn child as actually born applies only for the purpose of enabling the unborn child to take a benefit which, if born, it would be entitled to, and that it is limited to cases where 'de commodis ipsius partus quaeritur'."

He describes the means by which an unborn child is included among children born or G living as a "fictitious legal interpretation," and a "peculiar rule of construction," and limits the application thereof to cases where such construction is necessary for the benefit of the unborn child. In the case before him there was no such necessity, for the actual gift clearly included all children living at the period of distribution, whether born or unborn at the death of the testatrix.

In Pearce v. Carrington (12) a testator by his will gave an annuity to his wife during H widowhood with directions to set aside a fund the income of which would be sufficient to answer the annuity, and after her decease or second marriage he directed his trustees to stand possessed of the annuity fund on trust, in case his daughter should have any child or children who being sons or a son should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters should attain that age or marry, to pay and divide the same unto and between such child or children, and if there should be no such child or I children upon trust for certain named persons. By a codicil he directed that in the event of his daughter not having any such child or children as mentioned in his will, only £40,000 of the annuity fund should be divided among the named persons, the balance to form part of his residuary estate; provided that if his daughter should be living at the expiration of five years from the death of his wife and should not then have had any child or children, he directed that the said sum of £40,000 should be at once paid and divided among the named persons as if his daughter were dead without children after the decease of his wife. The testator died in 1865; his widow died on Nov. 9, 1867; the first child of the testator's daughter was born on May 4, 1873. She was presumably enceinte when the five years' period expired on Nov. 9, 1872. Wickens, V.-C., held that the gift over of the £40,000 had not taken effect, and his decision was affirmed by James and Mellish, L.JJ. This is an instance of the "fictitious legal interpretation" being applied for the purpose of preventing the divesting of a gift by the testator to a class of which the unborn child when born would be a member. For this purpose the child en ventre sa mère, who when born would be one of the children entitled to share in the annuity fund contingently on attaining the age of twenty-one, was treated as actually born within the period of five years, i.e., the mother was treated as having had a child when the five years' period expired.

Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2) is the most recent decision in your Lordships' House and requires close attention. A testator devised certain real estate in favour of his brother and his brother's sons and daughters, and died on Sept. 18, 1854. At that date the brother had two sons, namely, Alfred (the eldest) and George. After giving his brother a life estate therein, the testator devised the real estate to Alfred for life, with remainder to Alfred's sons successively in tail, with remainders over to Alfred's daughters in tail, and in default of such issue to George for life, with similar remainders to George's sons and daughters in tail, and in default of issue of George to the third, fourth and every other son or sons of the testator's brother severally successively and in remainder one after the other in tail; but he declared his intention to be

> "that any third or other son of my said brother born in my lifetime shall not take a larger interest in my estate than for life only, with remainder to his issue in tail male and then in tail female."

Alfred died in 1879 without ever having had any issue. George died in 1903 without ever having had any issue. A third son, William, had been born to the testator's brother some three weeks after the testator's death, namely, on Oct. 9, 1854, and the question arose whether his estate, which had become an estate in possession, was cut down to an estate for life, upon the footing that he was a son of the testator's brother born in the testator's lifetime. It was held by Swinfen Eady, J. ([1905] 2 Ch. 301) that the words of the will must receive their natural construction, and that considerations of the kind which enabled a child en ventre sa mère to come within such words as "living" or "born" at a certain time for the purpose of taking under or fulfilling the conditions of a gift, had no application to a case where the only result of applying them would be to cut down the child's interest. He, accordingly, declared that William's estate was an estate tail. This decision was reversed in the Court of Appeal ([1906] 1 Ch. 583). Romer, L.J., stated that a long series of cases had established that for many purposes connected with wills and their construction a child en ventre sa mère at a particular time who is subsequently born alive is to be considered as "living" or "born" at that time; and that the rule was not limited to cases where the gift was for the benefit of the child itself. As authorities for this last proposition he cited Pearce v. Carrington (12) and Re Burrows (4). He states the general principle thus:

> "In particular, I think, with regard to wills, that they ought to be construed and given effect to without making any such distinction [i.e., a distinction between a child actually born at a particular time and a child at that time en ventre sa mère and subsequently born alive] unless the context requires a distinction to be made."

He further states that Blasson v. Blasson (7) ought not to be followed because Lord Westbury limits the indulgence of the law to cases where its application enables the unborn child to take a benefit to which, if born, it would be entitled. "The indulgence of the law," says Romer, L.J., "is not so limited." Cozens Hardy, L.J., took the same view.

> "I think it is now settled by authority that this limitation cannot be maintained. I think that, as a general rule of construction, the word 'child' living at or born at a particular date includes a posthumous child, in the absence of any context indicating a contrary intention, and I desire to base my judgment in favour of the appellant on that broad principle."

He also considered Blasson v. Blasson (7) to be bad law.

A Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2), when it left the Court of Appeal, contained a clearly defined rule of construction applicable to wills which could, I think, easily have been applied to the present will, notwithstanding the different phraseology there employed. The posthumous child would be included in the words "issue him surviving," which only mean children or remoter issue living at and after a particular date, and, accordingly, the event postulated by the will would have happened; Thomas could then well be said to have left issue him surviving. B Your Lordships' House, however, declined and, as I think, emphatically declined to accept this view of the law. The Lord Chancellor said that the case depended upon whether or not such a rule of construction as the Court of Appeal had described had been established by the authorities. He points out that the construction, which includes a child en ventre sa mère in the description of children "living at the father's death," is a straining of language, a fiction or indulgence on the ground that it is for the child's benefit, and that it is everywhere stated or assumed that C no such construction will be applied unless it is for the benefit of the child. After citing Trower v. Butts (6) and Blasson v. Blasson (7), and quoting LORD WESTBURY's limitation of the rule, he read the rule laid down by COZENS HARDY, L.J., and proceeded thus ([1907] A.C. at p. 146):

> "It will be observed that this principle is laid down quite broadly and regardless D of the circumstance whether the construction is for the benefit of the child or not. The Court of Appeal thought that this distinction had been overruled by authority. When I examine the cases cited in support of this view. . . . I cannot find that they support it. It seems to me that the sentence I have quoted from LORD WESTBURY, L.C., accurately states the rule and its limitation, and with the utmost respect to the Court of Appeal, I cannot accept the rule without the limitation, because E there is not authority for such a view. I agree . . . that it may be difficult at times to say when a particular construction is for the benefit of a child. But I am not on that account to extend to all cases a construction which has throughout been applied only to a particular class. Authority may compel us to do violence to the English language, and to say that in some cases a child is born weeks or months before it is brought forth. But in my opinion we ought not to say so, knowing that it is not the F fact, unless we are constrained by authority. And we are not so constrained, except where it is for the child's benefit."

LORD MACNAGHTEN agreed with the Lord Chancellor's judgment, so too did LORDS JAMES OF HEREFORD and ROBERTSON, the former adding that the judgment of LORD WESTBURY (i.e., in Blasson v. Blasson (7)) and the dicta which controlled that judgment ought to prevail in the case before the House. G LORD ATKINSON delivered a judgment in which he considered a large number of the earlier authorities, and in particular Trower v. Butts (6), Blasson v. Blasson (7), and Pearce v. Carrington (12), and held that the Court of Appeal was wrong in holding that the rule of construction was a general rule applicable irrespective of the question of securing a benefit to the child en ventre sa mère.

H The result of the decision in Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2) in your Lordships' House seems to me to be threefold: (i) the authority of Trower v. Butts (6), and of Blasson v. Blasson (7) is established beyond attack. As MOULTON, L.J., said in the subsequent case of Re Salaman, De Pass v. Sonnenthal (13):

> "In my view the House of Lords in Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2) authoritatively supported the decisions of LORD WESTBURY in Blasson v. Blasson (7) and LEACH, I V.-C., in Trower v. Butts (6). (ii) Such words as "living" at a particular time or "born" at or during a particular time or period do not, according to their ordinary or natural meaning, include a child who is en ventre sa mère at the particular time or during the particular period. (iii) They can only include such a child by a fictional construction, which, however, must not be resorted to except in circumstances to which I refer in my summary of what I conceive to be the law as settled by Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2).

CLAUSON, J., has decided this case primarily upon the ground that no legal fiction or indulgence is here necessary, because the words "issue surviving a parent A. B." are

A "not inapt" to cover the case of a child "in being" at the death of A. B.; and he adopts what he calls this "loose and secondary meaning," in construing Mrs. Elliot's will. This is to include the posthumous child on the ground that it was in fact living at the crucial date, the very thing which the judgments in Trower v. Butts (6), Blasson v. Blasson (7) and Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2), as I read them, prevent us from doing. He fortifies himself in this procedure by a reference to a decision of JOYCE, J., B in Re Griffiths, Griffiths v. Waghorne (5), in which reference is made to a case before CHITTY, J., in Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4).

It is necessary to examine both these authorities. Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4) was a case in which a testator bequeathed his residue to his wife for life and on her death as to one moiety—

> C "to my daughter Kate Cleghorn for her absolute use and benefit in case she has issue living at the death of my wife, but in case she has no issue then living" then to her for life, after her decease to her husband for life, and after his decease to the children of the testator's son. The testator died on Nov. 26, 1894; his widow died on March 9, 1895; and on the following day Kate Cleghorn was delivered of a living child. CHITTY, J., held at the outset of his judgment that the child was "living" when D the widow died, within the words of the will, i.e., his decision was that the words "issue living" included a child en ventre sa mère simply because such a child was "living." He then continued:

> "Then it is said that the rule is that the child en ventre sa mère is not deemed to be living except where there is a benefit passing directly to the child; and as the E mother and not the child in this case takes the benefit, the gift over takes effect. But the question is covered by authority."

He then cites the authority, namely, the passage from LORD ELDON'S judgment in Thellusson v. Woodford (10), which I have already quoted, and which is merely a dictum uttered in a judgment concerned, not at all with construction, but with perpetuity only. Even viewed as a decision, it would be a decision that the rule of construction was not F subject to any limitation at all, not a decision that, there being the limitation, the rule would apply even if the benefit to the child were only of an indirect kind. Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4) did not decide that a benefit to the mother was a benefit to the child within the meaning of the limitation. It only decided against the existence of any limitation which forbade the construction which the learned judge had adopted. The decision cannot in my opinion stand after Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2).

G Re Griffiths, Griffiths v. Waghorne (5) was a case under s. 33 of the Wills Act, the relevant words being > "die in the lifetime of the testator leaving issue and any such issue shall be living at the time of the death of the testator."

A testator made a will dated June 20, 1904, under which a son Arthur took a share. H In April, 1908, Arthur married and he died on Sept. 4, 1908. The testator died on Nov. 9, 1908, and on April 29, 1909, Arthur's widow gave birth to a daughter. Two questions were raised, the first to be argued (and the only one relevant to our present purpose) was whether the posthumous daughter was issue left by Arthur living at the time of the testator's death within the meaning of s. 33. If the answer was in the affirmative, then, there being no contrary intention expressed in the will, the bequest I to Arthur would not lapse, but would form part of Arthur's estate. The argument on this question appears, from the report, to have taken a strange course. Mr. Rolt, on behalf of Arthur's executors, relied on Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4); Mr. Harman, claiming intestacy as to the share, contended that the point depended on whether the infant took a benefit and cited Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2), i.e., he argued that the section did not apply because, since the child was given nothing by the section, there was no justification for the application of the fictional construction under which the posthumous daughter could be included in the words "issue . . . living at the time of the death of the testator." He was stopped by the learned judge. The arguments on the second point were then heard, and at their conclusion the learned A judge delivered judgment on both points without hearing any further argument from Mr. Harman.

His judgment on the first is racy of the judicial soil from which it sprang. It was adverse to Mr. Harman's contention. After stating the facts and reading s. 33, he delivered judgment in these words ([1911] 1 Ch. at p. 253):

> "The defendant Edith Mary Griffith is issue of the testator's son Arthur, and she B was living although not born at the testator's death, and I do not hesitate to decide that s. 33 applies to such a case. If this be a decision requiring the support of authority, it is to be found in Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4). It would be most unfortunate if the law were otherwise, the case being obviously within the mischief intended to be remedied by s. 33." C

As I read that judgment it decides (i) that the daughter came within the words of the section, not by reason of any rule of construction giving a peculiar meaning to the words of the section, but because she was in fact "living" at the particular date, and (ii) that Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4) justified that view. It is essential to observe that the question of benefit to the infant (upon which counsel had been stopped), is not in any way dealt with by the learned judge. Whatever may be the true position D in regard to s. 33, it seems clear to me that the grounds upon which this decision is based cannot be justified in the face of Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2). CLAUSON, J., was no doubt to some extent justified in claiming Re Griffiths, Griffiths v. Waghorne (5) and Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4) in support of his view that a child en ventre sa mère may properly and without legal fiction or indulgence be included in the words "issue surviving a parent A. B.," as being a child "in being" or "living" at the parti- E cular point of time; but he failed to appreciate the full effect of Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2) upon those decisions.

In his judgment he next states that there is no authority for the proposition that such an expression as "child living" cannot be treated as including a child en ventre sa mère unless such a child takes a benefit under the clause. This appears to me a crucial statement and an erroneous one. In my opinion, Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2), F approving as it does of Trower v. Butts (6) and Blasson v. Blasson (7), is a binding decision on the point. Trower v. Butts (6) (i) abolished the idea that as a matter of ordinary construction the words "born" or "living" could be applied to a child en ventre sa mère, (ii) declared that it was fully settled in regard to gifts to children "living" at the death of a testator that a child en ventre sa mère is included solely because the potential existence of such a child placed it plainly within the reason and motive of the G gift, and (iii) applied the same exceptional construction to a gift to children "born" at the death of a testator. The only cases which (judging from his language) were present to the mind of the Vice-Chancellor as cases in which this exceptional construction was admissible, were cases of gifts to a class of children "living" or "born" at some specified point of time. This exceptional construction, described by LORD WESTBURY in Blasson v. Blasson (7) as a "fictional legal interpretation," is stated by him H to be applied only for the purpose of enabling the unborn child to take a benefit to which, if born, it would be entitled. That can only mean entitled under the document to which the fictional legal interpretation is being applied. Finally, in Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2) which established the authority of Trower v. Butts (6) and Blasson v. Blasson (7), your Lordships' House laid it down that the fictional construction ought not to be applied unless the court was constrained by authority. CLAUSON, J., has held that this I construction can be applied, if its application secures a benefit to some other person, who in turn may or is likely to pass on some portion thereof to the unborn child when born. As I have pointed out, there is no authority in favour of this view; nor is it in accordance with the principle approved of in this House. It is impossible to say with any accuracy or certainty that any child of A. born or unborn is within the reason and motive of an absolute bequest to A. The property vests in A. on the death of the testator. True it is that A. may make provision for any or all of his children thereout; but on the other hand he may not. He may assign it away where he pleases in his life-

A time, and bequeath it where he pleases by his will*; or his debts may swallow it up. No one can tell what will happen; and it is, in my opinion, inadmissible to ascertain the meaning of words used in a document by construing them in the light of subsequent events. It is impossible in the present case to predicate, except by guesswork, that the children of Thomas were within the reason and motive of the appointment to Thomas.

In the Court of Appeal the MASTER OF THE ROLLS accepts the view that the rule B which admits of the fictional construction is based upon the child being within the reason and motive of the gift. He then asserts that the children of Thomas are within the reason and motive of this gift. Finally, he holds that Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4) decided that the fictional construction was applicable even if there was no gift to a child or children, but only some indirect benefit which might be derived from a gift made to its parent; and that Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2) in no way overruled C that decision. In reliance on that decision he held that the appeal should fail. LAWRENCE, L.J., agreed, relying, as I read his judgment, entirely on Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4) and Re Griffiths, Griffiths v. Waghorne (5) as cases which decided that the fictional construction would be applied in order to preserve a gift to the parent of the child. ROMER, L.J., also agreed. After expressing a doubt whether the law as settled by Villar v. Gilbey (2) in relation to not treating a child en ventre sa mère "born" D at a particular time unless it is to the interest of the child that he should be so treated, applied also to the construction of the word "living," a doubt which seems to me ill-founded, he affirmed the decision of CLAUSON, J., on the ground that CHITTY, J., had decided in Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4) that it was not necessary that the child should take a direct benefit under the instrument which was being considered.

I have already indicated my view that Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4) (founded E on LORD ELDON'S dictum in Thellusson v. Woodford (10) and Re Griffiths, Griffiths v. Waghorne (5) (founded on Re Burrows, Cleghorn v. Burrows (4), are not authorities upon the question of indirect benefit as contrasted with direct benefit, and, moreover, that they cannot stand after Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2). If I am right in this, the foundations of the judgments of the Court of Appeal disappear.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS thought that the Lord Chancellor in Villar v. Sir William F Gilbey (2), when he said that it might be difficult at times to say when a particular construction was for the benefit of a child, indicated a view that an indirect benefit not conferred upon the child by the instrument under consideration was sufficient to justify the fictional construction. I cannot read that meaning into his words, which merely seem to say that the instrument which is being construed may be so worded as to raise a doubt whether a particular construction will in fact benefit the posthumous child. G I see nothing in the language used to indicate a view that the benefit may spring from a source other than the instrument itself.

The law as settled by Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2) (but subject to any special context in the document to be construed) may be summed up thus: (i) Words referring to children or issue "born" before, or "living" at or (as I think we must add) "surviving" a particular point of time or event will not in their ordinary or natural meaning H include a child en ventre sa mère at the relevant date. (ii) The ordinary or natural meaning of the words may be departed from and a fictional construction applied to them so as to include therein a child en ventre sa mère at the relevant date and subsequently born alive if, but only if, such fictional construction will secure to such child a benefit to which it would have been entitled if it had been actually born at the relevant date. (iii) The only reason and the only justification for applying such a fictional I construction is that where a person makes a gift to a class of children or issue described as "born" before or "living" at or "surviving" a particular point of time or event, a child en ventre sa mère must necessarily be within the reason and motive of the gift. (iv) That being the only reason and the only justification for applying the fictional construction, it follows that, if the person who uses the words under consideration confers no gift on the children or issue described as above-mentioned, but confers the gift on some one else, it is impossible (except in the light of subsequent events) to affirm either that the fictional construction will secure to the child en ventre sa mère a benefit which if born it would be entitled to, or that the child en ventre sa mère must necessarily be within the reason and motive of the gift made. In these circumstances the words used must bear their ordinary or natural meaning.

* See now Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938.

This seems to me to be the inevitable result of the adoption and approval by your Lordships' House of Trower v. Butts (6) and Blasson v. Blasson (7), of their acceptance of Lord Westbury's statement of the rule, and of its limitation, namely, "only for the purpose of enabling the unborn child to take a benefit which if born it would be entitled to," and of their refusal to do violence to language unless constrained by authority so to do. According to the law of England as it now stands this appeal must succeed.

In regard to Scots law, if Burns's Trustees v. Burns (3) was rightly decided it would seem that, according to that law, the fictional construction is inadmissible, and that the word "born" must receive its ordinary or natural meaning. I have, however, had the advantage of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Macmillan in the present case, and, agreeing with it as I do, it will be sufficient if I point out that the Scots law being certainly not more favourable to the claims of a child en ventre sa mère than the English law, this appeal must equally succeed under Scots law.

But for the fact next mentioned, the proper order to make would be an order directing that the order of the Court of Appeal be set aside, and the order of Clauson, J., be varied by declaring that the funds therein described belong to the two brothers of Thomas Elliot (namely, the defendants Robert Barnewall Elliot and James Kerr Elliot) in equal shares. The only person, however, who has appealed from the orders of Clauson, J., and the Court of Appeal is the defendant Robert Barnewall Elliot. James Kerr Elliot has never appealed at all, and as against him, therefore, the order of Clauson, J., is binding. He can take no interest in the funds. The proper course to adopt in these circumstances is to set aside the order of the Court of Appeal, and to vary the order of Clauson, J., in manner following: (i) by inserting therein immediately after the words "now belongs" the words "as to one moiety thereof," and by adding at the end of the declaration therein contained the words "and as to the other moiety thereof to the defendant Robert Barnewall Elliot"; and (ii) by striking out the order therein contained as to costs and substituting in its place an order directing that the costs of all parties be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid out of the total funds before division into moieties. As regards the costs of the appeal to the Court of Appeal and to your Lordships' House I think that the costs of the plaintiffs and the defendants as between solicitor and client should be taxed and paid out of the total fund before division as aforesaid.

LORD MACMILLAN.—In the course of the argument for the appellant I drew attention to the circumstance, which had apparently escaped notice in the courts below, that the will which your Lordships are invited to construe, though bearing traces in its language of an English draftsman's hand, is the will of a domiciled Scotswoman. This plainly appears from the facts that the testatrix designates herself as "the wife of Thomas Robert Barnewell Elliot, of Harwood, Hawick, in the county of Roxburgh," that confirmation was taken out in Scotland and that the will was registered in the Books of the Lords of Council and Session. The law applicable to the interpretation of the will is, therefore, the law of Scotland and not, as hitherto assumed, the law of England.

Fortunately this circumstance need not embarrass your Lordships in disposing of the case. No doubt, in the courts below the law of Scotland is a matter of fact and must be vouched there by evidence or admission. But in your Lordships' House the law of Scotland is a matter, not of fact, but of law, for this House is the commune forum of both England and Scotland and your Lordships have judicial knowledge of the laws of both countries. As Lord Halsbury, L.C., said in Cooper v. Cooper (1) (13 App. Cas. at p. 101):

> "Your Lordships sitting here require no evidence, indeed can receive no evidence, of English or Scottish law."

Nor is it material that in the present case the courts below had neither evidence nor argument on Scots law. In Cooper v. Cooper (1), which was an appeal from the Court of Session in Scotland, this House decided the case on a point of Irish law on which the Court of Session had no evidence and which was not argued there. I again quote from the same paragraph of Lord Halsbury's speech:

> "if all the facts are before your Lordships for decision . . . then it is not only competent but incumbent upon this House to decide upon the true view of what legal rights these facts establish, although what was a question of fact in the Court of Session was not there mooted but is for the first time argued here before your Lordships."

I proceed, therefore, to consider as a question of Scots law the problem of interpretation which Mrs. Elliot's will presents in the circumstances which have arisen. The problem is whether her son, Thomas William Henry Elliot, who died on May 11, 1932, can be said to have died "leaving any issue him surviving," in view of the fact that, while he had no children at the date of his death, his widow gave birth to a son on June 12, 1932. As it happens, and as will appear in the sequel, there is no difference of doctrine between the law of England and the law of Scotland in the matter of the interpretation to be placed on the critical words I have quoted where a posthumous child is concerned, although, of course, the English cases referred to by Clauson, J., and the Court of Appeal which did not reach this House are not of binding authority in Scotland.

The argument in favour of holding that the critical words were in the circumstances satisfied was presented in two ways. In the first place, it was argued that, as a mere matter of construing the English language and apart from any special fiction of law applicable to posthumous children, it was accurate and according to ordinary parlance to describe a deceased person as having died leaving issue him surviving although his only issue was a posthumous child, and, indeed, that it would not be true to say of such a person that he died without leaving issue him surviving. A deceased person, it was said, must either leave or not leave issue him surviving, and, if his only child be a posthumous one, then the case falls within the former rather than the latter category; in such a case, if anyone were to ask whether the deceased died leaving issue him surviving, the ordinary and true answer would be in the affirmative, and only a pedantic precision would answer that he died without leaving issue him surviving, but that he subsequently had issue in the shape of a posthumous child. This argument is attractive, but, in my opinion, it is unsound. The question whether Mr. Thomas William Henry Elliot left issue him surviving is a question which must be determined as at the date of his death. At the date of his death he had no issue. If common parlance is to be appealed to, the deceased's obituary notice would undoubtedly have stated that he died leaving no children. I do not think that it is justifiable to seek to alter what was the fact at his death by what subsequently happened. It may be accurate enough now to say that he died leaving issue him surviving, but it would not have been accurate to say so at the date of his death, and that is what matters. It may well be that if someone had said to the testatrix: "But what if your son has only a posthumous child?" she might have replied, "I mean to include that case," and appropriate language might have been used to do so. But the question presumably was not asked and the case of a posthumous child was not covered. I am, accordingly, against giving to the language of the testatrix a meaning which, according to the ordinary use of words, it does not bear.

The respondent's second argument invokes the special benevolence which the law has always shown towards posthumous children. The judgments below are mainly based on this principle, but with all respect I think that it has been misapplied.

From the earliest times the posthumous child has caused a certain embarrassment to the logic of the law which is naturally disposed to insist that at any given moment of time a child must either be born or not born, living or not living. This literal realism was felt to bear hardly on the interests of posthumous children and was surmounted in the civil law by the invention of the fiction that in all matters affecting its interests the unborn child in utero should be deemed to be already born. The classical statement is to be found in the words of Paulus: "Qui in utero est, perinde ac si in rebus humanis esset, custoditur, quoties de commodis ipsius partus quaeritur: quanquam alii, antequam nascatur, nequaquam prosit" (DIG. LIB. I, tit. V, DE STATU HOMINUM, s. 7), A thus rendered in MONRO's translation: "An unborn child is taken care of just as much as if it were in existence, in any case in which the child's own advantage comes in question; though no one else can derive any benefit through the child before its birth." "There is indeed," says CRAIG, commenting on this passage, "no reason in the case of a posthumous child to aggravate the calamity it suffers by the premature death of the father, nor to make that event a ground for diminishing its rights" (JUS FEUDALE, B Lib. II, tit. XIII, s. 15, LORD CLYDE'S TRANSLATION II, 643).

This fiction has, undoubtedly, been adopted in the law of Scotland. I have already quoted CRAIG's approval of it in the sixteenth century. Writing in 1681 STAIR in his INSTITUTIONS OF THE LAW OF SCOTLAND (bk. III, tit. V, s. 50) states that "in all things tending in favour of those unborn, they are accounted as born." BANKTON puts it thus: "A child in the mother's womb is esteemed as already born in all things that C concern its own interest, but is not reckoned among children in relation to questions to the advantage of parents from a certain number of children" (Inst., bk. I, tit. II, s. 7, and see also his OBSERVATIONS ON THE LAW OF ENGLAND thereon, Inst. I, tit. II, s. 1). ERSKINE in his INSTITUTE (bk. III, tit. VIII, s. 76) gives the maxim in the shorter form: "Qui in utero est pro jam nato habetur quoties de ejus commodo quæritur." A more recent and fuller statement of the Scots law on the subject is contained in the D treatise on WILLS AND SUCCESSION (3rd edit., vol. 1, p. 696) by the late LORD MCLAREN, who refers to "the doctrine of the Civil Law, which has long been received in our system of jurisprudence, that a child born after the period at which the vesting of a right falls to be determined but proved by the period of its birth to have been in utero at that time is entitled to the rights of an existing person from the period of its conception. The leading case in the law of Scotland is that of Mountstewart (14) where the question was E elaborately discussed with reference to the rights of a child in utero to take as heir of provision in preference to a collateral substitute and was decided in conformity with the rule of the Civil Law. The fiction of law, which treats the unborn child as actually born, applies only for the purpose of enabling the child to take a benefit to which, if born, it would be entitled; and therefore, where the right of a stranger is conditioned to take effect on the birth of a child within a certain time, the right will not accrue F unless the child be actually born within the time limited."

I have troubled your Lordships with these numerous authoritative citations in order to place it beyond doubt that according to the law of Scotland a child in utero is fictionally deemed to be already born only when the result of applying the fiction is to benefit the child when actually born, and that the fiction cannot be invoked in the interests of any third party. Your Lordships were, indeed, referred to one recent G Scottish decision where the Second Division of the Court of Session declined to apply the fiction, even although it was to the interest of the posthumous child to do so, because in the will there under consideration the testator had indicated with reiterated emphasis that only those children of his son who were born prior to the date of the testator's death were to participate in his bequest (Burns's Trustees v. Burns (3)). I confess that for myself I should not be disposed to approve this decision were it before your Lordships for review. H I cannot see why the operation of the fiction should be excluded to the detriment of the posthumous child by the fact that the testator has several times and emphatically used the very language which brings the fiction into operation.

It is satisfactory for the purposes of the present case to find that the law of England in this matter is to all intents and purposes the same as the law of Scotland. The same fiction, derived from the same source in the civil law, and qualified by the same condition, I is common to both systems. In the English case of Villar v. Sir William Gilbey (2) your Lordships' House had occasion to emphasise that the limitation, which the Court of Appeal had there discarded, was an essential part of "this peculiar rule of construction," which, accordingly, applies only where it is for the benefit of the unborn child to apply it.

Can it then be said that in the present case such benefit would result to the posthumous child from applying the fiction as to justify its application? It will be observed that, if the fiction be applied, the result is not to benefit the posthumous child, but to benefit the estate of its deceased father. In the courts below the benefit to the father's estate has been regarded as sufficient to justify the application of the fiction on the ground that a child naturally and normally benefits, albeit indirectly, by anything which enhances the assets left by its father. It is said that the posthumous child's interest as next of kin in his father's estate renders it to his interest that he should be treated as having been actually alive at his father's death. I may point out that the father having been domiciled in Scotland the posthumous son was in any case entitled in name of legitim to an indefeasible right in one-third of his father's movable estate, testate or intestate, unless this right was excluded by marriage contract or otherwise discharged. But I am clearly of opinion that it is not an indirect or problematical commodum such as this that is meant in the limitation of the fiction. The commodum must in my opinion be the direct commodum of the posthumous child itself. The result of the application of the fiction in the interpretation of a bequest must be to bring the posthumous child within the benefit of the bequest as itself a participator. Any other view would render the rule uncertain and haphazard. It may, no doubt, be to a child's benefit that his father should die wealthy, but in England at least he may find himself cut off with a shilling by his father's will and so take no benefit from a construction which benefits his father's estate but does not benefit him. Or the father may be insolvent and the application of the fiction may benefit only the father's creditors and confer nothing on the posthumous child. And it might be almost equally said, if the destination-over brought into operation by the fiction sent the money to an aunt or a grandfather, that it was to the advantage of the posthumous child to have a wealthy aunt or grandfather, especially if he had the expectation of being an object of their bounty.

The sound view, in my opinion, is that the application of the fiction ought not to be at the mercy of such adventitious circumstances and that the commodum to the posthumous child must be a direct commodum to itself, resulting from the instrument under construction by virtue of the application to that instrument of the benevolent fiction in question; as, for example, to take the simplest case, where a testamentary gift is made to the children of X. at the testator's death, and the result of the application of the fiction is to include a posthumous child among the beneficiaries.

I accordingly concur in the motion that this appeal be allowed, and an order made in the terms which my noble and learned friend Lord Russell of Killowen has proposed.

Appeal allowed.

AITCHISON v. PAGE MOTORS, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Macnaghten, J.), November 28, December 5, 1935]

Master and Servant—Liability of master—Negligence of servant—Bailment—Destruction of property bailed—Scope of servant's authority—Motor car left with garage for repair by manufacturer—Damage while in wrongful use by garage servant.

The plaintiff sent her car for repair to the garage of the defendants, who were motor dealers and garage proprietors, and thereby the defendants became bailees of the car for reward. By arrangement with the plaintiff the defendants sent the car to the manufacturers' works for repair, and when the repairs were completed their service manager at the garage went to fetch it back. He signed a delivery book at the works and drove the car away, but, instead of driving it to the defendants' garage, drove it off elsewhere and the same night collided with an omnibus, with the result that the car was wrecked beyond repair and the service manager himself killed. The plaintiffs claimed damages from the defendants for loss of the car.

Held: (i) although it was no part of his ordinary duties, the service manager had actual authority to take delivery of cars belonging to the defendants, if he thought fit to do so, provided it did not interfere with the performance of his duties at the garage;

(ii) it was in the course of the service manager's employment to fetch the car from the works, and the defendants were answerable for the manner in which he conducted himself in performing that service; the plaintiff was, accordingly, entitled to recover, despite the fact that it was a breach of duty on the part of the manager to use the car as he did for a private purpose unconnected with the defendants' business.

Action by plaintiff, Mrs. Kate Aitchison, claiming damages from the defendants, Page Motors, Ltd., for the destruction of her Rover saloon motor car through the negligence of the defendants' servant. On April 19, 1934, the plaintiff telephoned to the defendants asking them to fetch her car, which had some defect in the clutch, and the defendants did so. The defendants' service manager, one Quaglia, subsequently advised the plaintiff that the car ought to be sent for repairs to the Rover works at Fulham, and to this the plaintiff agreed. On being notified on the following day that the repairs had been executed, Quaglia himself went to Fulham to fetch the car. He signed a delivery book at the works and drove the car away; but, instead of driving it to the defendants' garage, drove it off elsewhere, and the same night collided with an omnibus, with the result that the car was wrecked beyond repair, and Quaglia himself killed. The defendants admitted the negligence of Quaglia, but contended that at the time of the accident he was not acting within the scope of his authority or in the course of his employment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5.—The following judgment was read.

MACNAGHTEN, J.—In this action the plaintiff, Mrs. Aitchison, a widow residing at Beckenham, Kent, sued the defendants, Page Motors, Ltd., who carry on the business of motor dealers and garage proprietors at Epsom, Surrey, to recover the sum of £236 12s. 6d. as damages for the loss of her motor car, a 10 h.p. Rover saloon.

The plaintiff bought the car from the defendants in March, 1934, and it was a term of the contract of sale that the defendants would overhaul the car free of charge to the plaintiff on completion of the first 750 miles. When the car had run nearly 600 miles something went wrong with the clutch, and on Thursday, April 19, 1934, Miss Aitchison, a daughter of the plaintiff, telephoned to the garage at Epsom requesting the defendants to fetch the car for overhaul and repair. A Mr. Quaglia, the service manager of the defendants at their garage, on receiving this telephone message, sent one of their drivers for the car, and thus the defendants became bailees for reward of the car and were bound to take reasonable care of it until they re-delivered it to the plaintiff. After inspection of the car, Mr. Quaglia thought that it would be best to send the car to the works of the Rover Company at Fulham to be put right by them there, and, having obtained the consent of the plaintiff, he sent it to Fulham on the morning of Friday, April 20, 1934.

The driver who took the car from Epsom to the Fulham works of the Rover Company was told that the necessary repairs would be effected and the car would be ready for delivery by 11 a.m. the next day, but on the Friday afternoon Mr. Quaglia ascertained by telephone that the car would be ready that evening, and accordingly he himself went to Fulham for it. He arrived at the works about 7 p.m. The car had then been repaired and was ready for delivery, and Mr. Quaglia, after signing for it on behalf of the defendants in the "out book" of the Rover Company, took delivery of the car and drove it away. From Fulham he went to Walham Green. It is not known where he went after that, but four hours later, shortly after 11 p.m., he was driving the car along Nightingale-lane, Balham, in the direction of Wimbledon, where he resided. A Mr. and Mrs. Porch, who also resided in Wimbledon, were with him in the car. Taking a left-hand bend in Nightingale-lane at high speed, Mr. Quaglia collided violently with an omnibus coming in the opposite direction on its near side of the road. It was a head-on collision, and the force of the impact was so great that the plaintiff's car was wrecked beyond repair, and Mr. Quaglia and both his passengers were killed.

In these circumstances the plaintiff, alleging that the destruction of her car was due to the negligent driving of Mr. Quaglia, claims damages against the defendants on the ground that they are answerable for the negligence of their servant.

The defendants admit that the accident was caused by the negligence of Mr. Quaglia, but they dispute liability on the ground that at the time of the accident he was not acting within the scope of his authority or in the course of his employment. They say, in the first place, that he had no authority to take delivery of the plaintiff's car from the Rover Company, that he was the service manager at their garage, his duties lay there and nowhere else, he should have sent one of their drivers to fetch the car, and he had no business to fetch it himself. And, secondly, the defendants say that, even if it was within the scope of Mr. Quaglia's authority to fetch the car from Fulham, they are not answerable for his negligence because at the time of the accident he was using the plaintiff's car for some private purpose of his own unconnected with their business, and was not at that time driving the car in the course of his employment.

A As to the first point raised by the defendants, namely, that Mr. Quaglia had no authority to take delivery of the car from the Rover Company, the facts are as follows. Mr. Quaglia was the service manager at the defendants' garage at Epsom; he entered their service in November, 1933; his hours of attendance were from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., and he received by way of remuneration £4 5s. a week and a commission. According to the answer to interrogatories filed by the defendants and put in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, "he was in general charge of motor vehicles sent to the defendant company B for repair in the sense that it was his duty as service manager to receive such vehicles at the garage and to hand them over to the company's mechanics for repair, and to arrange for their re-delivery, when repaired, to the company's customers." On previous occasions, Mr. Quaglia had, to the knowledge of Mr. Page, one of the governing directors of the defendant company, taken delivery on behalf of the defendant company from the Rover Company of cars belonging to their customers, and no objection had been C taken by the defendants to his doing so.

In these circumstances it seems plain that Mr. Quaglia had at the very least ostensible authority to take delivery of the plaintiff's car and the defendants cannot be heard to complain that the Rover Company should have refused to give it to him. And, if the Rover Company had good warrant for delivering the car to Mr. Quaglia, the defendants cannot, I think, be heard to say as against the plaintiff that the delivery was unwarranted D and that Mr. Quaglia had no authority to fetch the plaintiff's car. But I think the proper inference from the facts proved before me is that, although it was no part of his ordinary duties to do so, Mr. Quaglia had actual authority to take delivery of cars belonging to the customers of the defendant company, if he thought fit to do so, provided it did not interfere with the performance of his duties at the garage. I therefore think that the first point taken on behalf of the defendants cannot be sustained. E

The second point put forward for the defendants—namely, that at the time of the accident, Mr. Quaglia was using the car for some private purpose of his own and that he was not then acting in the course of his employment—raises a question of some nicety. The speedometer on the plaintiff's car registered 604 miles when the car left the Rover Company's works; it registered 622 miles after the accident. The car had, therefore, apparently travelled about eighteen miles between 7 p.m. and 11 p.m. No one knows F where Mr. Quaglia went or what he did during those four hours or how it came about that Mr. and Mrs. Porch were with him in the car at the time of the accident; but, in view of the facts which are known, it seems fairly certain that Mr. Quaglia must have been using the car for some purpose of his own on that evening and that at the time of the accident he was on the way to Wimbledon, where he and his passengers all lived. He, no doubt, intended to take the car to Epsom in the morning, and Wimbledon is on G the way from Nightingale-lane to Epsom. Thus the question arises whether the defendants are responsible to the plaintiff for the destruction of her car by the negligence of their servant when in breach of his duty to them he was using it for some private purpose of his own unconnected with their business.

During the argument various authorities were referred to by counsel on the one side and on the other. For the plaintiff reliance was placed on the decision of the Divisional H Court (CAVE and CHARLES, JJ.) in Coupé Co. v. Maddick (3). In that case the defendant, a surgeon, had hired a horse and carriage from the plaintiff. Returning home one afternoon, the defendant ordered his coachman to take the carriage to his stable close by, but the coachman, instead of doing so, drove to a place about a mile and a half away. While he was returning to his master's stable the coachman, subsequently convicted of having been drunk at the time, met with an accident caused by his negligent I driving and the horse and carriage suffered injury. The plaintiff brought the action to recover damages for the injury to his property. The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant on the authority of Storey v. Ashton (4), but the Divisional Court reversed his decision and held that the defendant was responsible as a bailee for the damage caused by the negligence of the coachman to whom he had entrusted the horse and carriage.

The decision of Coupé Co. v. Maddick (3), however, came under the review of the Court of Appeal, consisting of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., in Sanderson v. Collins (5). In that case the plaintiff, a coachbuilder, to whom the defendant had sent a carriage for repairs, lent the defendant a dog-cart for his use while the repairs were being executed. Without the knowledge of the defendant, the coachman took the dog-cart out for his own purposes and while he was driving the dog-cart it was injured through his negligence. The plaintiff brought an action in the county court to recover the cost of repairing the dog-cart. The county court judge decided in favour of the defendant. A Divisional Court, consisting of Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ., reversed that decision and gave judgment for the plaintiff on the authority of Coupé Co. v. Maddick (3). The Court of Appeal restored the decision of the county court judge. They held that, since the coachman at the time when the damage was done was not acting in the course of his employment or within the scope of his authority, the defendant was not responsible for his negligence. The decision of the Divisional Court in Coupé Co. v. Maddick (3) could only be supported, it was said, on the view that the defendant's coachman, though he disobeyed his master's orders, was nevertheless acting in the course of his employment at the time of the accident.

In the present case Mr. Quaglia was, as I hold, acting in the course of his employment and within the scope of his authority when he took delivery of the plaintiff's car from the Rover Company. Having taken delivery it was his duty to drive the car to the defendant's garage at Epsom, but in breach of his duty he used the car for some private purpose of his own and, while he was so using it, the accident happened. So the question arises whether at the time of the accident as between the plaintiff and the defendants he should be regarded as still acting in the course of his employment so as to render the defendants answerable to the plaintiff for the consequences of his negligence, or whether he had by his conduct severed for the time being the relationship of master and servant.

In one sense of the words he obviously was not acting within the scope of his authority or in the course of his employment when he used the car for his own private purpose, but, as was pointed out by Sir Montague Smith in Mackay v. Commercial Bank of New Brunswick (6); (L.R. 5 P.C. at p. 411), the expression "acting within the scope of his authority" must not be construed in a narrow sense, since in a narrow sense a wrongful act of a servant could hardly ever be within the scope of his authority. And in Lloyd v. Grace, Smith, and Co. (2); ([1912] A.C. at p. 736), Lord Macnaghten, after dealing with the question which was at issue in that case—whether a principal was responsible for the fraud committed by his agent in the course of his employment not for the benefit of his principal but for his own benefit—said this:

> "I think, too, that the expressions 'acting within his authority,' 'acting in the course of his employment,' and the expression 'acting within the scope of his agency' (which Story uses) as applied to an agent, speaking broadly, mean one and the same thing. What is meant by those expressions is not easy to define with exactitude. To the circumstances of a particular case one may be more appropriate than the other. Whichever expression is used it must be construed liberally, and probably, as Sir Montague Smith observed, the explanation given by Willes, J., is the best that can be given."

The reference there is to the judgment of Willes, J., in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (7). In that case Willes, J., after referring to a number of cases in which a master is by law held responsible for a wrong done by his servant, said (L.R. 2 Exch. at p. 266):

> "In all these cases it may be said, as it was said here, that the master has not authorised the act. It is true, he has not authorised the particular act, but he has put the agent in his place to do that class of acts, and he must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of his master to place him in."

In this case Mr. Quaglia was, as I hold, authorised by the defendants to fetch the plaintiff's car from Fulham, it was in the course of his employment to do so, and I think that the defendants are answerable to the plaintiff for the manner in which he conducted himself in performing that service.

In a case in the Court of Session in Scotland, Central Motors (Glasgow), Ltd. v. Cessnock Garage and Motor Co. (1), the same question came up for decision as arises here. In that case a motor car was entrusted by its owner to a foreman of garage proprietors for safe custody overnight. During the night the night watchman in charge of the garage took the car out for his own purposes contrary to his employers' instructions and without their knowledge. While being driven by the night watchman the car collided with another car and was damaged. In defence to an action for damages by the owners of the car against the proprietors of the garage, the defendants pleaded that their servant had acted out of the scope of his employment and accordingly that they were not liable for the consequences of his conduct. It was held that "as the defenders had delegated their duty of keeping the car safely secured in the garage to their servant, they were liable to the pursuers for the servant's failure in performance." That was the opinion of the Lord President on appeal to the First Division of the Court of Session. Although the decision in that case is not binding on this court, it is, of course, entitled to the very greatest respect. In my opinion, it accords with the law of England. I therefore think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action.

Since it is agreed that the amount claimed, £236 12s. 6d., is the amount of damages, I direct judgment to be entered for that amount for the plaintiff, with costs.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Gaming—Lottery—Newspaper competition—Substantial degree of skill—Crossword puzzle—Correct words previously selected—Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934 (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 58), s. 22 (1) (c) (i), s. 26 (1) (b).

A newspaper published an offer of prizes for the correct solution of a crossword puzzle. The solutions sent in were not adjudicated on to determine which was the best, but were examined to see whether they coincided with a set of words chosen before the competition began by the competition editor of the newspaper as being the correct solution.

Held: there was nothing to suggest that the solution set up as the standard of correctness was the best solution or other than a solution arrived at by a person acting arbitrarily, capriciously, or even mischievously, nor what criterion had been adopted by reference to which the standard had been fixed, nor the method by which or the person by whom it would be decided whether a particular solution coincided with the standard solution; the only element of skill by a competitor lay in his guessing what the competition editor had already decided; and, therefore, the competition was not one in which success depended to a substantial degree upon the exercise of skill within s. 26 (1) (b) of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, and the proprietors of the newspaper were guilty of an offence under s. 22 (1) (c) (1).

Case Stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

Four informations were preferred at Bow-street Magistrate's Court by the appellant, Coles, an inspector of the metropolitan police, against the respondents, Odhams Press, Ltd., proprietors of The People newspaper, and Mr. Antil Gray, the publisher, by which they were charged, respectively, with publishing, on Jan. 27, 1935, in The People, an advertisement of a lottery called "Great Crossword Offer, £2,000," contrary to s. 22 (1) (c) of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, and with conducting a competition in which success did not depend to a substantial degree on the exercise of skill, contrary to s. 26 (1) (b) of the Act.

At the hearing of the summonses it was proved or admitted that on Jan. 27, 1935, The People published an offer of a prize of £2,000 and other prizes for the correct solution of a crossword puzzle. A number of correct words in the puzzle were not difficult to arrive at and had no alternatives. With regard to some spaces in the puzzle, two or more words would fill them, and in that sense the words were alternatives. The solutions sent in were not adjudicated on to determine which was (or were) the best, but before the competition began the competition editor of the newspaper had chosen a set of words as the solution of the puzzle. It was found as a fact that, where there were alternative words, the best was not always selected.

For the appellant it was contended that many of the alternative words were equally accurate and appropriate, and that, even though some skill might be exercised in arriving at the framework of the puzzle through the words which had no alternatives, if, in fact, there was no guide except a guess which would lead the competitor to determine which alternative word the editor of the newspaper would choose, then the scheme was a lottery because the prize was, in that event, allotted by chance. For the respondents it was contended that some element of skill was required to do the framework of the puzzle, and that, in addition, the ingenuity and skill required to complete the puzzle consisted in discovering the so-called alternatives and then looking carefully and critically at the words of the clue and rejecting the less appropriate word. It was further contended that the so-called alternatives were not really alternatives, but that one word was more appropriate than the other.

The magistrate found as a fact that in the greater number of cases the words chosen by the editor were the best and most appropriate words having regard to the clues, but that it was doubtful whether certain of the other words chosen were the most appropriate and had the best relation to the clues, and that in the case of some of them the alternative word was better. He was, however, of the opinion that the competition must be looked at as a whole and that he was not justified in dividing the question into what had been described as "easy words" and "difficult words." He found that a considerable element of skill was required to solve the puzzle and that the persons who had successfully solved the puzzle had exercised a substantial degree of skill. On those grounds he dismissed all the informations.

The appellant Coles appealed to the Divisional Court.

LORD HEWART, C.J. [after stating the facts of the case and the opinion of the magistrate:] Our attention has been directed, as it always is directed in cases of this kind, to Scott v. Director of Public Prosecutions (1), but the judgments in that case must obviously be read in close connection with the facts, and there seems to me to be not merely some difference, but, in the words of the ancient philosopher, "all the difference," between that case and the present case. In that case there was an advertisement of a D competition, the terms of which were that each competitor was to select one of a number of given words and compose a short sentence which defined or illustrated the word selected. The literary results so achieved were to be sent in to the editor of a newspaper, who undertook that all of them should receive careful consideration, and that then, having all of them before him, he would adjudicate finally and beyond the possibility of appeal on the question which was the best of them. In other words, it was, E within its modest limits, a kind of literary competition in which the editor was to be arbiter. There were many grounds on which it was suggested that the competition was a lottery. It was argued, on the other hand, that there was enough in the nature of skill to save the competition from that mischief, and the court so held, CHANNELL, J., concurring in the decision with some reluctance. It seems to me that there is all the difference in the world between a competition where persons engaged in a literary F enterprise allow somebody else to pick out the best and agree to abide by his decision and a case where persons undertake to make a series of shots at something already decided behind their backs on the terms, not that anybody shall exercise skill and judgment in deciding which is the best of the competitors' efforts, but that somebody shall perform the task of deciding which comes nearest to a secretly fixed standard. Scott v. Director of Public Prosecutions (1), therefore, seems to me to have no bearing on G the present case, except to illustrate the distinction which exists between that case and this. But it is to be observed that LUSH, J., said in his written judgment ([1914] 2 K.B. at p. 875):

> "Now, a scheme may either be on the face of it a lottery, that is a scheme for distributing money according to mere chance, or, if it is not, it may be shown by extraneous evidence that the parties concerned contemplated that it would be H conducted in that way."

The question which I ask myself is whether the inevitable conclusion on the materials before us now is not that this scheme is, on the face of it, a lottery.

What was the scheme? Certain words which, put together, might make a crossword puzzle were suggested by means of a series of clues. Acting on those clues, the competitor, who paid 3d. for one attempt or 1s. for four attempts, sent in his solution. I Then the question arose, when all the answers had been received and the appropriate date had been reached, which of those solutions coincided in the greatest number of particulars with the words selected beforehand by the competition editor. All that remained after the advertisement of the scheme was that the crossword solutions should be sent in, and then it was to be ascertained which came nearest to a solution to the puzzle already made, but hidden from the competitors. That seems to me to approach as nearly as possible, not indeed in all respects, but in most material respects, to Barclay v. Pearson (2).

The first summons charges the advertisement of a certain lottery. What is a lottery? A lottery is a distribution of prizes by lot or chance. The charge here is that the respondents on the day in question advertised a distribution of prizes by chance. What else was it? I have read the scheme again and again, and there is nothing in it to suggest, much less to undertake, that the solution adjudged to be correct will be intrinsically, or will be thought to be, the best solution. There is nothing to suggest, much less to undertake, that the competition editor will seek to find or to prescribe the best solution. There is no clue at all to the qualifications of the editor. There is no clue at all to the frame of mind in which he will act, or has already acted at the material time. There is no clue to the criterion, if any, by reference to which the standard has been fixed. The solution which is to be adjudged to be correct is not to be picked out of the efforts of the competitors in competition with each other. It is to be the solution which is found, on examination, to coincide most nearly with a set of words chosen beforehand by somebody not known, by a method, if any, not stated, that person being perfectly at liberty to act in an arbitrary, capricious, or mischievous spirit. In other words, the competitors are invited to pay a certain number of pence to have the opportunity of taking blind shots at a hidden target.

The magistrate has thought fit to find that this competition involved and contemplated a degree of skill. But skill about what? The element of skill, if any, is, in my opinion, to be directed, and directed only, to the lucky guessing of the details of a mysterious collection of unrelated words, selected beforehand by a person whose idiosyncrasies are as completely concealed as his methods, and whose ignorance may be co-extensive with the wisdom of Solomon. I see the word "lottery" written all over this scheme, and it passes my comprehension to understand how the magistrate could have come to the conclusion to which he came.

The case has been presented, or obscured, with a wealth of etymological, grammatical, and miscellaneous information, sufficient, one would think, to surprise and indeed to bewilder any competition editor. It has been a most interesting argument, but, in my opinion, almost wholly beside the mark. The question is: What was the nature of that which was being advertised? In my opinion, it comes within the words used by Lush, J., "a lottery upon the face of it." I think, therefore, that, on the material which the magistrate had before him, he came to a wrong conclusion, and that the only possible conclusion was that the offence had been committed.

I see from the shorthand note of the proceedings before the magistrate that, at the conclusion of the matter, the magistrate said to counsel who appeared for the respondents: "You must decide whether you will call your evidence. If you desire to call it, I will give you permission to do so now." And the answer was: "No, I think not." That is to say, being invited to offer what evidence was to be offered, then and there, counsel decided to refrain. He was perfectly within his rights in doing so, and it follows, therefore, that, when this case goes back to the magistrate with a direction that this is, upon the face of it, the advertisement of a lottery within the meaning of s. 22 (1) (c) (i) of the Act, the respondent will be entitled to offer such evidence as appears to them to be suitable. I cannot imagine what evidence can possibly be offered which could prevent the conclusion that the offence has been committed, but that will be for the magistrate to consider.

I think that this appeal should be allowed, and the case remitted in the manner which I have indicated.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I entirely agree with every word of the judgment which has been delivered by my Lord.

I only desire to add very few words. This is a case about an alleged lottery. There will never be any finality on the question of lotteries. It has been said more than once in judgments by members of this court that so soon as a particular scheme is declared by the court to be a lottery the skill and ingenuity of a number of extremely able persons will be exercised to try to discover some means of avoiding that judgment. On the other hand, it is not uninteresting to observe that the view taken by those who are the usual prosecutors in such cases may vary from time to time. As the result of a number of cases decided by this court, and some decided by magistrates, in which competitions were held to be lotteries, in a year which I think I am correct in saying was 1921, a A scheme was evolved which was believed to be prosecution-proof. On that scheme being tested at Bow-street Police Court, it was held to be a legal scheme. Much consideration was given to the matter in those days by the authorities, and it was decided not to contest the finding of the magistrate that the scheme was legal and did not amount to a lottery. In 1929, however, precisely that scheme came before this court in Hobbs v. Ward (3), and was held by the court, my Lord presiding, the other judges being Avory B and Swift, JJ., without any doubt at all to be a lottery. I only make those observations with reference to the decision in Scott v. Director of Public Prosecutions (1). I desire to add nothing to what my Lord has said with regard to that case, except that it may be that if, with the knowledge gained from cases which have been decided since, those learned judges were able to deal with the matter again, they might come now to a different conclusion. C

Out of respect for the argument of counsel for the respondents I want to say with regard to the present case that more than once he claimed that the competition editor of this newspaper had found the only possible solution of this crossword puzzle. If that were true, it would mean that this was a case in which there was a fact to be ascertained which might have been ascertained already or might fall to be ascertained at a later date, and, if that were the truth of the matter, I cannot myself doubt that counsel's D argument would be right, because the case would fall, as it seems to me, precisely within Caminada v. Hulton (4) and Hall v. Cox (5). But I think it is impossible to say, on the findings of the magistrate in this case, that the only possible solution, or, in other words, the necessarily correct solution, of this puzzle is that which the editor put forward as his solution and which was published in the newspaper as the correct solution. I think that it is quite obvious from the argument which has taken place before us to-day that E there are alternative solutions which some people might think better, some people might think not so good, and some people might think equally good. When there are alternative solutions the difficulty arises that the person who is to be considered, the competitor, is invited to decide which of two alternative solutions will be selected by some person whom he does not know, and by some method which is not indicated, and, in my view, that means, as my Lord has said, that on the face of it an invitation to enter such F a competition is an invitation to take part in a lottery.

I think that we have very little to do with the question what is our opinion or what was the magistrate's opinion as between one suggested solution and another suggested solution, one way or the other. It seems to me that this competition is one which, on the face of it, is a lottery. What we are dealing with in the first summons is the advertisement, and it seems to me that the advertisement is, on the face of it, an invitation to G persons to guess—because it can only be done by guessing—what will be the view of some unknown person who is called the competition editor as to the correct answer to give to a question connected with a crossword puzzle. That seems to me to be plainly a lottery, and, in my view, it is a lottery.

SINGLETON, J.—I agree that the appeal must be allowed. I am satisfied that the H magistrate was wrong in deciding that there was no case to answer.

Appeal allowed.

HAROLD WOOD BRICK CO., LTD. v. FERRIS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Greer, Slesser, and Roche, L.JJ.), May 22, 1935]

[Reported [1935] 2 K.B. 198; 104 L.J.K.B. 533; 153 L.T. 241; 79 Sol. Jo. 502]

Sale of Land—Contract—Time of the essence—Intention of parties—Land bearing plant of wasting kind used for trading purposes—Failure by purchaser to complete—Vendors' right to damages.

A contract for the sale of land comprising a brickfield with thereon plant connected with a brickmaker's trade contained a clause providing for completion of the purchase on three different dates, applicable in different sets of circumstances, which were specified, and continued: "but the purchase shall in any event actually be completed not later than" the latest of the three dates mentioned. The purchaser failed to complete on the agreed date, and the vendor, after giving notice that he proposed to treat the contract as repudiated, re-sold the property at a lower figure and claimed as damages the difference between the contract price and the price realised by the re-sale.

Held: the stipulation in the agreement as to the time of completion could not be disregarded without injustice to the parties because (i) on the true construction of the agreement the parties had stipulated that the time fixed should be essential, and (ii) the property sold included plant of a wasting kind to be used for trading purposes, and, therefore, time was of the essence of the contract and the vendor was entitled to re-sell the property and to damages the amount of which had been agreed between the parties.

Appeal from an order of SWIFT, J., in an action tried by him without a jury.

The plaintiffs, through their liquidator, claimed from the defendant damages for breach of an agreement dated Aug. 15, 1933, whereby the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to buy certain freehold land and buildings, together with machinery, plant and utensils, situated at Church-road, Harold Wood, Essex. The agreed price was £9,500, and the date for completion was Sept. 15, 1933.

By cl. 15 of the agreement:

> "(1) Payment of the purchase-money of £9,500 and completion of the purchase shall take place on Aug. 31, 1933, at the offices of the vendors' solicitors, Messrs. Reynolds, Sons and Gorst, 7, Arundel-street, Strand, W.C.2, or the purchaser may at his option complete the purchase on Aug. 15, 1933, at the said offices, in which event the purchase price to be paid by him shall be £9,000 instead of £9,500.
> "(2) If the purchaser's solicitors give notice to the vendors' solicitors (not later than Aug. 15, 1933), and with such notice pay 20 per cent. of the purchase price of £9,500 to the vendors' solicitors as a deposit and on account of the purchase-money, the purchaser shall be let into possession of the property as tenant at will of the vendors, the purchaser paying from such date interest at 5 per cent. per annum on the balance of the purchase-money and paying and being responsible for all rates, > taxes, assessments, duties, charges, rents, liabilities and out-goings whatsoever in respect of the property and keeping the property in as good a state of repair and condition as it was at the time of taking possession.

> "(3) If for any reason the actual completion of the purchase is delayed beyond Aug. 31, 1933, then nevertheless on that date the purchase-money of £9,500 (less the amount, if any, the purchaser may have paid on account thereof in respect of being given possession as a tenant at will as hereinbefore provided) shall be placed on deposit at the Westminster Bank, Ltd., Aldwych Branch, W.C.2, in the joint names of the vendors' solicitors and the purchaser's solicitors, but the purchase shall in any event actually be completed not later than Sept. 15, 1933. The purchaser shall also pay to the vendors interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from Aug. 31, 1933, until actual completion on the said sum of £9,500, or lesser amount as aforesaid, any bank deposit interest received by the vendors to be credited as on account of such interest."

By cl. 16:

> "Should the purchaser fail to complete the said purchase in accordance with this agreement . . . any deposit paid by the purchaser shall be forfeited to the vendors, who may rescind the same and re-sell the property either by public auction or private contract subject to such stipulations as they may think fit."

The defendant failed to complete on the agreed date, or at all, and did not pay any part of the purchase price, and by letter dated Nov. 13, 1933, the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendant that they proposed to treat such failure as a repudiation and to re-sell the property pursuant to cl. 16. In February, 1934, the plaintiffs re-sold the property at the price of £4,510, and they claimed the difference between the sum and £9,500, namely £4,990, as damages. The defendants contended that the plaintiffs could either rescind the sale or claim damages, but they could not do both.

Swift, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the damages claimed by them, notwithstanding that under the former practice in the Chancery Division a decree for rescission and an order for assessment of damages could not be obtained in the same proceedings. The defendant appealed.

GREER, L.J.—What we have to determine in this case is whether Swift, J., was right in coming to the conclusion that the defendant was liable to pay the plaintiffs damages for his failure to perform an essential term of the contract, which was of the essence of the contract. Unfortunately, the argument, as I gather from the judgment and from what we have been told, which was presented to the learned judge for consideration, was not quite in the same form as the argument which has been presented to us on behalf of the defendant, and, therefore, the words used by the learned judge do not seem to be exactly those which he would have used in giving judgment if the argument put before him had been the same as the argument which has been put before us. That, however, is immaterial. What we have to determine is whether the judgment which was entered up in accordance with the learned judge's oral judgment was or was not right. If it was right, it does not matter whether the learned judge failed to deal with all the points that have been argued in the course of the appeal. In my judgment, the learned judge came to a right decision in holding that the defendant was liable to pay damages, and, as the damages had been agreed, that meant liable to pay the agreed damages for the breach of a term which went—to use an expression commonly used by common law lawyers—to the root of the contract. The term which the defendant broke, and which justified the plaintiffs in saying: "You have repudiated the contract, you have released me from any further performance of it, and I am entitled to recover damages from you by reason of your repudiation of the contract," was a repudiation consisting of a refusal to carry out a term which was of the essence of the contract.

The agreement with which we are concerned is an agreement dated Aug. 15, 1933, for the sale of a brickfield. A brickfield is a piece of land, like any other piece of land, but this land had upon it the tools of a brickmaker's trade, some of them obviously of very considerable value. I mention that because, in one view, it might have become necessary for us to determine whether that consideration was sufficient to justify an inference that, though in the ordinary course the date of completion is not meant to be of the essence of the contract, yet, having regard to the fact that in this case there was a sale, not merely of the land, but of the land as it had been developed for the purposes of a brickfield with the tools of the trade carried on there, the date of completion, if there had been only one date, Aug. 15, 1933, was of the essence of the contract, both in equity and at common law. There is a good deal of authority on the question, and before deciding on it one would have liked to look at those authorities which seem to have the effect that if, though in form the sale is a sale of land, it in reality is the sale of a business enterprise, the equitable rule about time not being of the essence of the contract will not apply, either in the courts of Chancery or those of common law. Fortunately, it is not necessary to go into those authorities or to decide that question.

The clauses of the agreement which we have to consider are cls. 15 and 16. I agree with the argument that has been put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs that the effect of cl. 15 of the agreement is: that, if there had been nothing to consider but the date of completion, fixed primarily as Aug. 31, 1933, there might have been some difficulty in saying that the time so fixed should be regarded in equity as well as at common law as of the essence of the contract, but there are two other dates fixed. The clause expressly gives to the purchaser a right to further time if, by his solicitors, he gives notice to the vendors' solicitors,

> "not later than Aug. 15, 1933, and with such notice pay 20 per cent. of the purchase price of £9,500 to the vendors' solicitors as a deposit and on account of the purchase money, the purchaser shall be let into possession of the property as tenant at will of the vendors, the purchaser paying from such date interest at 5 per cent. per annum on the balance of the purchase-money and paying and being responsible for all rates, taxes, assessments, duties, charges, rents, liabilities and outgoings whatsoever in respect of the property and keeping the property in as good a state of repair and condition as it was at the time of taking possession."

That would seem to indicate that, if that clause were complied with, completion on that date, Aug. 31, 1933, could not be deemed to be of the essence of the contract. Then sub-para. 3 of cl. 15 goes on to say this:

> "If for any reason the actual completion of the purchase is delayed beyond Aug. 31, 1933, then nevertheless on that date the purchase money of £9,500 (less the amount, if any, the purchaser may have paid on account thereof in respect of being given possession as a tenant at will as hereinbefore provided) shall be placed on deposit at the Westminster Bank, Ltd., Aldwych Branch, W.C.2, in the joint names of the vendors' solicitors and the purchaser's solicitors."

I should have been inclined to the view that that clause was peremptory, and that, if the money were not paid on that date, it would be a ground on which the vendor would be entitled to say: "You have not performed that which was an essential term of the contract." It is not, however, necessary to determine that by reason of the words which follow, which I think are quite clear: "But the purchase shall in any event actually be completed not later than Sept. 15, 1933." That is to say, even though the money has been paid into the joint names within the first part of the clause, nevertheless, in any event, whether it has or whether it has not, the purchase shall be completed not later than Sept. 15, 1933.

> "The purchaser shall also pay to the vendors interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from Aug. 31, 1933, until actual completion on the said sum of £9,500, or lesser amount as aforesaid, any bank deposit interest received by the vendors to be credited as on account of such interest."

I agree with the contention that the only way in which effect can be given to the special words in this clause relating to completion on Sept. 15, is to make completion on that date a condition of the contract which is of the essence of the contract, and that it would A have been so held in a court of equity as well as in a court of common law.

That is quite sufficient to dispose of this case, because it is established beyond question that by Sept. 15, and for some little time thereafter, the purchaser had failed to comply with the obligation actually to complete the purchase not later than Sept. 15, that time being, according to the view that I take of cl. 15, made of the essence of the contract. Accordingly, the vendor is entitled at law to say: "You, the purchaser, have broken an B essential term of this contract; in consequence of that, I am entitled no longer to be bound by it, and the contract remains alone open for the purpose of my bringing an action for damages for the breach by you of that essential term of the contract."

But there are other reasons which would lead to the conclusion that the time of final completion was of the essence of the contract. Notwithstanding the fact that my brethren do not take the same view that I take of cl. 16, it seems to me that cl. 16 in C itself indicates that these parties intended that the time of final completion should be of the essence of the contract. You may say by words expressly in the contract to the effect that the time of completion shall be, notwithstanding any rule or law or equity to the contrary, of the essence of the contract, or the provision may be followed by words which in substance mean the same thing. If you say, as these parties did in cl. 16, that, if the purchaser fails to complete the purchase in accordance with the agreement at the D time fixed by the agreement, the vendor may rescind the same, you are thereby saying that that is a condition of the contract and the effect of non-performance is that there shall be, what there could not otherwise be, a recission by the other party to the contract. It is not necessary to consider, I think, the words of the clause which follow, except for the purpose of showing that there are agreed terms as to how the damages are to be estimated if the contract is rescinded by reason of a breach of an essential condi- E tion. The property may be re-sold either by public auction, by private contract, or subject to such stipulations as the vendor may think fit. The effect of that is that, if the vendor were measuring his damages by reason of the loss on a re-sale by auction, it could not be said: "If you had only waited a bit, and if, instead of selling by auction, you had sold by private contract, you would have got a larger figure"; and, also, it could not be said: "You cannot recover as the damages you are asking for, the difference F between what has been received and what you would have had under the contract, because you have put in stipulations which you ought not to have put in your particulars of sale, whether the sale be by contract or by auction." I think true effect is given to those words by assuming that they were put in for that purpose, and not for the purpose of emphasising or giving substance to the contention that the only rights of the vendor under that clause are to ask for the return of the deposit, if there has been one, and if G there has not been one, simply to rescind the sale and get his property back. That I think would be an unreasonable interpretation of cl. 16. I indicated in the course of the argument that that also was a clause which justified the argument that the time for completion was of the essence of the contract to succeed, but I do not find it necessary to rest my judgment upon that ground. What I have said with regard to that will be treated, I hope, not with contempt, but as part of the ratio decidendi of my judgment, H which I base mainly, if not solely, on the terms of cl. 15.

For these reasons, I think the learned judge was right in the conclusion he came to, and it is not necessary to go into the question whether in some other way, if time had not been of the essence of the contract, the conduct of the purchaser, when he was pressed to keep himself up to date would have been sufficient to show that, though time was not of the essence of the contract, by his conduct he had sufficiently indicated to I any reasonable mind that, if he had been allowed longer time, he would still not have been either willing or able to perform the contract. If that is a correct inference from the letters and correspondence that passed between the parties, it would not matter whether the term was of the essence of the contract or not; because, if one party indicates by his conduct that he is either unable or unwilling, whatever time may be given to him, to perform the contract, that would be sufficient to justify an acceptance of the repudiation and the suing of him for damages. I do not, however, think it necessary to determine that in this case. To determine it in favour of the defendant would, I think, be a little difficult, having regard to the nature of the correspondence, but it is not an impossible view to take in dealing with the facts. I base my judgment on the fact that a condition named in the agreement by the parties as of the essence of the contract has been broken by the appellant, and, therefore, the vendors were entitled to the damages awarded them by Swift, J. The appeal, therefore, will be dismissed with costs.

SLESSER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. At common law, before the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, the time fixed for completion was of the essence of the contract, and, looking at the agreement in this case, the date fixed for completion clearly was, in my view, Sept. 15, 1933; but by s. 25 (7) of the Act of 1873, which now finds expression in s. 41 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, it is provided that:

> "Stipulations in a contract, as to time or otherwise, which according to rules of equity, are not deemed to be or to have become of the essence of the contract, are also construed and have effect at law in accordance with the same rules."

Sir John Romilly, M.R., said in Macbryde v. Weekes (2) (22 Beav., at p. 540):

> "The difference being very marked between law and equity, so far as regards this question; law only considering time as of the essence of the contract, when it is expressly specified, whatever may be the condition of the parties and the property, but equity considering time essential in those cases only, in which injury would be inflicted upon one party by disregarding it."

Therefore, after the passing of the Judicature Act, the mere fact that a date of completion is mentioned in the agreement is not of itself any longer decisive of the question (as it might have been at common law) whether time is of the essence of the contract. But the mere fact that in equity that is not decisive does not lead necessarily to the conclusion that in a particular case the date mentioned for completion is not of the essence of the contract; and Lord Parker of Waddington said in Stickney v. Keeble (1) ([1915] A.C. at p. 416) that the equitable maxim that time was not of the essence of the contract:

> "never had any application to cases in which the stipulation as to time could not be disregarded without injustice to the parties, when, for example, the parties, for reasons best known to themselves, had stipulated that the time fixed should be essential, or where there was something in the nature of the property or the surrounding circumstances which would render it inequitable to treat it as a non-essential term of the contract."

In my opinion, both conditions which make the term as of the essence of the contract mentioned by Lord Parker are here fulfilled. To begin with, I think that the stipulation as to time could not be disregarded without injustice to the parties. The purchaser in this case is given very considerable latitude. In cl. 15 (1) of the agreement he has primarily contracted to complete on Aug. 15, 1933. If he completes not later than Aug. 15, 1933, he gets certain benefits, and an abatement of the price which he would otherwise have to pay. Sub-cl. (3) contemplates that he will not complete upon the stated date, for it says:

> "If for any reason the actual completion of the purchase is delayed beyond Aug. 31, 1933, then, nevertheless on that date the purchase-money of £9,500 (less the amount, if any, the purchaser may have paid on account thereof in respect of being given possession as a tenant at will as hereinbefore provided) shall be placed on deposit at the Westminster Bank, Ltd., Aldwych Branch, W.C.2, in the joint names of the vendors' solicitors and the purchaser's solicitors, but the purchase shall in any event actually be completed not later than Sept. 15."

and he is to pay certain interest. That concession which is given to the purchaser to delay beyond Aug. 31 by making the deposit and paying interest seems to me to make it clear that the intention of the parties was that, in return for that concession given to him, he should in any event finally complete by Sept. 15, 1933; and I think in the language of LORD PARKER that, the vendor having accepted that delay under the terms A of the contract, it would work an injustice to him if Sept. 15 were not to be regarded as the final day for the completion of the contract.

That is enough, in my opinion, to decide this point as regards time in favour of the plaintiffs, but I think also that there is sufficient evidence in the agreement itself and the schedule annexed to it, and in the original offer of May 23, 1933, when the property was described, to show that this property is a property of manifold qualities; it is not B merely freehold land, but it includes a kiln, one artificial dryer, modern machinery of up-to-date construction and arrangements for making wire-cut bricks, and electric power and the like. Taking it, therefore, as a whole, it is clear to me that it is property of a wasting kind, to be used for trading purposes, where surrounding circumstances would make it inequitable to treat time otherwise than as an essential term of the contract. Therefore, it follows that for these reasons time must be taken to be of the essence of C the contract. If that be so, the letters clearly show, to my mind, and the learned judge has so found, that the defendant repudiated the contract, and from that circumstance would follow the damages, the amount of which need not here be discussed because they have been agreed between the parties.

I agree with my Lord that those reasons are not entirely those which were given by the learned judge. As I read the learned judge's decision, no argument was ever D addressed to him on any basis but that time was of the essence of the contract. The argument went rather on the basis that cl. 16 provided the only method, and that the vendor had elected to proceed by that method, and that method gave no more than the right to recover the deposit—there being here no deposit—and to re-sell the property. For myself, I do not find it necessary to found any reason upon cl. 16. My difficulty in dealing with cl. 16 is that it was apparent from the first time I looked at it, that it E is a very difficult clause to construe and is capable of very varying interpretations. In certain points of view, I should have found support for the conclusion at which I have arrived that time is of the essence of the contract; but, if another interpretation were given to it, and it had the limited nature which is contended for on the one hand, then it would not afford me that support. I find it unnecessary to express any concluded opinion regarding the very difficult question of the construction of this clause, more F particularly as I find cl. 15, both in itself and in the circumstances in the schedule annexed to the agreement, sufficient to say that in equity it would work injustice were the time stated in the document not to be treated as of the essence of the contract; and, that being so, and the principles of equity now applying to the consideration of such a case under the Judicature Act, all that is required for the vendor to recover his damages on repudiation has been established by him. G

ROCHE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed, and I have very little to add. I agree with the opinion of my Lords that it was established that completion on Sept. 15—I see the agreement of sale describes it as being the date of the "actual" completion—was of the essence of the contract. I agree also that the purchaser, the defendant, had, by Nov. 13, failed to complete the purchase on that day; that he had H also made it plain that he was unable or unwilling to complete upon that day or at all. In those circumstances, the vendors were entitled, as they purported to do, to treat the contract as broken in an essential term by the defendant and to bring and sustain an action for damages. The amount of damages for the total breach of contract which had taken place was agreed between the parties, and that sum the plaintiffs recovered, and the judgment for that amount they are entitled to retain. I

I have stated my reasons for arriving at my conclusion thus compendiously because I wish, as did SLESSER, L.J., to make it plain that I should desire to reserve for future consideration, and if necessary for decision, all questions arising out of cl. 16 of this contract. In my judgment, the plaintiffs did not require to, and did not in fact, avail themselves of the stipulations contained in that clause. They proceeded, and succeeded, by way of their common law right, irrespective of that term of the agreement. I make that reservation, not merely because of the difficulties which arise out of the construction of that clause, but because of its obvious similarity to certain provisions in what has been described as the Lord Chancellor's rule in connection with contracts for the sale of land provided for under s. 46 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The very interesting discussion which has taken place in the arguments of counsel in this case has touched those points, and it is apparent that all writers do not agree upon the matter, and that one very eminent writer has modified, if not changed, his view from time to time on the questions arising on this cl. 16 and some of the conditions of the Lord Chancellor's rule. All those matters, therefore, I think it is unnecessary to deal with, and they form no part of my reasons for my conclusion in the present case.

Appeal dismissed.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Finlay, J.), April 11, 1935]

[Reported [1936] 1 K.B. 132; 105 L.J.K.B. 97; 154 L.T. 305; 51 T.L.R. 421; 79 Sol. Jo. 402]

Stamp Duty—Conveyance on sale—Contract, conditional on conveyance, vendor to build house on land—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict., c. 39), Sched. I, as amended by Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, (10 Edw. 7, c. 8) s. 73.

On Jan. 28, 1935, the A. company entered into a contract with B. whereby it was agreed that the A. company should sell to B. a piece of land for £500. On the same date the A. company entered into a second contract with B. whereby it was agreed that the A. company should erect on the land a house for £1,350 to be paid by B. The second contract was a conditional contract, to become absolute and binding on completion of the purchase of the land. On Mar. 4, 1935, an instrument of conveyance on sale of the piece of land for £500 was executed, containing a statement certifying that the transaction thereby effected did not form part of a larger transaction or of a series of transactions in respect of which the value exceeded £500.

Held: the test was whether the substance of the transactions between the parties was the sale and purchase of a house and land; looking at the matter as a whole, that was not so; there were two distinct contracts, one for the sale of the land and one for the erection of the house, the latter being conditional on the former; and, therefore, the stamp duty payable on the instrument of conveyance under Sched. I to the Stamp Act, 1891, and the Finance Act, 1910, s. 73, was the duty on the £500 and not on £1,850 (the aggregate of £500 and £1,350).

(1) M'Innes v. Inland Revenue, 1934 S.C. 424; 1934 S.N. 44; 1934 S.L.T. 365.

Case Stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to s. 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

1. On April 1, 1935, an instrument was presented by the appellants, Kimber & Co., to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the provisions of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

2. The instrument was a deed of conveyance bearing date March 4, 1935, and made A between vendors, of the one part, and a purchaser of the other part and purported to be a conveyance on sale of a piece of land for £500. It contained in the last paragraph a statement certifying that the transaction thereby effected did not form part of a larger transaction or of a series of transactions in respect of which the amount or value or the aggregate amount or value of the consideration exceeded the sum of £500.

3. With the said conveyance the appellants also submitted for the information of B the commissioners three contracts between the same parties, each bearing the date Jan. 28, 1935. They purported to be: (1) A contract for sale of the plot of land referred to in the said conveyance for £500. (2) A contract for the building of a house thereon by the vendors for £1,350 payable by instalments. (3) A deed of charge whereby the vendors agreed to advance to the purchaser the last £900 payable by the purchaser under the said building contract, and the purchaser covenanted to repay the money so advanced C with interest as soon as the house was certified as fit for occupation and charged by way of legal mortgage in favour of the vendors the premises agreed to be sold to the purchaser by the said contract for sale and all buildings to be erected thereon.

4. At the date of the said conveyance the house was partly erected on the said land, work to the value of about £300 having been carried out.

5. On the date of the said conveyance the purchaser paid to the vendors the sum of D £450, being the balance of the consideration for the sale of the land (£50 deposit having been paid on the signing of the contract) and £250 in respect of the erection of the house.

6. The appellants stated that after it had been stamped the conveyance would be handed back to the vendors in accordance with the provision to that effect contained in the contract for the building of the house.

7. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue were of opinion that the instrument was a E conveyance on sale of property, that there was a single transaction between the vendors and the purchaser for the sale of a plot of land and a house thereon, and that under the relevant statutory provisions the £1,350 payable under the building contract must be deemed part of the consideration in respect whereof the said conveyance was chargeable with ad valorem duty. The commissioners, accordingly, assessed the duty payable in respect of the said conveyance at £18 10s. being 10s. for every £50 of £1,850 (the aggre- F gate of the sums of £500 and £1,350 referred to in the said contract for sale and building contract), as representing the amount or value of the consideration for the sale in accordance with the head of charge "Conveyance or transfer on sale of any property" in Sched. I to Stamp Act, 1891, s. 73 of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, and other statutory provisions.

8. The appellants contended that the said conveyance was a conveyance on sale of G the land only, and that the amount of the consideration was the amount stated therein, namely, £500. They also contended that the said conveyance was a conveyance where the amount or value of the consideration for the sale did not exceed £500, and that the transaction thereby effected did not form part of a larger transaction or of a series of transactions in respect of which the amount or value or the aggregate amount or value of the consideration exceeded £500. The appellants accordingly submitted that the duty H payable in respect of the said conveyance was £2 10s. only by virtue of the said statutory provisions. They further contended that, if they were wrong in the above contention, the duty payable should be assessed, not on the purchase price for the land and completed house, but on the price for the land and the price or value of the building thereon at the date of the conveyance, not exceeding £300, making a total of £800, the duty whereon is £8. I

9. The appellants, being dissatisfied with the assessment, in pursuance of s. 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891, required the commissioners to state and sign a Case setting forth the question on which their opinion was required and the assessment made by them, and the commissioners stated and signed this Case accordingly.

10. The questions for the opinion of the court were: (i) Whether the conveyance dated March 4, 1935, was chargeable with the duty of £18 10s. in accordance with the assessment of the commissioners; (ii) whether the said conveyance was chargeable with the duty of £2 10s., as contended by the appellants; (iii) whether the said conveyance was chargeable with the duty of £8, as contended alternatively by the appellants; (iv) if with none of these duties, with what duty the instrument was chargeable.

J. M. Gover, K.C.; and W. E. Vernon for the appellants.
The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

FINLAY, J.—This case, like most cases under the Stamp Act, is troublesome, but I have arrived at the conclusion that the arguments which were urged upon me by Mr. Gover and Mr. Vernon ought to prevail.

The matter appears to depend to a substantial extent upon what is the proper inference to draw from the facts. What happened was this. An instrument was presented by the appellants to the commissioners for the opinion of the commissioners. That instrument was a deed of conveyance of March 4, 1935. It was a deed of conveyance of a plot of land, and the purchase price was £500. So far the matter would appear to be perfectly simple, but it is not so simple as it looks, because it is necessary to examine a little the earlier history. Three other contracts were, for the information of the commissioners, produced to them. The first was a contract for the sale of the plot of land. The second was a contract for the building of a house on the plot by the vendors for a sum of £1,350. The third contract, a deed of charge, does not appear to be important.

The question which arises is: What was the consideration for the conveyance? Here is a conveyance of land which at first sight looks quite simple, a conveyance of land for £500. But the substance of the transaction has got to be looked at, and the question is: What was the real consideration? Was it, as it is expressed to be £500 or was it something else?

The argument for the Crown is of this nature. It is said that, if you look at the documents as a whole, you will see that in substance the consideration here was not merely the £500, but was also the building of a house of a value of £1,350. The Crown say that these two contracts are completely interlaced; the contracts are two, but the transaction is really one. On the other hand, it is said that that is not right, that these are two separate and distinct contracts, and that that is shown by the fact that the one is expressed to be conditional upon the other. In order to see which argument is right it becomes necessary to look at the documents. First of all one takes the contract, dated Jan. 28, 1935, for the sale and purchase of the plot of land. With regard to that there is no contest that the consideration expressed, a quite genuine consideration, was a sum of £500. The purchase was to be completed on Feb. 21. It was in fact completed on March 4. I mention these dates because I think they are a little material when one comes to look at a Scottish case upon which, quite rightly, great reliance was placed by the Crown. It is material, I think, to observe that here it is perfectly plain that the parties could not have contemplated that by any possibility the house would be completed at the date fixed for the completion of the contract. That, I think, when one looks at the Scottish case, will be seen to be of importance. Clause 7 of the contract, which was relied on by both parties and was admittedly of great importance provided:

> "Contemporaneously with the exchange of this contract the parties hereto have entered into a separate contract whereby the vendor undertakes to erect a house upon the plot for the purchaser upon the terms and at the price therein mentioned. It is hereby agreed that the building contract is a conditional contract and that the same shall become absolute and binding upon the parties hereto upon completion of the purchase of the plot provided always that if the purchaser shall be under a duty to but shall neglect or fail to complete her purchase of the plot according to this agreement then (for the purposes of assessing any damages to which the vendor may be entitled by reason of such neglect or failure) the building contract shall at all times be deemed to be an absolute contract."

What that means, I think, is plain. It refers to the other contract, and says that that other contract is a conditional contract to become absolute and binding upon completion of the purchase of the plot. The importance of that seems to me to be that it makes it quite clear, as I think, that there are two distinct contracts—one absolute, and the other conditional, and it shows that what was contemplated and intended by the parties was that there should be, first of all, a sale of the plot of land for the price agreed upon between them, and then, when that sale was completed, there was to be a house built upon the site by the vendor. Of course the case could not have been argued if there had been simply a sale of the plot and then a contract with some outside builder to build the house. The matter would have been perfectly clear. The difficulty, such as it is, in the case, arises from the circumstance that the vendor is not only vendor but also the builder who was to erect the house.

That leads me to the other material contract. It is an agreement of the same date, Jan. 28, 1935. It begins by saying in the second paragraph:

> "A. B. shall forthwith give the company vacant possession of the said premises, and the company shall complete the said dwelling-house in a good and workmanlike manner to the reasonable satisfaction of A. B. on or before the 31st August, 1935."

I agree with the view that was presented by counsel for the appellants with regard to that. It appears to me to show that what was contemplated was that this agreement should come into operation when completion occurred; that is to say, that when completion occurred there was to be built this house. Then there are provisions for payment at various dates, and I may mention, though I do not myself think it is material, that the vendor builder did start building before completion, and at the date of completion something like an expense of £300 had been incurred. Clause 14 of the contract provides:

> "A. B. as beneficial owner hereby charges by way of legal mortgage all and singular the property mentioned in the schedule hereto with the payment to the company of all moneys due or to become due by her under this contract."

Clause 16 provides that until the moneys due have been paid the conveyance from the company to A. B. shall remain deposited with the company. I cannot see that those clauses have any great bearing on the question which I have to decide. They show, no doubt, that it was contemplated that the purchaser should be beneficial owner at the time when this contract operated, and to that extent they no doubt favour the argument which was urged upon me by counsel for the appellants. Beyond that they do not seem to me to help very much.

It is really not necessary to refer in any detail to the provisions of the Stamp Act. The provisions dealing with conveyances are to be found in the schedule, and s. 54 defines the meaning of the word "conveyance." I do not think that much assistance is to be got from the terms of the Act. It is clear that what one has got to ascertain is what is the consideration. Section 10 of the Finance Act, 1900, does to some extent assist the argument of counsel for the appellants, particularly when regard is had to the manner in which that section was dealt with by the Inner House in the case (to which I refer later) which has caused me most difficulty in deciding the present case.

Dealing with the matter apart from that authority, I should have thought that it was reasonably clear. I was instructed by counsel on both sides as to the position between a contract for sale of land and the conveyance. It must always be interesting to a common law judge to learn from these high authorities that in the interval between the dates of those instruments the purchaser is equitable owner of the property, and the vendor, though not what is called, I think, a bare trustee, is a trustee for the purchaser. So there is no doubt that from the date of this contract the purchaser was in equity the owner of the plot of land. I should have thought that it was reasonably plain that the proper view to take in this case was that there were two separate contracts, the one a contract for the sale of the land, and the other a separate contract, and shown to be separate by reason of the fact that it was conditional upon the first, for the erection of the building, and while, of course, there is a perfectly obvious connection by reason of the fact that the vendor is also the builder, I should have thought that we might test it by considering what would be the position if the purchaser had bought the land and gone to another builder. The thing would have been clear, and I cannot help thinking that it is the circumstance, to some extent accidental, that the vendor is also the builder that has caused the difficulty which has arisen here and has made it necessary for me to deal carefully and fully with the argument that it is one transaction. All I can say is that surveying the matter as carefully as I can—and I have listened with attention to a very able argument by which I was much assisted—I think it is not all one transaction. I think it is two transactions expressed in two different documents, one being conditional upon the other. There is a contract for the sale of the land, and there is a contract to build the house.

Some difficulty is caused by the decision of the First Division in M‘Innes v. Inland Revenue (1). That case does bear some resemblance to the present, and it is desirable that I should say how I regard it. It is not, of course, technically binding upon me, but I think that it is well settled that where there is an Act applicable both to England and to Scotland a judge of first instance sitting in England should follow a decision of the Inner House in the Court of Session where he is satisfied that that decision applies, and if I were satisfied that this case of M‘Innes (1) would, if it had been a decision of the Court of Appeal in England instead of the Court of Session in Scotland, have bound me, I should have thought it my duty to follow it, leaving it, I should have thought proper, to the Court of Appeal here to consider it. I, therefore, have to look at this Scottish decision to see whether it covers the point before me.

While, undoubtedly, the case bears some resemblance to the present, I have arrived at the conclusion that it can be, and ought to be, distinguished. What happened there was this. There was a gentleman who was desirous of entering into a feu contract with reference to a plot of land in Scotland and having a bungalow built upon it. Thereupon he entered into two contracts, one with a gentleman Mr. Keanie, who was the owner, and the other with a company in which Mr. Keanie was the controlling shareholder, who were builders. Later on—and this is important, I think—at a date when the house was either completed, as it is stated in the headnote, or on the point of completion, as it is stated in another place, the feu contract was entered into. In those circumstances the Inner House arrived at the conclusion that the assessment made by the commissioners was right, that assessment covering both the duty capitalised and also the price of the house. There is an elaborate judgment by the Lord President, LORD CLYDE, but I think the gist of the decision can be got from the judgment of LORD MORISON. What he says is this:

> "Now in this case there are two sets of documents, namely, the missives which are dated contemporaneously and which are part and parcel, in my opinion, of one transaction. It seems to me that the effect of the missives is that the appellant bought a house and a site for it. That is the substance of the transaction, and a consideration of both sets of missives was necessary to ascertain the true consideration of the transaction. The value of the ground was £84, and that was the consideration which the appellant gave for it. The value of the house was £630. It seems to me, therefore, that it is impossible to hold this conveyance, which carries right both to the site and to the house, is properly stamped with a stamp which covers only the price of the site. I think that the production of the missives is also a conclusive answer to the argument that was based on s. 10 of the 1900 Act. If it was a house on the site that was bought by the appellant, it seems quite clear that s. 10 has no application."

That seems to me to show the distinction which exists between this case and the Scottish case. That the Scottish case was one of some difficulty I do not think can be doubted. A complication arose by reason of the fact that the company, Keanie, Ltd., and the individual Mr. Keanie were separate entities. I do not need to go into that, but I think that the judgment of LORD MORISON makes it reasonably clear that the court there, attaching weight to the circumstance that the house was on the site when the feu contract was entered into, felt able to take the view on a survey of the whole thing that the substance of it was that it was a sale, not of a site, but a sale of a house or bungalow, with, of course, the site upon which it was placed. That, I think, distinguishes the case. I may add that, in my view, the passage which I have read from LORD MORISON's judgment justifies the observation which I made earlier that s. 10 of the Act of 1900 does seem to me to support the argument of counsel for the appellants. No doubt, it directly relates to the ordinary case where the purchaser has, so to speak, gone elsewhere for the contract to improve the land, but I am not satisfied that it could not apply to such a case as the present, and I observe that the Inner House in disposing, as they did to their own satisfaction, of s. 10 in that case, relied upon the circumstance that the sale was a sale of a house, and, therefore, s. 10 could have no application. Here there is on the facts room for the application of s. 10, and I think that that, particularly when the judgments in Scotland are looked at, does reinforce counsel's argument. The substance of the view taken by the Inner House seems to me to be that there you could regard the whole as one transaction, and, so regarding it, it became apparent that the reality of the matter was that it was the sale of a house. I am not going back over the ground which I have covered somewhat fully, but it does seem to me that when one looks at the facts here it is impossible to say that the reality here was that this transaction was for the sale of a house. It was not, if for no other reason than that the house, as a house, did not exist at the date of the conveyance.

An alternative view was suggested, the effect of which would be that the conveyance would be stampable in respect of the £500, and the value of what in fact was on the ground at the time. I do not think that that can be right. It depends upon the accidental circumstance that the builder, no doubt having confidence in his client, had gone in and begun before it was contemplated that he should. I think it clear upon the document that what was contemplated and intended was the sale of the site, and then the erection of a building upon it, and I cannot think that the fact that by a sort of accident there was a partially built erection upon the site at the date when, in fact, completion took place, can affect the matter. I was told that this was in the nature of a test case. The difficulty about that is that these cases must, to a considerable extent, depend upon their facts, and the facts in one case are not likely to be exactly the same as the facts in another. All I can say is that I think that one has got to look at the substance of the thing. I think one has got to see whether the transaction is really all one transaction, so that, to adopt substantially the language of the First Division, one can see that the reality of the thing is that it was a contract for the sale of a house. If one sees that, then, as I think, the Crown would be right. If one takes, as I take in this case, the other view, that there were two distinct contracts and two distinct transactions, one conditional upon the other, then I think the conveyance representing one of these transactions is stampable only by reference to the consideration, in this case £500, which has reference to that separate transaction, namely, the sale of the plot of land.

I arrive at the conclusion that the contention of the appellants is right, and the result will be that I answer the second question in favour of the appellants.

Re DEBTOR (No. 11 of 1935)

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Deed of assignment—Participation by petitioning creditor in bringing deed into existence.

One of the petitioning creditors attended a meeting of the debtors' creditors at which a resolution was passed that the debtors be called on to execute a deed of assignment of their joint and separate estates to C. A. J. as trustee. The petitioning creditor proposed as an amendment of the resolution that one W. be appointed joint trustee with C. A. J., but that amendment was lost. The petitioning creditor did not vote for the original resolution. He allowed his name to be put forward as a member of the committee of inspection, but he refused to sign the deed and later declined to attend a meeting of the committee, saying that he did not regard himself as a member of it.

Held: to preclude the petitioning creditor from subsequently relying on the deed as an act of bankruptcy on the part of the debtors it was not necessary that he should have taken advantage of the deed in some way; participation by him in bringing the deed into existence was sufficient; and, therefore, a receiving order which had been granted against the debtors in the county court must be discharged.

Appeal by the debtors from a receiving order made at Oxford County Court.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the registrar of the county court.

"On June 27, 1935, a meeting of the creditors of the debtors was held, and among those present was a Mr. T. H. Tombs, a member of the firm of T. H. Tombs and Son, plumbers, who were creditors for the sum of £733 12s. 2d. in respect of which they had already, on June 19, 1935, issued a writ, but—at the date of the meeting—had not obtained judgment. A Mr. E. R. White, chartered accountant, was also present, and at the opening of the meeting Mr. Tombs proposed him as chairman and he was duly elected. Mr. White explained to those present at the meeting the difference between and the advantages and disadvantages of a deed of arrangement and bankruptcy. A statement of affairs prepared by a firm of chartered accountants of Oxford was read to the meeting by a Mr. C. A. Jakeman, a member of the firm, and, after questions had been asked, a resolution was proposed and seconded in the following terms: 'That the debtors be called upon to execute a deed of assignment of their joint and separate estates to Mr. C. A. Jakeman, incorporated accountant, . . . as trustee with a committee of inspection.' Mr. Tombs proposed as an amendment that Mr. White be appointed a joint trustee with Mr. Jakeman. This was seconded and put to the meeting and lost, and the original resolution was then put to the meeting and carried. There was no evidence whether any one was given an opportunity to vote against the original resolution when put to the meeting. Mr. Tombs said that he did not vote against it, but, in my opinion, it may fairly be assumed that he did not vote for it. The following were then proposed as members of the committee of inspection, namely, Mr. T. H. Tombs, Mr. E. J. Hughes and Mr. E. Basson, and they were appointed as such members. It was stated in evidence that Mr. White said: 'If there is to be a committee of inspection, Mr. Tombs, as the largest creditor, should be on it.' There is no evidence to show that Mr. Tombs made any objection to his name being put forward as a member of the committee of inspection. At the conclusion of the meeting, Mr. Jakeman spoke to Mr. Tombs as he was about to leave the room and asked him to sign the deed. I have no evidence whether before this the deed had been executed by the debtors or not. Mr. Jakeman's evidence was that Mr. Tombs replied that he was not going to sign the deed then, but would take further advice. Mr. Tombs's evidence was that his reply was: 'I haven't signed the deed, neither do I intend to,' and that he may have mentioned at a later time something about taking further advice. Two days after the meeting, Mr. Tombs went away for a holiday. On July 17 Mr. Jakeman telephoned Mr. Tombs, who had then returned home, and asked him to attend a meeting of the committee of inspection, and Mr. Tombs's reply was that he was not coming, as he did not regard himself as a member of the committee. At the hearing of the petition before me, Mr. Tombs, in reply to a question put by me whether he had any preference as between a deed of assignment and bankruptcy, said that he preferred bankruptcy in any event. On July 31, 1935, judgment was signed in default of appearance upon the writ issued by the creditors, Messrs. Tombs and Son, against the debtors, and on Aug. 11 a bankruptcy petition was filed by the creditors alleging as the act of bankruptcy the execution by the debtors of the deed of assignment on June 27, 1935. This deed has been duly registered, the requisite number of consents has been obtained, and as a deed of assignment it is valid. It has never been signed nor has any assent been given to the deed by the creditors, Messrs. T. H. Tombs and Son. Notice of opposition to the making of receiving orders has been given on the ground that the petitioning creditors are estopped from relying on the act of bankruptcy named in the petition and the point for decision is whether, by his conduct at the meeting of creditors, Mr. T. H. Tombs, as agent for the petitioning creditors, must be taken to have acquiesced in or assented or been privy to the deed."

The registrar held that the "objectors" had failed to discharge the onus of proving that the petitioning creditors intentionally took advantage of the deed having been executed or were otherwise privy to or acquiesced in the deed, and he, therefore, made the receiving order. The debtors appealed to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy.

C. Tindale Davis for the debtors.
P. A. Devlin for the petitioning creditors.

CLAUSON, J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the registrar of the county court of Oxfordshire holden at Oxford. The registrar made a receiving order on Aug. 22, 1935, having held that there was nothing to preclude the petitioning creditors from relying upon the act of bankruptcy which they alleged, namely, that the two debtors had executed a deed of assignment. The debtors now ask that we should reverse that order and that the petition should be dismissed on the ground that, notwithstanding the execution of the deed, the petitioning creditors ought not to be allowed to rely upon that execution as giving them the right to obtain relief in bankruptcy against the debtors.

The facts are contained in a very careful judgment by the registrar, and I do not wish to criticise his presentation of them, but he appears to me to have misdirected himself in point of law. He has taken the view that the objectors—I am using his own language—did not discharge the onus placed upon them of proving that the petitioning creditors intentionally took advantage of the deed having been executed or were otherwise privy to or acquiesced in the deed. He, therefore, held that a receiving order should be made, while on the facts (as he finds them) it appears to me that the petitioning creditors were sufficiently privy, if not to the deed, at all events to all the circumstances which led up to its execution, to preclude them from relying upon its execution as being an act of bankruptcy.

It will be convenient, before I refer briefly to the facts, that I should read a passage from the judgment of LORD CAIRNS, L.C., in Ex parte Stray (1). LORD CAIRNS says:

"It is well settled by a series of authorities, of which the case of Ex parte Alsop (2) > may be mentioned as the last, that a creditor who is a party or privy to a deed of the description mentioned in the statute, or who has acted in any way which would be equivalent to an assent, recognition, or approval of the deed, cannot allege that the execution of the deed is an act of bankruptcy. I apprehend that the principle upon which those cases (the authority of which cannot now be questioned) have gone is this, that inasmuch as, under the statute, the petitioning creditor is obliged to allege that the act in question is a fraudulent act, any person who has been a participator or sharer in the fraud cannot be heard to claim any benefit or advantage from the act."

Assuming that the petitioning creditor has been a participator or sharer in what LORD CAIRNS speaks of as the fraud—which I understand means the bringing into being of the deed of arrangement—the difficulty in which he is, when he relies upon the execution of that deed as a ground for a receiving order, is that the court is bound to say that it is contrary to principle that a person who has been a participator in what the legislature regards as a fraud should, in order to obtain relief for himself, set up that somebody else has been guilty of the very fraud in which he participated. Counsel for the debtors suggested that this was the correct way of putting it. I should put the matter differently, and rely on s. 5 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which enables the court to dismiss the petition if it is satisfied that for some sufficient cause no order ought to be made, and hold that, having regard to the well-settled practice during the last seventy years since Ex parte Stray (1), it is sufficient cause for refusing to make an order granting the petitioning creditor relief on the ground of the deed having been executed, that it appears that the petitioning creditor was himself a participator or sharer in bringing the deed into existence.

That being my view of the law, I now turn to the facts. It appears that at a meeting of creditors called to consider the position the project was put forward of having a deed of arrangement. One of the petitioning creditors, Mr. T. H. Tombs, suggested that a nominee of his own should be a joint-trustee with the trustee who was being suggested on behalf of other persons interested. That proposal did not receive acceptance from the other creditors and was dropped, but the more important and what seems to me to be the crucial fact is this. The question arose who should serve on the committee of inspection. The name of Mr. T. H. Tombs was proposed, and, in his presence and quite plainly with his acquiescence, it was resolved that the committee should consist of certain persons, one of whom was himself. He did not in fact sign the deed, but, in my view, that does not matter, for it is impossible to hold that he did not take a part in the procedure which led up to the execution of the deed. It was, in fact, executed by the debtors practically simultaneously; it is dated the same day and was executed as the result of what occurred at the meeting.

Where the registrar has gone wrong seems to be this that, after stating all these facts, he holds that this petitioning creditor is not precluded from relying on the execution of the deed as an act of bankruptcy unless he has taken advantage of the deed having been executed, though it is true that the registrar adds the words: "or [was] otherwise privy to or acquiesced in the deed." He seems to have thought that participation in the proceedings was not enough, that there must be something to show that some kind of advantage was taken of the deed by the petitioning creditor.

It is, no doubt, the case that in Ex parte Stray (1) there were facts upon which the judges might have relied as showing that the petitioning creditor had taken advantage of the execution of the deed and so on that ground would be precluded from relying upon its execution. But, in my view, we in this court are bound to follow the statement of the law which I have read from Ex parte Stray (1). This statement has been a guide to the court ever since, and, in my view, we ought to consider it a sufficient cause for refusing to make the receiving order that this petitioning creditor—relying as he does upon the execution of the deed as an act of bankruptcy—took part in the proceedings which led up to it. It is on that ground that I feel unable to agree with the judgment of the registrar, and, in my view, we must allow the appeal and discharge the receiving order, with the usual result as to costs.

Copyright—Infringement—Action by publisher—Undisclosed author—Rights of plaintiff—Copyright Act, 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 46), s. 6 (3) (b).

In 1896 an edition of a book entitled THE PERFECT CEREMONIES OF CRAFT MASONRY was published, being sufficiently different from earlier editions to constitute that edition a new work for the purposes of the Copyright Act, 1911. From 1896 onwards the editions were published without the name of an author, but on the books it was stated that they were "privately printed for A. Lewis." J. H. carried on a business of publishing masonic rituals under the name of A. Lewis, down to 1909, when he died and bequeathed his business and goodwill, including the masonic rituals and books issued by him under the name "A. Lewis," to G. H., who carried on the business until he died in 1922. G. H.'s wife, the plaintiff, then continued to carry it on under the name "A. Lewis," and published amended editions of the work in question, none of which, however, constituted a new literary work which could be the subject-matter of copyright. The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain infringement of the copyright in the work by the defendants, who put in issue the existence of copyright and also that she was the owner of it. The plaintiff then relied on s. 6 (3) (b) of the Act of 1911 which provided that in any action for infringement of copyright in a work, if the author's name was not printed on the work and the name of the publisher or proprietor of the work was printed thereon, the person whose name was so printed should, unless the contrary was proved, be presumed to be the owner of the copyright for the purpose of the proceedings in respect of the infringement of copyright therein.

Held: under s. 6 (3) (b) the publisher sued on behalf of the owner of the copyright, none of whose rights was divested by the operation of para. (b); that paragraph dealt only with procedure and did not enure to confer any copyright on a publisher suing under it; the plaintiff was not the publisher of the 1896 edition, the last edition capable of being regarded as a new work for the purpose of copyright, and J. H. had no rights which he could transmit through G. H. to the plaintiff; and, therefore, the action must fail.

Notes. The Copyright Act, 1911, was repealed by the Copyright Act, 1956, of which s. 20 (4) is equivalent to s. 6 (3) (b) of the Act of 1911.

A Appeal by the plaintiff from an order of CLAUSON, J.

The facts are set out in the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

Schiller, K.C., and E. J. Macgillivray for the plaintiff.

Morton, K.C., and G. H. B. Streatfield for the defendants.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This appeal fails. It is an appeal from CLAUSON, J., B who had to give his judgment upon a Special Case submitted for the decision of the court by an arbitrator. A number of questions were submitted by the arbitrator, but CLAUSON, J., came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief claimed in the action, whereupon the award directed that > "the plaintiff do pay to the defendants their costs of the action and reference and also do pay the costs of this my award."

C The action was brought to establish the plaintiff's right against the defendants for infringing a copyright which it was claimed belonged to the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed the usual relief in an action based upon copyright, namely, an injunction to restrain the defendants from publishing, printing, and so on a book published by them entitled EMULATION WORKING, or any part or parts thereof which had been copied or colourably altered from the plaintiff's literary work entitled THE PERFECT CEREMONIES D OF CRAFT MASONRY, and she also made a claim for damages and so on. These cases of copyright involve, as this one does, some rather difficult questions.

It is, I think, extremely important before I go to the structure of the action and the law applicable to it that I should state what I conceive to be the facts presented to the court by the findings of the arbitrator in the Special Case. They are that there was in the year 1874 a book or compilation which was entitled THE PERFECT CEREMONIES OF E CRAFT MASONRY. Who was the original compiler or author of the book in 1874 does not appear. There were a number of editions of that compilation, but in 1896 it appears that there was a new compilation and that that 1896 edition was sufficiently different from anything that had been published in the previous twenty-two years to constitute that edition of 1896 a new work for the purpose of the Copyright Act. So the arbitrator finds:

> "I find that the 1896 edition was a new work for the purposes of the Copyright Act, but there is no evidence upon which I can determine who was the author or compiler of the said edition, nor whether such author or compiler is or was at the date of the issue of the writ in the action still alive or not."

The editions which have been issued from 1896 subsequently declare on the title page G that they are "Privately printed for A. Lewis." I read from the 1896 book. Again in 1899 there appears the same imprint, "Privately printed for A. Lewis, London, 1899." We have evidence which the learned arbitrator accepted that, at any rate, from 1896 down to 1909 a man named John Hogg was carrying on a business of publishing masonic rituals at Paternoster Row under the name of A. Lewis. The arbitrator says:

> "It is proved that from about 1906 until his death on Aug. 2, 1909, John Hogg was H carrying on a business of publishing masonic rituals at 13, Paternoster-row, London, under the name of A. Lewis. During that time the said business was managed for him by his nephew Godfrey James Hogg as a paid servant."

The arbitrator finds that down to 1909 when he died any copyright which could then exist in any part of the said book or any edition thereof was legally vested in John Hogg. I am, therefore, going to take it, for the purpose of considering the plaintiff's rights, that I there was some copyright in an edition which is rooted in 1896, of which reprints were published from time to time down to 1899, and that John Hogg was the person in whom was the copyright of this edition of 1896 on which the reprints were founded down to his death in August, 1909. When he died he left a will, and by his will he bequeathed his business, his goodwill, his stock-in-trade including the masonic rituals and books issued by him under the name of A. Lewis, and his interest in the lease of the premises to Godfrey James Hogg absolutely, but upon two conditions, one of which I will treat as a condition subsequent, namely, that he should pay a certain person by equal quarterly payments a certain sum per annum, and subject to another condition that he should execute within six months of the death a certain deed containing a covenant and so on. The arbitrator finds that there was no evidence sufficient to satisfy him that the second condition had been complied with. He says:

> "I find, therefore, there is no evidence whether or not Godfrey James Hogg either complied with the said condition or executed the deed in accordance with the proviso."

It is also to be observed that it is not recorded or stated in the Special Case that there was any evidence that among the personal property of John Hogg there was at the time of his death remaining and vesting in him a copyright in the book of 1896.

After the death of John, Godfrey James Hogg carried on his business and died on Nov. 7, 1922. He had married his wife previously in 1890, and upon his death in 1922 she continued to carry on the business as it had been carried on by her husband under the name of A. Lewis, and she is the plaintiff in this action. It seems that after her husband had died she employed two persons, a Mr. London and a Major Wodehouse, and it was by them that certain alterations and improvements were made in various reprints of this book which were issued. But it is expressly found by the arbitrator that these amendments were not sufficient to constitute any of these reprints a new literary work which could stand upon its own feet as the subject-matter of, and attracting the right of, copyright.

Those are, I think, all the facts I need state, and I will, first of all, deal with the matter quite apart from a scrutiny of the Act of Parliament. The plaintiff claims that she is entitled to restrain the infringement of copyright said to have been committed by the defendants. The defendants have put in issue, first, the question whether there is any copyright at all, and, secondly, whether there is any copyright vested in the plaintiff. Let me assume in the plaintiff's favour that the edition of 1896 was properly the subject of copyright and that the subsequent reprints, if not actual reprints, were substantially reproducing the work of 1896. Has it been proved that that personal property of John Hogg has passed to the plaintiff? I find myself in accord with those who have gone before and have considered this question. It appears to me that there is no sufficient proof that this copyright formed a part of the personal property of John Hogg in 1909 or that it was taken by Godfrey James Hogg upon his succession or that it has passed to the present plaintiff. I think it is difficult to establish that that successional legal right—I will call it a successional legal right—is vested in the plaintiff.

I come now to consider what is the claim that is made in the action. I can leave out the matters that were dealt with by a previous action which came to an end by a settlement in June, 1932, and I take the amended statement of claim which states that the plaintiff is the owner of the copyright in a book called The Perfect Ceremonies of Craft Masonry, and in the successive editions thereof issued from 1874 to 1929, and then alleges that from and after June 2, 1932, the defendants published a book which is copied directly in whole or in part from the 1929 edition of the plaintiff's book, and, therefore, is an infringement of her copyright. When particulars were asked for in order to ascertain with greater accuracy what is the actual claim of the plaintiff, which had been put at large from 1874 to 1929, these particulars were given:

> "The copyright in the 1926 and 1929 editions was acquired by the plaintiff . . . under s. 5 (1) (b) of the Copyright Act, 1911, the same being compiled by Edmund Neville London and Arthur Hugh Wodehouse in the course of their employment by the plaintiff under a contract of service."

That is a definite statement that the plaintiff will rely upon s. 5 (1) (b) of the Copyright Act, 1911, whereby the ownership of a copyright is given to the employer of the person who is the author, but who made the literary product under a contract of service or apprenticeship and the work was made in the course of the employment by that person. It will be seen, therefore, that the plaintiff claims the two editions of 1926 and 1929 as having been made for her by these persons under a contract of service, she being the employer, but upon the facts as found in the Case that work or the services rendered by those two persons did not enure to give the result of their work a separate and independent copyright. The copyright originated and stood upon the work of 1896, and these later editions, successively issued from time to time, whether in 1926 or 1929, derived their copyright from the original work and did not stand by themselves so as to be new products in either of those years to which s. 5 (1) (b) would apply.

It, therefore, appears upon the facts that the plaintiff cannot declare that she was the owner of a new copyright which dated either from 1926 or from 1929, and so she relies upon a presumption which is given under s. 6 (3). That section was put in, no doubt, to facilitate the enforcement of rights against infringers in cases where works have been published anonymously, but have the authorisation that they are published by a publisher whose name appears as an imprint at the outset of the work. Section 6 deals with civil remedies. First of all, in sub-s. (1), it says that the owner of the copyright shall be entitled to an injunction and remedies and so on. Then it says in sub-s. (3):

> "In any action for infringement of copyright in any work, the work shall be presumed to be a work in which copyright subsists and the plaintiff shall be presumed to be the owner of the copyright, unless the defendants put in issue the existence of the copyright or, as the case may be, the title of the plaintiff."

Both those things are put in issue in the present proceedings, and we have to deal with the particular case which is met by cl. (b) of sub-s. (3) of s. 6, which says:

> "If no name is so printed or indicated, or if the name so printed or indicated is not the author's true name or the name by which he is commonly known, and a name purporting to be that of the publisher or proprietor of the work is printed or otherwise indicated thereon in the usual manner, the person whose name is so printed or indicated shall, unless the contrary is proved, be presumed to be the owner of the copyright in the work for the purposes of proceedings in respect of the infringement of copyright therein."

I am going to take it that these words "privately printed for A. Lewis" are sufficient to satisfy the words that there is the name of a publisher "indicated thereon in the usual manner." What does the section then provide? A person whose name is so indicated "shall be presumed to be the owner of the copyright in the work for the purposes of proceedings in respect of the infringement of copyright therein." That seems to me in comparatively clear terms to indicate that for the purposes of the proceedings the person who can say that he has the name indicated upon the work is to have a locus standi as the plaintiff to enforce his rights against an infringer. He can without disclosing the true author's name stop the infringement, but does it go beyond that? Is it intended to enure for the benefit of persons whose names are not so printed or indicated and cannot prove a derivative title from an antecedent copyright? Is it intended to give to such persons a derivative title enforceable in the existing action? I cannot think that the clause is intended to have so far-reaching an effect: It appears to me that it was to give a proper start to proceedings against an infringer, and that, until the contrary was proved, the action could be treated as properly constituted. I think that counsel for the defendants is right and the learned judge is right in saying that the words are "to be" and ought not to be interpreted as being "to have been"—that they are, so to speak, of present force and validity, and are not retrospective in their effect. Then we have these other words "unless the contrary is proved, be presumed to be the owner of the copyright in the work."

In the present case we have got something more than that. If it be accepted on the hypothesis I propose that John Hogg was the owner of the copyright down to 1909, there is difficulty in tracing that copyright to the plaintiff, and, indeed, the arbitrator says that it was left open as to what had happened to the copyright at a later date. In other words, the mere presumption that was given was qualified by reason of the fact that it was shown upon the hypothesis which I have proposed that John Hogg had had a copyright, but what has happened to that is not certain except that there is no proof that it has derivatively come into the possession of the plaintiff. It has now been shown that there was, upon a hypothesis favourable to the plaintiff, an original copyright in 1896, but it has not been shown that that has become vested in the plaintiff. Having regard to the view I take of sub-s. (3), sub-cl. (b), and which the learned judge took, I think the presumption that the plaintiff asks us to accept on the words of the section goes beyond the words of the section, and does not enure to establish the plaintiff's right in the present case, a right which is contested both as to whether there is a copyright and whether it is vested in the plaintiff. A

For these reasons it appears to me that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I have, I confess with considerable hesitation, arrived at the same conclusion. Let me refer, first of all, to two findings of the learned arbitrator which go to the root of the matter that we have to decide. He says: B

> "I find as a fact that the differences between the 1874 and the 1896 editions . . . would, if wholly or mainly due to changes made for the first time in the 1896 edition, be sufficiently substantial to constitute that edition a new work for the purposes of the Copyright Act."

He finds as follows: C

> "Since 1896 there have not been in any edition . . . alterations sufficiently substantial . . . to constitute any such edition a new work for the purposes of the Copyright Act."

Having regard to his finding that the 1896 edition was a new work for the purposes of the Copyright Act, it follows that in that year there became vested in the author of that work a statutory copyright under the Act of 1842, and that on the coming into operation of the Act of 1911 there was substituted for that copyright a new statutory copyright created by the Act of 1911, and that new statutory copyright would vest in the author or those claiming under him. It follows from that that when the plaintiff in this case issued her writ on Aug. 10, 1932, apart from the provisions of s. 6 (3) (b) of the Act of 1911, she could not have succeeded in her action unless she proved that she was the author of the work or an assignee of the author or was constituted the owner of the copyright by virtue of proviso (b) to s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1911 or the statutory provisions in the earlier statute which those provisos reproduced. The learned arbitrator infers as a fact that any copyright which at the date of the death of John Hogg could then have existed in any part of the said book or any edition thereof was at the date of his death legally vested in him. I have not the least idea how it comes about that the learned arbitrator finds himself justified in inferring that as a fact, but I do not think we have to consider whether any such inference could be properly drawn or not, for the reason that the plaintiff, by her particulars, has confined her right to sue to the rights which were given her by s. 6 (3) (b) of the Act. Further, I agree with what the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has said, that, even assuming that copyright in the work was vested in John Hogg at the time of his death, there is no proper proof that that right has passed to the plaintiff. Assuming that it did pass under his will to Godfrey James Hogg, I can find no evidence that it passed from Godfrey James Hogg to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, therefore, is both by her pleadings and by the facts confined to the provisions of the subsection if she is to succeed in her action. D E F G

In order to understand that proviso I will refer shortly to the sections of the Act which lead up to it. Section 1 of the Act provides that copyright shall subsist for the term thereinafter mentioned in every original literary work if (a) in the case of a published work, the work was first published within such parts of His Majesty's Dominions to which the Act extends, and (b) in the case of an unpublished work the author at the date of the making of the work was a British subject. Then s. 1 (2) defines what is meant for the purposes of the Act by the word "copyright." I can pass over s. 2, which explains what is meant by infringement of copyright: it states the circumstances in which a work shall be deemed to be infringed. Section 3 deals with the term for which copyright is to subsist under the Act. I can pass over s. 4 and turn to s. 5, which states who is to be the owner of the copyright in various cases. The general provision, in s. 5 (1), is that the author of the work shall be the first owner of the copyright therein. Then there is the proviso to which I have already referred which enacts that in certain circumstances the copyright shall be vested not in the author, but in his employer. Sub-s. (2) provides that the owner may assign his copyright. Then we come to s. 6 which is dealing with remedies for infringement of the copyright. Sub-s. (1) says: H I

> "Where copy in any work has been infringed, the owner of the copyright shall, except as otherwise provided by this Act, be entitled to all such remedies by way of injunction, [and so on] as are or may be conferred by law for the infringement of a right."

Pausing there, the owner of a copyright under the Act who complains that it has been infringed, in order to succeed in any action that he may bring would have to prove two things—first, he would have to prove that he has copyright and that copyright exists in the work in question, and, secondly, he would have to prove that he is the owner of the copyright, which he could prove either by showing that he himself was the author or that the work was executed in one of the ways mentioned in the provisos to s. 5 (1), or that he is the assignee of the author or other true owner of the copyright. All that, of course, in many cases might be expensive, and, if there was no real issue about it, unnecessary expense would be involved in proving those things.

So we come to sub-s. (3), which, in my opinion, is merely dealing with procedure in any such action as is contemplated in sub-s. (1), that is to say, an action brought for the purpose of restraining infringement and recovering damages, and so on, in respect of infringement of copyright. It says this:

> "In any action for infringement of copyright in any work, the work shall be presumed to be a work in which copyright subsists, and the plaintiff shall be presumed to be the owner of the copyright, unless the defendant puts in issue the existence of the copyright, or, as the case may be, the title of the plaintiff."

Where, therefore, the defendant does not put either of those matters in issue, the plaintiff will not have to prove that the work has copyright, and he will not have to prove that he is the owner of the copyright; that will be assumed in his favour. Where the title of the plaintiff is put in issue, then it is provided as follows:

> "If a name purporting to be that of the author of the work is printed or otherwise indicated thereon in the usual manner, the person whose name is so printed or indicated shall, unless the contrary is proved, be presumed to be the author of the work."

So that, even where his title is put in issue, if he produces a book or pamphlet which contains a print of the literary work, and that book or pamphlet has printed on it his name as purporting to be the author of the work, then, unless the contrary is proved, he will be presumed to be the author of the work. Sub-cl. (b) is the important one in this case and that is dealing with the case where no name is so printed or indicated or where the name printed or indicated is not the author's true name or the name by which he is commonly known. It provides that if > "a name purporting to be that of the publisher or proprietor of the work is printed or otherwise indicated thereon in the usual manner the person whose name is so printed or indicated shall, unless the contrary is proved, be presumed to be the owner of the copyright in the work for the purposes of proceedings in respect of the infringement of copyright therein."

It will be observed that the subsection in no way purports to divest the author or other true owner of the copyright of his rights. It is not confined to the case of an author whose whereabouts cannot be ascertained. Such a case is not, indeed, in terms mentioned in the section. What it does contemplate is that there is an author whose name is well known to the public, but who for reasons of his own does not desire his name to appear on the published work, who desires to remain anonymous or who has published it under a nom de plume. In that case the person whose name is printed on the work as publisher is to be presumed for the purposes of the proceedings, and only for those purposes, to be the owner of the copyright. The words "for the purposes of proceedings" mean, in my opinion, for the purposes of proceedings which are contemplated by the subsection itself, the subsection which begins, as I have already pointed out, with the words: "In any action for infringement of copyright." I think that the reason why such a provision is to be found in the Act is that it would be very hard on an author who wished his name to be concealed from the public if he was not able to prevent piracy of his work except at the cost and risk of having his connection with the work made public, and, therefore, there is put into the hands of the publishers, in those circumstances, a right to sue, but to sue, as I understand it, on behalf of the real owner of the copyright whose rights, as I have already stated, are in no way divested by the subsection. Then there are the words "unless the contrary is proved." The contrary can, of course, be proved by the defendant if he is in a position to prove it by showing that somebody else other than the publisher is the true owner of the copyright. I do not think the contrary would be proved by showing that the publisher was not the owner of the copyright because the whole subsection is based on the hypothesis, as I read it, that the publisher is not the owner of the copyright, but for the purposes of the proceedings in question is deemed to be the owner of the copyright.

If that is, as I think it is, the true construction of the subsection, and it is the construction which the learned judge in the court below has put upon it, what, then, is the position of the plaintiff in so far as she relies upon the book produced by her, published in the year 1896? On it there appear the words: "Printed for A. Lewis." I am prepared to assume, as the Master of the Rolls has assumed, that those words sufficiently indicate that A. Lewis was the publisher in 1896 of the work. Who was A. Lewis? It certainly was not the plaintiff. We know, if it was anybody connected with the plaintiff, it was John Hogg. There is no proof that it was John Hogg in 1896, but I am willing to assume that John Hogg was carrying on business as a publisher in that year under the name of A. Lewis. It will not help the plaintiff for the court to presume that John Hogg is the owner of the copyright for the purposes of these proceedings. So far, therefore, as the plaintiff founds herself upon the 1896 book I am entirely in agreement with what the learned judge has said, and what has been said by the Master of the Rolls. Where my doubt arises is when the plaintiff relies, not upon the 1896 edition, but upon that of 1929. It is quite plain, I think, that in the subsection the words "the work" do not mean the same as the words "the work" in s. 1, for instance, of the Act. "The work" in which copyright exists is the expression of his ideas on the part of the author. That is plain, I think, from the fact that copyright exists in published and unpublished works. An author who expresses his ideas in a manuscript which he keeps to himself has copyright in that work—that is to say, in the expression of his ideas in the manuscript—and when he subsequently causes it to be published he does not obtain a new copyright; his copyright still is the same as before, though the expression of his ideas is now to be found, not only in the manuscript, but in a printed book or a printed pamphlet. Section 6 (3) (b), however, by the words "the work" is referring to something on which the name of the author can be printed or indicated or the name of the publisher can be printed or indicated. That must mean a book or pamphlet in which is printed the expression of ideas for the composition of which the author is entitled to copyright.

Supposing an author desiring to remain anonymous causes his work to be published in the year 1920 by A. B. While A. B. is alive, if anyone commits infringement of the author's copyright in the work, an action can be brought in the name of A. B., the edition published by A. B. will be produced, the subsection will come into operation, and for the purposes of those proceedings A. B. will be deemed to be the owner of the copyright. But supposing A. B. dies, the author of the work, still desiring to remain anonymous and to be able to protect his work if necessary, causes it to be published now by C. D. Why should not the proviso operate in favour of C. D. when an action is brought by him on behalf of the anonymous author? I cannot see for myself why it should not. I should have thought that the work, that is to say, the printed document on which the publisher's name appears, is a publication of the work in which copyright exists, and none the less that the second edition does not contain any new matter so as to constitute the composition which is published in the second edition a new composition conferring a new copyright upon the author. If, therefore, the plaintiff in this case had confined herself to suing in respect of the 1929 book, that is to say, had confined herself to proving her right to the copyright in the composition by producing the print of the composition which was effected in the year 1929, and which contains the name under which she was trading as the publisher, I should have thought, speaking entirely for myself, that the subsection would have operated in her favour. Unfortunately, that is not what the plaintiff did. She puts forward to the court at least three books, copies of the composition in which copyright is claimed. She puts forward one published in 1896; she puts forward one published in 1917; and she puts forward a third one which was published in 1929. The first one I assume, shows that John Hogg was the publisher. Therefore, the court presumes that John Hogg was the person entitled to copyright in respect of that book. Then, looking at 1920, the court finds another A. Lewis—that is the pseudonym of Godfrey James Hogg. It must be presumed that Godfrey James Hogg, for the purposes of these proceedings, is the owner of the copyright. When it comes to 1929 the court has to make a third presumption—that the present plaintiff is the owner of the copyright. In these circumstances I do not see how the court can choose between the three presumptions, all of which arise by the action of the plaintiff, and that being so I am not prepared to differ from the decision of CLAUSON, J., which has received the approval of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and having regard to what my brethren have said in reference to the facts I shall confine myself to certain observations on the rather difficult section which we have to construe, namely, s. 6 of the Copyright Act, 1911. Apart from the actual language in which it is expressed, I think one may say with confidence that the whole section, or nearly all of it, is intended to give effect to art. 11 of the Berne Convention of 1886, substantially reproduced in art. 15 of the Berlin Convention of 1908. Under our own law there was great difficulty in protecting in any way productions of an anonymous or pseudonymous character, but as early as the first Berne Convention, to which this country was a party, it was agreed in art. 11 as follows:

> "For anonymous or pseudonymous works the publisher whose name is indicated on the work shall be entitled to protect the rights belonging to the author; he shall be without other proof deemed to be the legal representative of the anonymous or pseudonymous author."

That such conventions can be referred to for the purpose of construing the Act appears, I think, from a judgment of MANSFIELD, C.J., in R. v. Wilson (1).

Having regard to that fact, and to the language of the section, I think it is manifest that s. 6 (3) (b) was intended to enable the publisher to protect the rights of the anonymous or pseudonymous author without giving his true name away. It is a section designed, not for the benefit of publishers in any sense, because, in my opinion, if a publisher, relying on such a presumption, brings an action and recovers damages, he recovers them on behalf of the author if the author has remained the owner of the copyright. It deals merely with procedure and the procedure in an action for infringement. It is a mistake to suppose that it transfers any legal rights to the publisher, or that immediately the action is over, and I may add before the action is begun, there is any presumption of law whatever.

In my opinion, it follows that the presumption being one only for the purposes of proceedings for infringement, there is no ground for presuming under the subsection that some publisher who published a work long ago, but is now dead and never was concerned in an infringement action, was the owner of the copyright in the work. The presumption does not apply to him, because it can only apply for the purposes of an infringement action, which that deceased publisher was never concerned with. The difficulty in giving the wide construction to the subsection for which counsel for the plaintiff contends does not rest, I think, simply on the use of the tense in the sentence "whose name is so printed shall be presumed to be the owner of the copyright," but is also to be gathered from the words "presumed to be the owner of the copyright in the work for the purposes of proceedings in respect of the infringement," and, accordingly, in my view, it is wrong to suppose that any presumption can be made with regard to ownership of a past publisher since he cannot be presumed "to be" the owner for the purposes of these infringement proceedings. As CLAUSON, J., observed, it may seem a narrow interpretation of the section, but we are not entitled, as it seems to me, in a

A section relating to proof of certain evidential facts in an infringement action to go beyond the language of the section, and I do not think it is very surprising that a section introduced for the purpose of giving effect to the rights of anonymous authors was not framed so as to apply, it may be, long after the anonymous author is dead or the original publisher is dead. Accordingly, in my opinion, the judgment of the learned judge on this point was perfectly right. I would only observe that there are a number of other B difficulties in putting the construction upon the subsection that counsel for the plaintiff contends for, one difficulty being that already pointed out—that there is a difficulty in making the subsection apply to a copyright originally gained under the Act of 1842, or, indeed, under any preceding Act, since "copyright" in the Act of 1911 has a different meaning from that which it originally possessed and such copyright enures for a different term.

C There remains another matter on which I must also say a word, and that is with reference to the point that the plaintiff was entitled to bring to court the edition of, say, 1931, to point to that book as containing the name of the publisher of the work printed thereon in the usual manner, and to ask the court to presume that the person whose name was so printed, namely, the plaintiff, must be presumed to be the owner of the copyright in the work. If the work of 1931 had been the subject of a new copyright D and capable of a new copyright, in my opinion, that contention would have succeeded, but where I, speaking for myself, am unable to follow it is that I find there was no copyright properly so called in the editions of 1926, 1929, and 1931. The position with regard to reprints has not, I think, altered since the Act of 1911 was passed. An edition which contains no substantial alteration, and, therefore, is a mere reprint in substance of an old edition was not entitled under the old law to any copyright whatsoever, so far as that edition was concerned. As was observed in the Scottish case of E Black v. Murray (2) by the Lord President:

> "A new edition of a work may be a mere reprint of an old edition, and plainly that would not entitle the author to a new term of copyright running from the date of the new edition."

F

In my opinion, under that Act the publisher of the reprint had no copyright whatever. The author who, without any act of authorship, authorised the reprinting of a work did not gain any copyright in it, and, in my opinion, under the present Act the position is the same. The owner of an original copyright in general does not say anything about later editions; if he proves that he published a work at a particular date he gets a copyright in that literary work under s. 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and he gets no further G right whatsoever if the work is reprinted from time to time. I see an objection to a ground for thinking that a mere reprint ought to be entitled to the benefit of sub-s. (b), because the reprint might be a reprint purely ad hoc for the purposes of the action by some not very reputable person who might say, having put in a document of this kind:

> "Although it is a reprint and the work was published forty years ago, here it is, and my name being on the document I am to be deemed, unless the contrary is proved, to be the owner of the copyright." H

So that, in my opinion, there being no originality in the reprint—and you do not get a copyright in a literary work unless it is an original literary work under s. 1—the plaintiff in the present case would have gained no advantage by putting in either the last two or three editions and claiming to protect those. I would only add that, if the plaintiff I had come into court with the reprints alone, and not, as my brother ROMER has pointed out, with a number of editions, she cannot, in my opinion, be presumed to be the owner of the copyright since from the production of the previous or original edition it would be established that she was not the owner of the copyright—you cannot be the owner of a copyright merely by copying somebody else's work. It follows, in my opinion, that the plaintiff was unable to rely upon the reprints or upon the substantial reprints involved in those later editions, and that, accordingly, she was not entitled to take advantage of s. 6, (3) (b) of the Act. In other respects she fails to establish her title to the copyright in question for the reasons given by my brethren, to which I find that I can add nothing useful. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

BRITISH HOMOPHONE, LTD. v. KUNZ & CRYSTALLATE GRAMOPHONE RECORD MANUFACTURING CO., LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (du Parcq, J.), March 6, 7, 8, 15, 1935]

[Reported 152 L.T. 589]

Contract—Option for further contract—Option void for uncertainty—Further contract entered into in belief that option valid—Validity of further contract.

By a contract in writing dated March 15, 1934, and made between the plaintiff company and the defendant K. it was agreed that the plaintiff company should have the exclusive right to the services of K. and his band for the purposes of making gramophone records. By cl. 1 of the agreement: "This agreement shall be in force for a period of twelve months with an option on the part of the company or the principal [K.] to extend the same for a further period of twelve months on terms to be hereinafter agreed." By a further contract in writing, dated Feb. 1, 1935, and made between the plaintiff company and the defendant K., it was agreed that the plaintiff company should have the exclusive right to the services of K. and his band for the purposes of making gramophone records for twelve months on the terms and conditions set out in the contract. When making the contract both K. and the representative of the plaintiff company each believed that the other was bound to enter into it in view of the terms of cl. 1 of the contract of March 15, 1934.

Held: (i) it was impossible to imply in the "option" in the contract of March 15, 1934, any terms which would make it effective as a contract; the only term which might be implied was that for a further period of twelve months K. was to continue to render and procure to be rendered by his band services similar to those which were the subject-matter of the contract of March 15, but beyond that everything was left to the imagination; and, therefore, the "option" had no binding effect, but

(ii) there was no authority for the proposition that, if two parties entered into what was on the face of it a binding contract in ignorance of their legal rights, each believing the other to be bound to enter into such a contract when in fact he was not so bound, the contract so entered into was not enforceable; to hold otherwise would be to decide that a common mistake of law vitiated a contract; and, therefore, the contract of Feb. 1, 1935, was enforceable by the plaintiffs.

Action tried by du Parcq, J., without a jury.

The plaintiffs claimed (i) a declaration that, pursuant to agreements between them and the defendant, Kunz, dated March 15, 1934, Jan. 11, and Feb. 1, 1935, they were C entitled to the exclusive services of the defendant and the Casani Club band as therein mentioned until Feb. 1, 1936; (ii) an injunction to restrain the defendants and each of them, their servants and agents, and each and all of them, from hindering, preventing or interfering in any way with the plaintiffs' enjoyment of such exclusive services of the defendant Kunz and the Casani Club band until Feb. 1, 1936, in accordance with the agreements between the plaintiffs and the defendant Kunz, dated March 15, 1934, and D
Jan. 11, and Feb. 1, 1935; and (iii) damages.

Cur. adv. vult. E

March 15.—DU PARCQ, J., read a judgment in which he set out the claims of the plaintiffs and continued: the defendant, Kunz, is a pianist, who, in the year 1933, was gaining popularity for himself and for his band, which played dance music at an establishment known as the Casani Club. On Sept. 14, 1933, he entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs, a company engaged in the making of gramophone records, which provided F that he and his band were "to record items of music for the company." The company was to have the exclusive right to their services for the period of the agreement. Clause 1 of the agreement was in these terms:

> "This agreement shall be in force for a period of six months with an option on the part of the company or the principal [the defendant Kunz] to extend same for a further period of six months on terms to be hereafter agreed." G

On Jan. 31, 1934, the plaintiffs' manager wrote a letter to the defendant Kunz "confirming the renewal of the existing agreement . . . by extending same for a further period of twelve months from March 14, 1934, and also piano solo recordings by yourself during the same period." "My company agrees," the letter added, "to pay you £20 per session of one double-sided record, minimum one session per month." A formal H agreement was entered into, dated March 15, 1934, which gave effect to the terms of the letter. It also contained an option clause in precisely the same words as cl. 1 of the agreement of Sept. 14, 1933, except that the words "twelve months" were substituted for the words "six months," where the latter words occurred in the earlier agreement, and the word "hereafter" was inadvertently changed to "hereinafter."

The defendant Kunz and his band became more and more popular as time went on, I and there is no doubt that the plaintiffs were anxious to retain, and the defendant company, who were their competitors in business, not less anxious to secure, the exclusive right to his services. I see no reason to doubt that the conversation sworn to by the plaintiff's manager, Mr. Fletcher, took place on a day in December, 1934. Mr. Fletcher says that he said to the defendant Kunz: "I shall want to renew your agreement after Christmas." Kunz said: "Oh, well, what are you going to pay me?" Mr. Fletcher replied: "You can have your own terms, provided they are reasonable." The answer was: "That is O.K.: we shall not fall out." No more was said on the subject between the defendant Kunz and Mr. Fletcher or any other representative of the plaintiffs until Jan. 11, 1935.

Meanwhile, the defendant company had become active. They knew that the defendant Kunz was recording for the plaintiffs, but did not know when his contract would come to an end, or that there was an option clause in it. On Jan. 7, 1935, Mr. Kunz was fulfilling an engagement at Hull, and Mr. Warnford-Davis, a director of the defendant company, telephoned to him and made an appointment, which was kept, to meet him on the following day at Leeds. I accept Mr. Warnford-Davis's evidence as to what took place at Leeds, and I may say at once that I am unable to place much reliance on Mr. Kunz's evidence on any point, not because I think he is an untruthful man, but first, because he is admittedly unbusinesslike, and secondly, because, partly, I think, through ill health, his memory is obviously very defective. At the interview Mr. Kunz told Mr. Warnford-Davis definitely that his contract with the plaintiffs would come to an end towards the end of February. He said nothing of any option clause in his contract with the plaintiffs. Mr. Warnford-Davis made him an offer which, after some hesitation, Mr. Kunz was persuaded to accept then and there. Mr. Warnford-Davis drew up a contract at once in the form of a letter which Mr. Kunz signed. It was in these terms:

> "Dear Sirs, I confirm the terms agreed upon this afternoon as follows: (1) It is understood you have the exclusive name Charlie Kunz and Charlie Kunz and his Casani Club orchestra, for a period of one year from March 1, 1935, to March 1, 1936, with the Crystallate company's option of renewal for a further period of twelve months from March 1, 1936, to March 1, 1937, on the same terms, subject to notice being given me in writing by Jan. 1, 1936. (2) The terms agreed upon are as follows: (i) On Feb. 1, 1935, the Crystallate company will hand me a cheque for £1,000, representing (a) £600 for the exclusive use of the Casani Dance orchestra for a minimum of twelve sessions, at which four dance records with suitable orchestrations and vocalists provided by me will be recorded at the company's studios. For any excess sessions over the minimum the sum of £50 will be paid by the company at the time of recording. The company will have the right to issue such records on any of their brands; (b) £400 on account of one-eighth of a penny royalty per side, that is one farthing royalty per double-sided record for piano solos to be played by Charlie Kunz or otherwise as required by the company for a minimum of twelve double-sided records to be issued in the twelve months; (ii) any further payments due will be paid quarterly. A statement of sales will be supplied me each quarter by the company; (iii) I agree to the following public performance notice to be supplied me in due course."

Mr. Kunz seems to have felt some doubt whether he was free to enter into this contract with the defendant company. He had no copy of his contract with the plaintiffs by him, and says that he did not remember its terms or the date when it was to expire. He, therefore, said something to Mr. Warnford-Davis to the effect that, if there was anything wrong with the contract, he, Mr. Warnford-Davis, was to fix it or put it right. He said under cross-examination: "I wanted to cover myself, because it was done with such a rush, and if anything went wrong I wanted to cover myself." In examination-in-chief he had said that his reason for making the remark was that he did not know anything about contracts. Mr. Warnford-Davis's recollection, which I believe to be substantially accurate, is that Mr. Kunz said: "If there is anything wrong with that contract will you have it put right?" to which Mr. Warnford-Davis answered: "Certainly I will, although you must understand that the conditions and terms in this agreement are absolutely binding. I hope you have that absolutely clear."

Mr. Warnford-Davis returned to London with the contract in his pocket. He had handed to Mr. Kunz a counterpart of it, signed by himself, and written, like the first, on notepaper with a printed heading and a picture upon it of the Palais de Danse at which the interview had taken place. Mr. Kunz is not now able to produce this counterpart. On Jan. 10, Mr. Warnford-Davis sent to Mr. Kunz a typewritten copy of the agreement of Jan. 8, in which the public performance clause was written out in extenso.

A The letter of Jan. 10, in which this typewritten copy was enclosed, contained a paragraph which is consistent with Mr. Warnford-Davis's statement that Mr. Kunz had led him to believe that the contract with the plaintiffs was to expire towards the end of February. It is as follows: "You might advise us of the exact date of the expiration of your present contract with the Homochord [sic] Company, for if it is possible to issue your first record prior to the 1st March we shall catch the late winter season, which would be of value to both of us. B We are also thinking of making one or two prior announcements to the trade and possibly the press, for which purpose we must have this information."

On Jan. 11, there was a conversation over the telephone between Mr. Warnford-Davis and Mr. Fletcher as to which there is a conflict of evidence. I do not take the view that either of those gentlemen wilfully misrepresented the effect of the conversation in his evidence before me. C It is notorious that words spoken on the telephone are not always accurately heard, and it may sometimes happen that their significance is not fully appreciated even if they are correctly heard. According to Mr. Warnford-Davis, he told Mr. Fletcher in plain terms that the defendant company had "signed up" the defendant Kunz. Mr. Fletcher's recollection is that Mr. Warnford-Davis told him that the defendant company "were going to take Kunz from the plaintiff company at all costs." D I cannot doubt that, whatever the precise words used by Mr. Warnford-Davis may have been, Mr. Fletcher was left with at least a strong suspicion that the defendant Kunz had already entered into an agreement with the defendant company. It is certain, at any rate, that Mr. Fletcher thought it wise to see Mr. Kunz at once, and soon after the telephone communication he interviewed him at the Casani Club. Mrs. Kunz says that Mr. Fletcher first called at the defendant Kunz's house and spoke to her. E Mr. Fletcher says that he visited her on the previous day to inquire whether her husband had done anything in the way of "changing companies." It is not necessary to decide between those conflicting accounts of an interview which seems to me to be immaterial on either view. Mr. Kunz may well be right as to the date of the interview.

When Mr. Fletcher arrived at the Casani Club, Mr. Kunz had with him both the contract which he had concluded with the defendant company, and also his existing agreement with the plaintiff company. F A copy of the contract with the defendants was on a table in the room. This was the manuscript counterpart signed by Mr. Warnford-Davis, with the printed heading. Mr. Fletcher at once asked Mr. Kunz whether he had signed any agreement with the defendant company. Mr. Kunz replied that he had signed what he called a "provisional agreement" only, and that he had signed it at Leeds in order "to get rid of" Mr. Warnford-Davis. Mr. Fletcher does not profess to remember Mr. Kunz's exact words; G his recollection is that Mr. Kunz said: "Providing there is nothing in your contract that holds me then I shall go through," or words to that effect. Mr. Kunz's recollection is, as usual, vague; asked by his counsel whether he explained how he had signed provisionally, he replied: "No, sir, I do not suppose so." I think that some assistance is to be obtained from a letter written by the plaintiffs' solicitor on Jan. 21, 1935, when, referring to the date with which I am now dealing, he says this: H "I do not deny that my clients at this time knew that your clients had some form of agreement with Mr. Kunz, but I place on record that my clients were informed by Mr. Kunz that he had signed a provisional agreement with your clients only on a scrap of paper and he informed my clients that before signing this provisional agreement with your clients he made it a condition that, if he was bound to my clients' company, what purports to be an agreement was not to operate." I I infer this version of the interview was written upon instructions obtained from Mr. Fletcher, and, therefore, represents Mr. Fletcher's recollection at that time. I am not satisfied that Mr. Fletcher read the agreement with the defendant company, though I think it probable that Mr. Kunz gave him some indication of what its terms were, so far as remuneration was concerned. It is clear that Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Kunz proceeded to discuss the existing agreement with the plaintiff company. They were in complete agreement that the first clause (the so-called option clause) bound Mr. Kunz to the plaintiff company; indeed, Mr. Kunz was the first to point this out. Mr. Fletcher made a tempting offer to Mr. Kunz in terms which are set out in a letter signed by the managing director of the company. Mr. Fletcher, no doubt, showed some anxiety as to the position, and Mr. Kunz said: "What have you got to worry about? There is the option. I have signed a provisional agreement only. Let me have your terms back by six o'clock and I will sign them." So they parted, and later that evening Mr. Kunz signed an acceptance of the offer contained in the letter, which purported to be an exercise of the option contained in the current agreement.

On the same evening Mr. Warnford-Davis visited Mr. Kunz at the Casani Club. Mr. Kunz showed him the contract of March 15, 1934, with the plaintiff company and said: "They have informed me that I have an option." Mr. Warnford-Davis looked at the document, formed the impression that cl. 1 might be enforceable, and told Mr. Kunz that he thought it "might be an option." He asked Mr. Kunz to discuss the matter with his, Mr. Warnford-Davis's, brother, who is, it seems, a man of much business experience.

Later the defendant company were advised by their solicitor that, in so far as cl. 1 purported to grant an option, it was not legally enforceable, and the plaintiffs were informed of this by a letter dated Jan. 18, 1935. The plaintiffs, and at this time Mr. Kunz also, took a different view, and on Feb. 1 a formal agreement was entered into between the plaintiff company and the defendant Kunz. This agreement contained the terms which had already been agreed, and its first clause was in the same words as those of the first clause of the contract of March 15, 1934, except that the inapt word "hereinafter" was omitted. The new agreement was made operative from Feb. 1 at Mr. Kunz's request, in order that he might get the benefit of the improved terms as early as possible.

Later, Mr. Kunz who, I understand, took payment of the sum of £1,000 on Feb. 1 of this year, under his agreement with the defendant company, decided that he would not carry out his agreement with the plaintiffs and refused to be bound by it. The writ in the action was issued on Feb. 11. On Feb. 15 Hilbery, J., sitting in chambers, ordered a speedy trial of the action, any question of damages to stand over pending the decision as to liability. The action was tried before me on March 6, 7, and 8. The defendants contended that the option clause contained in the contracts of March 15, 1934, and of Feb. 1, 1935, was no more than a promissory expression leaving a discretion as to performance to the promisors, and was consequently unenforceable.

It was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that the clause was effective to bind the defendant Kunz. Their counsel put his point in two ways. First, he said that, if such implied terms were read into the clause as were necessary in order to give it business efficacy, it could be read as importing a promise on the part of Mr. Kunz to give the plaintiffs the first refusal of his services, in the sense in which that expression was construed in Manchester Ship Canal Co. v. Manchester Racecourse Co. (1). I find it impossible to read cl. 1 in this sense. If the parties intended to give each other the first refusal of a new contract, it would have been easy for them to say so, and I am not entitled to re-write the contract for them.

Secondly, counsel submitted that, whatever may have been the law before the decision of the House of Lords in W. N. Hillas & Co., Ltd. v. Arcos, Ltd. (2), it was now established that a promise might be enforced as a contract, although it left many important matters open for subsequent negotiation between the parties. It is, I think, plain that the decision in the case cited did nothing to shake the long-established view of the law on which the House of Lords had previously acted in May and Butcher, Ltd. v. R. (3) ([1934] 2 K.B. at p. 17). In his speech in W. N. Hillas & Co. v. Arcos, Ltd. (147 L.T. at p. 51), Lord Wright referred to Loftus v. Roberts (4) in the Court of Appeal,

> "where, the rule was summed up as being 'promissory expressions reserving an option as to performance do not create a contract.' [and he added,] no one would dispute such a rule, and its application to the instrument before the House in May and Butcher, Ltd. v. R. (3) has been finally determined in that case; but, in my judgment, the Court of Appeal were not justified in thinking that this House intended to lay down universal principles of construction or to negative the rule that it must be in each case a question of the true construction of the particular instrument."

A In the case then before the House of Lords it was held that there was a contract which contained all necessary stipulations. This does not mean that every detail of the contract was expressed, but that when such terms had to be implied in the agreement as to reasonable price, date, mode of delivery, and the like, as the law permitted, there was no essential stipulation left out. Similarly in the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Foley v. Classique Coaches, Ltd. (5), it was held, as a matter of construction, B that an agreement to deliver petrol at a price to be agreed by the parties from time to time was enforceable because (i) there was to be implied in the contract a term that petrol should be delivered at a reasonable price, and (ii) there was an arbitration clause in the agreement which applied to any failure to agree as to price.

In the present case it is, in my view, impossible to read into cl. 1 of the agreement any implied terms which would make it effective as a contract. A term may be implied C that for the further period of twelve months the principal is to continue to record and procure to be rendered to the company services similar to those which are the subject-matter of the existing agreement, but beyond that everything is left to the imagination. In Loftus v. Roberts (4) which, as has been seen, was recently referred to by LORD WRIGHT in the House of Lords without any hint of disapproval, the Court of Appeal held that a promise to engage an actress to act a part in a play "in the event of the D piece coming to town, at a West End salary to be mutually agreed between us," was unenforceable. In that case, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said (18 T.L.R. at p. 534):

> "There were cross promissory words, but a clear option was given, on the one side to refuse to engage, and on the other side to refuse to play, unless what was proposed by one side as to the amount of salary was satisfactory to the other side."

E The only modification which need be introduced into this citation from the judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Loftus v. Roberts (4), in order to make it exactly applicable here, is the substitution for the words "as to the amount of salary," of the words "as to every essential term of the proposed contract except its duration."

I hold, therefore, that the so-called option clause has no binding effect. On this view, the conversation which took place between Mr. Kunz and Mr. Fletcher in December, F 1934, was nothing but a step in the negotiations, and in no way strengthens the plaintiffs' case. The consequences of this finding were much discussed at the Bar. Counsel for the defendant company says, with justice, that his clients have done no wrong. It is true that the defendant Kunz could not keep his contract with them without breaking his existing contract with the plaintiffs so far as concerned the period between March 1 and 15. But the defendant company had no knowledge of this fact and, as soon as G they discovered it, disclaimed any desire to demand any services from Mr. Kunz which he could not render without a breach of contract. Counsel asked me not to grant an injunction to restrain the defendant Kunz from keeping his contract with the defendant company, even if I came to the conclusion that the defendant Kunz ought to pay damages to the plaintiffs for his breach of his contract with them.

Counsel for the defendant Kunz submitted that the plaintiffs were not entitled to H recover damages against his client, first, because they had wrongfully induced him to break his contract with the defendant company and were in pari delicto with him; secondly, because both parties entered into the agreement of Feb. 1, 1935, in the mistaken belief that the option clause in the earlier contract was legally binding upon them, and this belief was, as he put it, "a condition of the contract." I do not propose to deal at any length with the question of law raised by the first of these submissions. Counsel I was unable to produce any authority for the proposition that a service agreement made between two parties, both of whom know that it cannot be performed without the breach by one of them of another pre-existing service agreement, and one of whom is inducing the other to break the pre-existing contract, is itself capable of being enforced. I do not say, however, that the contention can be lightly dismissed. It is an unlawful act or, in other words, a legal wrong, to break a contract, as it is to induce another person to break a contract without lawful excuse: see per LORD LINDLEY, South Wales Miners Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. (6) ([1905] A.C. at p. 253).

It seems to be consistent with principle that an agreement to do a legal wrong to a third party should be unenforceable by reason of its illegality. I find it unnecessary to come to a decision on this question because the evidence has not satisfied me that Mr. Fletcher knowingly and wilfully induced the defendant Kunz to break his contract with the defendant company. I was referred by counsel for Mr. Kunz to the statement of the law by Darling, J., in Read v. Friendly Society of Operative Stonemasons of England, Ireland, and Wales (7) ([1902] 2 K.B. at p. 96). The learned judge, speaking of persons who had interfered with the contractual rights of another, said: "I think their sufficient justification for interference with plaintiff's right must be an equal or superior right in themselves, and that no one can legally excuse himself to a man, of whose contract he has procured the breach, on the ground that he acted on a wrong understanding of his own rights, or without malice, or bona fide, or in the best interests of himself, nor even that he acted as an altruist, seeking only the good of another and careless of his own advantage." I could not, with proper regard to that statement of the law, excuse Mr. Fletcher if he had induced the defendant Kunz to make a contract, merely because he acted honestly in the belief that the option clause was enforceable. But, upon the facts, as I have found them, I do not think that it can be said with justice that Mr. Fletcher knew that Mr. Kunz had entered into a binding contract with the defendant company. He did not know the terms of the document which he saw lying on the table. He was told that it was only provisional. I have no doubt that, if he had thought that the option clause in his company's contract was unenforceable, he would have inquired anxiously whether the provision to which it was subject was to the effect that the agreement was not to be enforced if Mr. Kunz turned out to be legally bound to the plaintiff company or was of wider scope. He did not make, and was not, in my opinion, under any legal or moral duty to make, that inquiry. I ought not to find that he committed an unlawful act unless I am satisfied by evidence that he did commit it, and there is no evidence to satisfy me that he knew that there was in existence an agreement which bound the defendant Kunz to the defendant company on the assumption that the option clause in the plaintiffs' contract was unenforceable. The exact language that the defendant Kunz used to him cannot be precisely ascertained, but I think it may well have been consistent with the view that Mr. Kunz had entered into no binding contract at all with the defendant company, but only into a bargain analogous to those pacts, familiar in another commercial sphere, which are expressed to be "subject to contract."

There is another possible view which cannot be omitted from consideration. In Loftus v. Roberts (4), already cited, there is a passage in the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J. (18 T.L.R. at p. 535), in these words:

> "In one sense it might be said that the arrangement between the parties was illusory. But, on the other hand, he had no doubt that persons in the position of the parties were glad to get a statement of an intention to engage on the one side and of willingness to play on the other. Persons connected with the theatrical profession were very sensitive in matters of honour of this kind, and they considered it of great advantage to have the benefit of any arrangement of this kind, though it did not amount to an enforceable contract."

Mr. Kunz said in his evidence, that he did not think of the option when he made the arrangement with the defendant company, and that, if he had thought of it, he would have looked upon it as dishonourable to enter into that arrangement. This piece of evidence indicates that the same high standard of honour which Vaughan Williams, L.J., attributed to the theatrical profession, prevails, as one would hope and expect, in that branch of the musical profession to which Mr. Kunz belongs. It may well be, therefore, that, even if he had applied his mind more clearly to the question than he did, Mr. Fletcher would have inferred from Mr. Kunz's statement that the arrangement with the defendant company was to be of no more effect, if it turned out that Mr. Kunz was bound in honour to the plaintiffs, than it would be if he were legally bound to them.

There is one other aspect of the case which should be mentioned. The plaintiffs cannot be in a worse position than they would have been if Mr. Fletcher had known the contents of the agreement with the defendant company and correctly construed his own company's agreements. In that case he would have seen that Mr. Kunz had entered into an agreement which he could not observe without a partial breach of his existing contract with the plaintiffs. I am disposed to think that Mr. Fletcher might then have said: "By entering into this agreement with the Crystallate company you have in part repudiated your obligation to my company. I do not accept that repudiation, but require you to perform your contract with my company. It follows that you cannot perform your contract with the Crystallate company, and you have, therefore, put yourself in such a position that you are liable to them in damages and cannot give them your services or demand employment from them unless you and they make fresh terms. In these circumstances, my company has, in the words of Darling, J., in Read's Case (7), 'an equal or superior right' to that of the Crystallate company." I do not decide the case on this ground, as it is enough to say that I am not satisfied that the plaintiffs knowingly interfered with the defendant company's contractual rights. I mention the point, because it is still open to counsel for the plaintiffs if the case should go further.

I can deal shortly with the second contention of counsel for the defendant, Kunz. I know of no authority for the proposition that if two parties enter into what is on the face of it a binding contract, in ignorance of their legal rights, each believing the other to be legally bound to enter into such a contract when he is not so bound, the contract so entered into is not enforceable. So to hold would be to decide that a common mistake of law vitiated a contract, and I believe that such a decision would be unsound in principle. Mr. Fletcher is innocent of any deceit. He did not induce the defendant Kunz to make an agreement with him by any misrepresentation, even an innocent misrepresentation, of law. On the contrary, Mr. Kunz needed no such inducement, because without it he put on the option clause the same construction which commended itself to Mr. Fletcher. In these circumstances, neither party, in my judgment, can successfully plead his ignorance of law as a ground of release from his contractual obligations. Counsel referred me to Galloway v. Galloway (8), but, in my judgment, the fundamental mistake which was there held to vitiate the agreement was one of fact, namely, the mistaken belief that a spouse was dead.

Upon these findings of fact and law which I have set out, I think that it is reasonably clear that I ought not to grant an injunction either in the form of the prayer (which would certainly be objectionable) or in the modified form which was suggested in the course of the argument. I feel some sympathy with both the companies concerned, and I do not think that the court ought to interfere in this dispute, except by saying that the defendant Kunz must pay such damages to the plaintiffs as will reasonably compensate them for his breach of the agreement dated Feb. 1, 1935, of course, on the footing that the option clause contained in it is not enforceable. There must be an inquiry as to the amount of damages. They will be assessed by an official referee. The plaintiffs are left with no cause of action or of complaint against the defendant company, and the claim against them must be dismissed.

THE TOWER BRIDGE

[Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (Sir Boyd Merriman, P., with Trinity Masters), November 26, 27, 1935]

Shipping—Salvage—Service—Matters to be considered—Moral support—Advice to save vessel from local danger—Merchant Shipping (Safety and Load Line Conventions) Act, 1932 (22 & 23 Geo. 5, c. 9), s. 26.

Whilst bound for St. John, N.B., and steering a south-west course, the defendants' steamship, Tower Bridge, ran into an extensive icefield. To work her way out, she altered her course to south-east, but, having got deeper into the ice for some fifty or sixty miles, she found herself surrounded by pack ice, and so seriously damaged as to be thought in danger of sinking. An S O S message sent out was picked up by the plaintiffs' steamship, Newfoundland, then thirty miles away in clear water to the southward and eastward, there being no other vessel nearer than 200 miles. The Newfoundland, which was also making for St. John, had previously encountered the icefield, but had found her way out of it. On receiving the S O S message from the Tower Bridge, the Newfoundland turned back to go to her assistance, and remained in wireless communication with her until, having at considerable risk re-entered the icefield, she arrived at a position about seven miles from the Tower Bridge and within sighting distance of her. The Tower Bridge requested the Newfoundland to stand by and see her safely into St. John, but the master of the Newfoundland, having ascertained after a discussion by wireless with the Tower Bridge, that that vessel was now in a clear patch of water and that the situation was not as dangerous as had at first been feared, sent the following message to the Tower Bridge: "Recommend you steer due east to clear water about twelve miles which I am doing, and then south to about 46 N. 47 W." The Tower Bridge replied as follows: "Will carry out course you suggest." The Tower Bridge then altered course, and, following the course taken by the Newfoundland, got clear of the icefield. The plaintiffs' case in a salvage action brought by them was that the defendants had acted on their advice, and that thereby the Tower Bridge was able to and did reach clear water by travelling twelve miles only through the ice, whereas, had she continued on her course, she would have had to plough her way for fifty or sixty miles before emerging from the icefield. In performing the said service, the Newfoundland sustained damage which the plaintiffs alleged amounted to £4,000. The total value of the Newfoundland, including cargo, was, according to the plaintiffs' evidence, £225,566. The value of the Tower Bridge was agreed at £10,000.

Held: (i) that, in considering whether there was or was not a salvage service, the whole of the circumstances must be taken into consideration; each separate stage could not be isolated and regarded by itself; (ii) that, without quantifying the moral support afforded to the Tower Bridge by the knowledge that the Newfoundland was making her way towards her through the ice at a time when the Tower Bridge was in the gravest danger, the advice given by the Newfoundland, and acted upon by the Tower Bridge with the result that she reached clear water within twelve miles, was a very material service; (iii) that, considering all the circumstances, including the danger to the salvors, the great responsibility taken by the captain of the Newfoundland in going back into the icefield, and the serious damage which the Newfoundland, in fact, sustained thereby, the proper award was £2,000, of which £1,500 would go to the owners of the Newfoundland in view of the damage the ship had sustained, £200 to the master, and £300 to the crew.

Notes. As to salvage, see 30 Halsbury's Laws (2nd Edn.) 880 et seq., and for cases, see 41 Digest 823 et seq.

Action for salvage.

The plaintiffs, the Warren Line (Liverpool), Ltd., owners of the steamship Newfoundland (6,791 tons gross), her master and crew, claimed from the Tower Steamship Company, Ltd., owners of the steamship Tower Bridge (5,161 tons gross), her cargo and freight, remuneration for salvage services which the plaintiffs alleged they rendered to the defendants on April 9, 1935, in the North Atlantic. The defendants denied that any salvage services had been rendered by the Newfoundland, which, they said, had done no more than perform a statutory duty imposed upon vessels picking up an S O S message by the Merchant Shipping (Safety and Load Line Conventions) Act, 1932, s. 26 (1); that the damage sustained by the Newfoundland was incurred while performing the said duty; that the only assistance requested by the Tower Bridge was that the Newfoundland should stand by, and that the Newfoundland had failed to render that assistance; that when the Newfoundland advised the Tower Bridge to alter course to the eastward to clear the icefield those on board the Tower Bridge were already aware that the course recommended by the Newfoundland was the best for them to pursue.

SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P.—This is a salvage claim by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Newfoundland against the owners of the steamship Tower Bridge. The services which it is alleged were rendered were given on April 9, 1935, in these circumstances. Both ships were westward bound in the North Atlantic and both were making for St. John, N.B. There was a very extensive icefield in the neighbourhood of the Labrador coast, and the Tower Bridge had got into this field, steering in a south-west direction, in the afternoon or evening of April 8. She had been on her course possibly, I think, for a great deal longer than otherwise would have been the case owing to the illness of her master. Be that as it may, she had gone deeper and deeper into this icefield, with the result that by the morning of April 9 she was surrounded by heavy pack ice and was in a very dangerous position. Her No. 1 hold was making water, which could not be kept down. She had a 10 degree list to port and, generally speaking, was in a very bad way.

It is not necessary to go into any detail about this condition. The condition in the early morning of April 9 is set out in a protest which her chief officer, acting as master, says correctly represents the situation. He said that at 6.45 a.m. water was entering No. 1 hold rapidly through a hole in the starboard side. "Commenced pumping ballast out of forepeak and No. 1 tanks." At 7.35 a.m. he gets the ship's position. "At 9.10 the ship listed 10 degrees to port, closely surrounded by pack ice and large growlers. Forehold rapidly filling. No. 2 bilges full. Sent S O S message, as vessel appeared to be in danger of sinking."

As it happened, the only ship at all near was the Newfoundland. No other vessel was within 200 miles or more, so that for all practical purposes she was the only vessel which could render assistance. The Newfoundland also had struck this icefield, and her captain, realising what the situation was, had contrived to get out of the icefield and was heading due south in clear water to the east of the field, and intended to continue on a southerly course until he was satisfied that he had got round the south-east corner of this icefield, where, of course, he would have turned west again and right for St. John.

In response to this S O S, and in acknowledgment of his duty under s. 26 (1) of the Merchant Shipping (Safety & Load Line Conventions) Act, 1932—which, after all, does not change the long-established practice of seamen in answering calls of urgency—he at once put his vessel into the icefield and, seeing that what he had received was an S O S and not a mere ordinary signal of distress, he regarded himself as under a duty to go as hard as he could put his ship through this icefield to the assistance of the Tower Bridge.

I am not going into the detail of wireless messages received and exchanged between these two ships, but it is impossible to ignore that the one vessel was eagerly expecting, and the other vessel was doing her very utmost to render, assistance which was most urgently required.

The Newfoundland was a valuable ship. Figures are given in the statement of claim that have not been challenged. She had recently undergone repairs and a thorough overhaul and, it is said, though it must not be taken that I assume these figures are absolutely correct, but it is sufficient to say that it is pleaded—that her own value was £115,000 odd and, taken with her freight, passage money, and so forth and the value of the cargo, £225,000 odd, so that it was a big thing for her master to decide to drive her as hard as he could, crushing her way through this icefield in the hope of being in time to save property certainly and, it might be, even life, because, to use his own phrase, he was not sure that the ship might not be down and they might not be on the ice themselves.

Counsel for the defendants says that all that must be disregarded, because it was his mere duty to do it under the statute. If all that he does is in response to the statute and nothing results—he never in fact renders any salvage service—I should agree with that argument, but I do not think that would be because he obeyed the statute, but because there was no salvage service rendered. The Act of 1932 provides, to quote the words of s. 26 (7):

> "Nothing in this section shall affect the provisions of s. 6 of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911 [which impose upon the master or person in charge of the vessel the obligation 'so far as he can do so without serious danger to his own vessel or her cargo and passengers (if any) to render assistance to every person . . . he has found at sea in danger of being lost'], and compliance by the master of a ship with the provisions of this section shall not affect his right, or the right of any other person, to salvage."

But, as things turned out, the Tower Bridge was not in quite so desperate a situation as she had been, or as it was thought she was, and she gradually began to get things under control. When eventually somewhere between 12 and 1—perhaps nearer 1 o'clock than 12, though the exact time has never been precisely fixed—having worked towards her, edging here and there through the ice on a series of zig-zag courses, the Newfoundland came in sight, the Tower Bridge was found in comparatively clear water. At that time, again without reading the messages in detail, the request which was made to the Newfoundland, and the only request, was that she should stand by and see the Tower Bridge into St. John.

It is quite clear—counsel for the defendants does not dispute it—that if in response to that request the Newfoundland had stood by, a very definite and important salvage service would have been rendered, and it would have been impossible to dispute it. But the master of the Newfoundland took the view, after discussion over the wireless with the Tower Bridge and having seen her, that the situation was not such as to require him to stand by, and he made it plain that he was not prepared to stand by indefinitely. Therefore, that element, the element of standing by for two or three days, from that time, which would otherwise have been involved, disappears from the case, and counsel for the defendants says that that is the beginning and end of the matter—that that request having been made and not complied with (it was not insisted on), there could not be any salvage service at all and there is none.

That is the point which has given me the most trouble in this case. I do not take that view. I think there was a definite service here. I think that you have, in considering whether there was a service or not, to take the whole of the circumstances into consideration. I do not think that you can isolate each separate stage and say, "This must be regarded by itself, and that must be regarded by itself." One has to look at the thing as a whole and see whether there was a salvage service. Of course, it goes without saying that one has to be able to say that it was one particular thing, or that thing coupled with others, which was the service in question.

When these two ships were in contact, visible to each other—though, as a matter of fact, those on board the Tower Bridge never saw the Newfoundland, a discrepancy which is simply explained by the fact that the Newfoundland had a much more exact direction-finding equipment, and knew exactly where to look for the Tower Bridge—when the moment had come when it was decided that the Newfoundland was not going to stand by to see the Tower Bridge into St. John, these messages were exchanged from the Newfoundland to the Tower Bridge—two consecutive messages came at intervals of five minutes: "As you have ship well under control, I consider there is no necessity to stand by you. Suggest you ask patrol boat to accompany you. Reply immediately whether." Before the reply came the following further message was sent: "Recommend you steer due east to clear water, about twelve miles, which I am doing, and then south to about 46 N. 47 W." To which the answer was: "Will carry out course you suggest."

Observe that this gave perfectly definite information which was based on the experience of the Newfoundland herself. It gave the information that from the point where this ship was she could get into clear water in twelve miles by going in an easterly direction. That is what the Newfoundland was able to tell her, precisely because she had come through this twelve miles from the clear water to her assistance and had been engaged in going on a clear course south in the clear water at the time when she received the S O S.

The chief officer of the Tower Bridge, giving evidence before me, said: "Yes, I got that information and I acknowledged it in those terms, but that was out of the merest politeness. After all, that is exactly what I was going to do in any case. And I was merely thanking him for something which I knew already." I do not accept that. I am quite satisfied that that is not the case. Of these two ships, one (three or four hours before) had been in this clear water and had gone, as I have already said, through this twelve miles of ice to assist the other. The other had been blundering about in the ice for something like twenty-four hours, and I do not accept that he knew perfectly well which was the shortest way to clear water. On the contrary, his own log showed that he did not.

I am not going to examine in meticulous detail entries of courses—which are only at best occasional notings-down of a series of courses, when he himself admits he was zigzagging here and there—but this, I think, is indisputable, that having gone into this ice on a generally south-westerly course, and having become embedded in pack ice, he had then tried to work his way out by going on a south-easterly course, more or less. He had proceeded in that sort of direction for some fifty or sixty miles at the time when he sent this S O S, but he did not get out of the ice. He sends this S O S, and at that time he sends out to the world that he is trying to get free by going, not in an easterly, but in a southerly, direction. He advertises that he is proceeding on a course of south true. I come to the conclusion that, so far from knowing all about getting out of the ice to the east, he thought that, having been going southerly and easterly for some time and not getting out of the ice, he would be more likely to strike the southern edge of the ice than the eastern. He, therefore, tried to get out that way, and, speaking generally, that was the way he had been working all the morning until the Newfoundland actually came up to him. When he tells me that this was merely a polite acknowledgment of information with which he was perfectly acquainted, I see what happened after it and I find recorded in his log that in fact he turned through 60 degrees, and in fact, though not visually, followed the Newfoundland out of the icefield.

I am now going to read the last four messages which passed between these two ships. At 8.2 p.m. the master of the Newfoundland sent this message to the Tower Bridge: "We are now clear of the icefield and steering S. true 47.08 N. 46.30 W." The answer said: "Heading towards your position making slow progress. Propeller damaged. Vessel down by head. Bulkhead between forward holds bulging. Pumps keeping down water in hold. Hope to keep going." At 10.5 p.m. there was a further message from the Newfoundland: "Suggest you keep in constant touch with ice patrol, giving your movements. Apart from three icebergs, well out of our track, we have had clear water since our last message." At 10.44 p.m. the last reply of the Tower Bridge is sent: "Now clearing ice. Thanks for messages. Will inform patrol."

I think that that not merely justifies me in finding, but compels me, to find that, so far from this being a polite exchange of compliments, what was actually happening was that the Tower Bridge was following the Newfoundland out into clear water and did by that means reach it.

I am advised by those who are qualified to advise me in this matter that there is not the slightest doubt that a very material service was rendered to the Tower Bridge by the Newfoundland. It is not necessary to define the precise moment at which the service began, but I think the substance of the matter is—although I am not prepared to quantify the moral support afforded her—that the only available ship in the North Atlantic came at a time when the salved vessel thought she was in the very greatest possible danger, came ploughing her way through the ice to her assistance, and that must have afforded some help and encouragement to those on board a vessel which was believed to be sinking. The substance of the thing is that having got there, and having been asked to go there, I am satisfied that the Newfoundland did give most valuable assistance in showing the Tower Bridge how to get out of this icefield, because, in fact, if the Tower Bridge had been left to herself, and had gone on to the southward, as she was doing at the time when this S O S was sent, she had got something like fifty or sixty miles of icefield ahead of her instead of twelve miles to the eastward, and nobody can tell what might have been the result of her trying to blunder through that unaided.

I do not think it is in the least to the purpose to say that at the moment when she advised the Tower Bridge to go to the east, the Newfoundland herself did not know how many miles the ice extended to the south. I do not think that is the point. The point is that they knew there was a short way into the clear water by going to the east, and that having got clear of the ice to the east, they could get round it to the south, whereas in fact, as I say, if she had stayed on the general course which she was trying to make before this advice was given and before the Newfoundland came up, the Tower Bridge would have had to encounter some sixty miles of icefield before she got clear. That, in her then damaged condition, would have been a very dangerous state of things indeed.

In those circumstances I have to make up my mind what is the proper award to make. I have looked at p. 133 of Kennedy on the Law of Civil Salvage, where is set out the various heads of things to be taken into account in awarding salvage. As regards the ship salved, there is no doubt that there was considerable danger both to human life and property, and there is no doubt what the salved value is, because that is agreed at £10,000. As regards the salvors, I think that there was danger to them, too. I think the captain was asked to take a very great responsibility, and did take a very great responsibility, in going back into that icefield in the way in which he did. In fact they damaged their propeller very considerably, and if they had disabled themselves their situation would have been very difficult and awkward. They might have been holed just as the other ship was; they did undoubtedly take some actual risk.

I think that the conduct and skill of the master of the Newfoundland were most praiseworthy. I am not going to say whether he could have exonerated himself from obeying this signal, but he never hesitated for a second, and as counsel for the defendants has most justly said, he could not dispute for a moment that his conduct was entirely praiseworthy. He was employing a valuable ship. As I have said, he was exposing it to danger, and in fact the danger has resulted in a definite expenditure in replacing damage which may or may not amount to the £4,000 which is actually claimed. The only thing that can be said, it seems to me, and it is an important thing, is that the reward would obviously have had to be very much greater if they had expended the time and labour which would have been involved in standing by until the Tower Bridge actually got into St. John. That they did not do.

That being so, as I have said, that element of award comes out altogether. It might have amounted to another two or three days of time and labour expended. Taking one thing with another and giving the best and fairest estimate which I can make, I think that the award ought to be £2,000, of which £1,500 goes to the owners, and of the remaining £500, £200 to the master who incurred this considerable responsibility, and the remaining £300 between the officers and crew, according to their ratings. The salvors will be awarded £2,000 with costs.

Bill of Exchange—Requirements of form—Document in form of cheque—"Pay cash or order"—No endorsement on document—Payment by bank to bearer—Whether document a cheque—Right of bank to act on drawer's mandate—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 3 (1), (2), s. 7 (1), (3), s. 73.

A customer of a bank filled in an ordinary order cheque form by writing the word "cash" in the space intended for the name of the payee, so that it read "Pay cash or order." The document was never endorsed by anyone, but was paid by the bank to the person presenting it.

Held: (i) the document was not made payable to or to the order of a specified person, or to bearer; it was, therefore, not a bill of exchange as defined by s. 3 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and so was not a cheque as defined by s. 73 of the Act; Grant v. Vaughan (1) (1764), 3 Burr. 1516, and principle stated by Lord Halsbury in Glynn v. Margetson & Co. (2), [1893] A.C. 351, 357, applied. Chamberlain v. Young (3), [1893] 2 Q.B. 206, considered; (ii) the document, therefore, did not require endorsement; (iii) the document was a direction to pay cash; (iv) the words "or order" were meaningless and so must be neglected, and the document was, therefore, a good direction to the bank to pay the sum named therein to the bearer of the document; (v) even if the document was not such a direction, it was designed by its maker to procure the bank to pay the sum named therein to its bearer, and was so understood and acted upon by the bank, and in these circumstances the court would not allow the maker to complain of the bank's action.

Notes. The same form of words was considered, with the same result but in slightly different circumstances, in Cole v. Milsome, [1951] 1 All E.R. 311.

Action by the plaintiff customers who claimed £250, and interest thereon, which they alleged the defendant bank had wrongly debited to their account. On Nov. 29, 1933, the customers were desirous of making a payment of £250 to the L. and W. Debenture Corpn., Ltd., of which one Black, was a director. In order to do so they drew a cheque for that amount on their account with the bank and delivered it to Black. The cheque was an ordinary order cheque, and the customers filled in the space for the name of the payee with the word "cash," so that the cheque read "Pay cash or order." The cheque was not crossed and was never endorsed by anyone. Black paid the cheque into his own bank, which collected the amount thereof from the defendant bank and credited it to Black's account.

The customers subsequently went into liquidation, and the liquidator brought this action in their name, claiming repayment of the £250 and interest thereon. He contended that the document was a cheque drawn to order, and therefore required endorsement, and as it had never been endorsed there was no proper authority for its payment. The bank contended that the document was a bill of exchange payable to a non-existent or fictitious person, and therefore must be treated as payable to bearer, pursuant to s. 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Alternatively, they said that if the document was not a bill of exchange it was an order given to a bank and acted on by them in accordance with the directions of their customer.

Section 7 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, provides:

> "Where a bill is not payable to bearer, the payee must be named or otherwise indicated with reasonable certainty . . . (3) Where the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person, the bill may be treated as payable to bearer."

F. J. Tucker, K.C., and James Wylie for the customers.
Schiller, K.C., and P. B. Morle for the bank.

BRANSON, J.—In this case the plaintiff customers, the North and South Insurance Corpn., Ltd. (in Liquidation), sue the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., and the relief which they ask is a declaration that the bank are bound to repay to them or to credit in account with them a sum of £250 wrongfully debited against them and any interest charged or debited in respect thereof by the bank—in the following circumstances.

The customers were an insurance company, and in 1933 they had fallen upon evil days, and in order to try to get some further capital they had entered into an agreement on Nov. 16 of that year with a company called the L. and W. Debenture Corpn., Ltd., under which on certain conditions the L. and W. Debenture Corpn., Ltd., were to find further capital and to receive certain remuneration for doing so. Part of the terms of that arrangement was that certain persons who were directors of the L. and W. Debenture Corpn. should be put upon the board of the North and South Insurance Corpn., the customer.

Before anything substantial could be done by way of finding capital for the customer, the Board of Trade, on Nov. 22, presented a petition for the compulsory liquidation of the customer company.

In those circumstances, on Nov. 29 the directors of the customer company were minded to pay to the L. and W. Debenture Corpn. a sum of £250, and in order to procure such a payment out of the funds at their credit with the bank, they brought into existence a document. I use a neutral term. The document is partly printed and partly in writing, and when one looks at it one sees quite plainly that the printed form is a form suitable for being filled in to make a cheque payable to order. It contained the blanks which one would naturally expect to be filled in with the name of the payee, and then appear the words "or order," which I will refer to in detail in a moment.

That document was handed to Mr. Black, who was the chairman of both the customer company and the L. and W. Debenture Corpn., and Mr. Black paid it into his own account with Lloyds Bank, and Lloyds Bank presented it to the defendant bank in the ordinary way of bank accounting. The result of the transaction was that the money passed from the account of the customer in the bank through the hands of Mr. Black to the L. and W. Debenture Corpn.

On Dec. 18, 1933, a compulsory winding-up order was made upon the customer, and a liquidator was appointed who, acting under s. 173 of the Companies Act, attempted in the first place to recover the sum of £250 from the L. and W. Debenture Corpn. But, by that time, the L. and W. Debenture Corpn. had itself gone into liquidation, and the liquidator ascertained that any attempt to recover the money from that company would probably be fruitless, and he is now seeking to recover it from the bank.

The ground upon which the case for the customer is put, is that the document in question was a cheque drawn to order and, therefore, required endorsing. It was not endorsed, and upon that ground it is said that there was no proper mandate given to the bank entitling them to pay out the £250 in the way in which they paid it.

The defence is put upon two grounds. It is said first of all, if this document is a cheque at all, it is, upon the true construction of it, a bill of exchange payable to a fictitious or non-existent person, or if it is not that, then it is not a cheque at all, but merely an order directed to the bank which the bank understood and acted upon, and the bank having understood it in the sense in which it was intended by the customer acting through its properly constituted officials that they should deal with it, the customer had no claim to the reimbursement of the money which the bank paid out in pursuance of that mandate. So that the first question with which I have to deal is the question whether this document was a cheque and, if it was a cheque, was it a cheque drawn to a fictitious or non-existent person so as not to require endorsement and so as to enable it to be treated as a cheque to bearer.

Now, in my view, the document cannot properly be called a cheque at all. It is true it appears upon a form intended to be filled up so as to be a cheque, but it was not so filled up.

My reasons for saying that it is not a cheque are the following. Under s. 73 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, a cheque is defined as "a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand." Therefore the first essential is that it should be a bill of exchange. Now, a bill of exchange is defined by s. 3 of the Bills of Exchange Act. The section is very familiar, but perhaps I had better read it in so far as it is material to the present case. It says:

> "(1) A bill of exchange is an unconditional order in writing, addressed by one person to another, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay a sum certain in money to or to the order of a specified person, or to bearer. (2) An instrument which does not comply with these conditions is not a bill of exchange."

The words "or to the order of a specified person" mean that in order to constitute a document a bill of exchange it must contain in it an order directing the person upon whom it is drawn to pay to a specified person. The present document in the material part reads, "Pay Cash or Order £250." "Cash" cannot be and never can be in this view of the case described as a "specified person." If authority is wanted for that, it is to be found in the old case of Grant v. Vaughan (1), where a draft on a banker was worded "Pay to ship Fortune, or bearer," and Lord Mansfield said (3 Burr. at p. 1524): "There is no person originally named as a payee," and Wilmot, J., said (ibid., at p. 1528): "No person at all is named; it is 'Pay to ship Fortune or bearer.'" However, the point which I have to deal with does not arise in that case, because the words "or bearer" are there and not the words "or order."

Counsel for the customers contends, however, that, whilst that is no doubt the case, I ought to construe the language used in this document as meaning "Pay Cash to my order," or "to me or my order," and as affording some assistance towards arriving at that conclusion he referred to Chamberlain v. Young (3). In my view Chamberlain v. Young (3) does not assist the customers. There the bill was drawn payable to blank order, without the word "or." In answer to an argument put forward that that was not a bill of exchange, it was pointed out by the Court of Appeal that the word "or" did not appear in the document under consideration, and Lord Esher said that the bill is a perfect bill in every respect, because it says "Pay to order," not "Pay to or order." In other words, it says "Pay to order," and by the most common rule of construction that must mean Pay to my order. Here I have got the word "or," "the absence of which enabled the Court of Appeal in Chamberlain v. Young (3) to decide that the document which they were considering was a bill of exchange. Certain remarks were made by Lord Esher in that case ([1893] 2 Q.B. at p. 209), as to what view he might have taken had the word "or" appeared in the document. However, as it was not necessary in that case to express any judicial opinion upon the point, His Lordship said: "We think it wiser not to determine the point judicially." So that, except in so far as it appears that the presence of the word "or" might have made all the difference to the position in that case had it appeared, the case does not assist me in the construction of the document before me, because, had the document been "Pay blank or order" different considerations might have arisen. I should then have had to decide whether the old case of R. v. Randall (4) still expressed the law, or whether the suggestion made by LORD ESHER in Chamberlain v. Young (3), that the mere absence of the name of a payee did not prevent the document being a bill of exchange when in all other respects it appeared to have been intended to be used as a bill of exchange.

As matters stand, I think I have got to approach the construction in this way. I have already referred to Grant v. Vaughan (1). The first thing that one has to do in the construction of a document is to look at the language of it. It may sound a truism, but there is no doubt that that is the way to approach the matter. What is meant by the words "Pay cash or order?" I have already said that "cash" cannot be treated as a payee at all, and that may deal, in a way, with the point suggested that this is a cheque drawn to a fictitious or non-existent person. I do not think that it is drawn to any person at all and, therefore, as it is not payable to bearer, and s. 1 (1) says that the payee must be named or otherwise indicated with reasonable certainty, I think it fails in what is an essential part of a bill of exchange. To come within the meaning of s. 7 (3), I think you must have a payee, and this cheque has got no payee. I find it difficult to say that the payee is in blank, so that one could read it "Pay blank or order," and fill in the blank, as counsel for the customers would have me do, by putting in the word "me" instead of "cash." I am driven back to the position that I have got to look at the words of the document, and put upon them such construction as appears to have been intended by the parties in this case who brought it into being. I think there is authority for putting a construction upon it according to principles which have been applied many times, and for many years, to cases where you have written words inserted in printed forms. There is the classic passage contained in the judgment of LORD HALSBURY in Glynn v. Margetson & Co. (2) which seems to me to apply with the greatest force to the problem before me. His Lordship says ([1893] A.C. at p. 357):

> "Looking at the whole of the instrument, and seeing what one must regard, for a reason which I will give in a moment, as its main purpose, one must reject words, indeed whole provisions, if they are inconsistent with what one assumes to be the main purpose of the contract."

Then he quotes from LORD ELLENBOROUGH's judgment in Robertson v. French (5), and points out that if you have written words and printed words which are mutually inconsistent you must reject the print in favour of the writing.

With that in mind I again turn to the document in question. It says: "Pay cash or order." Now, it cannot have been intended, if anybody had given it a moment's thought, that "cash," which is a purely impersonal collection of letters, should endorse this draft. That being so, I think that you cannot read those four words "Pay cash or order," so as to give any sensible meaning to the whole four, and the result of it is that you have got a direction to pay cash.

Now, I have heard in the course of the evidence, and it is in accordance with one's own general knowledge of these matters, that the word "cash," which appears in this document may often appear in other documents of this kind as "wages," or "office," or some other impersonal thing, and I, therefore, do not read the word "cash" in this document as directing the medium in which the payment is to be made, but I do read it as an order to pay some impersonal account which cannot endorse the cheque.

Now, that being so, I think that I must neglect the words "or order" and hold that this is a perfectly good direction to the bank to pay £250. Now, to whom? Surely to the bearer of the document. If it had been intended that a specified person should be the recipient of the money, that should have been put upon it; but according to both sides no person has been specified, and I think, for the same reasons, that the statute has enacted that where a payee is fictitious or non-existent, the bill of exchange may be treated as payable to bearer, and here, where there is simply an order in a bill of exchange to pay a sum of money, it follows by necessary implication that the payment must be made, and is intended to be made, to the person presenting the document.

If that is correct, then this action fails; but even if it is not correct, and even if it would be right to say that this document does not contain a sufficiently clear mandate to justify its being acted upon in that way, I then find the following position. This document came into being because the customer, acting through its properly constituted officials, desired to procure that the bank should pay to the person presenting this document the sum named therein. The bank have understood it as it was intended to be understood, and have paid the money in accordance with the direction that the customer intended to give and, that being so, it seems to me that it would be a blot upon our legal system if the court had to hold that, notwithstanding that the order was interpreted in the sense in which it was intended to be acted upon, the giver of that order could now turn round and say: "You have not properly fulfilled my mandate, and, therefore, pay me back the money which in pursuance of my direction you have paid away."

For those reasons I think that this action fails.

Judgment for the bank.

JUTSON v. BARROW

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Hewart, C.J., Humphreys and Singleton, JJ.), October 24, 25, 1935]

[Reported [1936] 1 K.B. 236; 105 L.J.K.B. 106; 154 L.T. 185; 100 J.P. 4; 52 T.L.R. 49; 79 Sol. Jo. 965; 33 L.G.R. 503; 30 Cox, C.C. 305]

Medical Practitioner—Unregistered person—Description of "manipulative surgeon"—Medical Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), s. 40.

By the Medical Act, 1858, s. 40: "Any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name or title of a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon, general practitioner or apothecary, or any name, title, addition or description implying that he is registered under this Act or that he is recognised by law as a physician, or surgeon, or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecary, shall, upon a summary conviction for any such offence, pay a sum not exceeding £20."

A person who uses the title of "manipulative surgeon" when he does not hold any medical degree, and is not registered or qualified as a medical practitioner under the Act, is guilty of an offence under the above section even if he does not thereby intend to deceive.

Per LORD HEWART, C.J.—No adjective added to the title "surgeon" can excuse the use of the word "surgeon" by a person who is not registered or recognised as a surgeon under the Act, unless he is expressly protected by statute.

Whitwell v. Shakesby (1) (1932), 147 L.T. 157, followed.

Notes. The decision in this case, and the dicta as to mens rea and as to the meaning of the words "wilfully and falsely," must now be read in the light of Younghusband v. Luftig, [1949] 2 All E.R. 72 (in which all the authorities on this point were considered) as explained in Wilson v. Inyang, [1951] 2 All E.R. 237. The law appears to be that a person is not guilty of an offence under s. 40, because he does not act 'wilfully and falsely,' if he has an honest, even though unreasonable, belief that he is entitled to use the prohibited title or description. Whether the accused has such a belief is a question of fact to be determined by the magistrates' court. In Jutson v. Barrow there was no express finding by the justices that the accused had such a belief.

C Case Stated by Devonshire justices.

Three informations were preferred by the appellant, William Ewart Jutson, under s. 40 of the Medical Act, 1858, against the respondent, Captain Horace Barrow. The informations alleged that the respondent unlawfully, wilfully and falsely used the title of "surgeon," contrary to the above section; that he wilfully and falsely used the title of "surgeon" implying that he was recognised by law as a surgeon; and that he unlaw-
D fully and falsely used a title implying that he was registered under the above Act.

On the hearing of the informations before Devonshire justices the following facts were proved or admitted:

On Aug. 30, 1934, and for some time before, the respondent had been the occupier of Denby House, Belle Vue Road, Paignton. Outside the premises was a plate bearing the words "Captain H. Barrow, M.M., Manipulative Surgeon." The plate was affixed
E on the instructions of the respondent at some time before Aug. 30, 1934, and was still displayed on that date.

The respondent allowed himself to be described in the telephone directory as "manipulative surgeon." Affixed to his motor car there was a plate similar to the one displayed outside his premises.

The respondent was not registered under the Medical Act, 1858. His name had never F appeared in the medical register, nor was he a legally qualified medical practitioner within the meaning of the Act. He did not hold and had never held any medical degree.

On Dec. 22, 1933, a letter was written to the respondent by the general secretary of the Medical Defence Union pointing out that, in the opinion of the council of the union, the use by the respondent of the title "surgeon" was an infringement of the Act, and G asking for an assurance that he would discontinue such use. The respondent replied by letter on Dec. 28, 1933, saying that he was not using the title "surgeon," and added: "Prove that I am not a manipulative surgeon and I will remove the title 'manipulative surgeon' from my plate." On Dec. 29, 1933, the secretary replied, saying that the council had no alternative but to place the matter in the hands of their solicitors.

The respondent, by manual operation, treated fractures, deformations, injuries and H disorders of the bones and joints. For the past fifteen years he had used the word "surgeon," always preceded by the word "manipulative," as describing his occupation. He had used those words in Sheffield, Cardiff and later in Paignton and in other places in the counties of Devon and Cornwall which he regularly visited.

On the part of the appellant it was contended (a) that the Act contained an absolute prohibition against the use of the title "surgeon" by an unregistered person; (b) that
I the use of the word "manipulative" could not justify or legalise the use by the respondent of the word "surgeon"; and (c) that the authority of Whitwell v. Shakesby (1) was conclusive against the respondent.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the words "manipulative surgeon" had been for upwards of twenty years publicly and generally used to mean, and were generally understood to mean, a person not registered under the Medical Act, 1858, and not recognised by law as a surgeon; that the word "surgeon," being used in conjunction with the word "manipulative," qualified and defined the word "manipulative"; that the respondent did not use the word "surgeon" by itself, and that the use of the word "surgeon" coupled with the word "manipulative" was neither an A unlawful or false use of the word nor the unlawful or false use of a name, title or addition within the meaning of the Act; that the use of the title "manipulative surgeon" did not imply that the respondent was registered under the Medical Act, 1858; and that Whitwell v. Shakesby (1) was clearly distinguishable on the facts.

The justices held that the respondent used the title wilfully within the meaning of the Act, but that such use was not unlawful in that it was used in order to describe the work B or craft which he practised. They accordingly dismissed all three informations and allowed the respondent fifty guineas costs.

The appellant Jutson appealed.

The Medical Act, 1858, s. 40, provides:

> "Any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name C or title of a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon, general practitioner or apothecary, or any name, title, addition, or description implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician, or surgeon, or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecary, shall, upon a summary conviction for any such offence, pay a sum not exceeding £20."

Norman Birkett, K.C., and J. D. Casswell for the respondent.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—This is a case stated by seven justices of the county of Devon, sitting at Paignton. It arises out of the hearing of three informations preferred against the present respondent under s. 40 of the Medical Act, 1858. The first of those E informations alleged that on a day in August, 1934, the respondent did unlawfully, wilfully, and falsely use the title "surgeon," contrary to s. 40 of that statute. The justices, having heard the case, dismissed all the informations and awarded fifty guineas costs to the respondent.

The facts of the case are simple enough. It was proved or admitted, inter alia, that on the day referred to and for some time before, the respondent, being the occupier of a certain house in Paignton, kept outside his premises a plate bearing the name F "Capt. H. Barrow, M.M., Manipulative Surgeon." That plate was affixed upon the instructions of the respondent himself. He allowed himself to be described in the telephone directory as "manipulative surgeon" and upon his motor car he carried a plate similar to the plate displayed outside his premises. He was not registered under the Medical Act, 1858, his name had never appeared in the Medical Register, nor was he a legally qualified medical practitioner within the meaning of that Act. He does not G hold nor has he ever held any medical degree. More than that, it was proved that in December, 1933, a letter had been written to the respondent by the general secretary of the Medical Defence Union, stating that in the view of the council of the union his use of the title "surgeon" amounted to an infringement of the Act. The latter requested an assurance that the respondent would discontinue the use of that title. The respondent, however, replied that he was not using the title of "surgeon" and he added these H words: "prove that I am not a manipulative surgeon and I will remove the title 'manipulative surgeon' from my plate." Proceedings followed. The case further finds that the respondent by manual operation treated fractures, deformations, injuries and disorders of the bones and joints, and that for a period of fifteen years he had been using the word "surgeon" preceded by the epithet "manipulative" as describing his occupation. He had used those words in many places and in different counties. I

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that, as he alleged, and the allegation depended upon his sole testimony, the words "manipulative surgeon" and "manipulative surgery" had been for upwards of twenty years publicly and generally used to mean and were generally understood to mean a person not registered under the Medical Act, 1858, and not recognised by law as a surgeon who carries on the occupation in which he was engaged. He contended that those words had been publicly and generally used by members of the medical profession and others to distinguish unqualified persons and their occupation from qualified and registered surgeons and their profession. He even went so far as to contend that the word "surgeon" being used in conjunction with the word "manipulative" qualified and defined the word "manipulative" or, in other words, that the substantive qualified the adjective, and he further contended that the statute contained a prohibition against the wilful and false use of the word "surgeon" by itself or the wilful and false use of any name, title or description implying that a person is registered under the Act, or that he is recognised by law as a surgeon, or licentiate in surgery. Indeed, it is apparent that, having persuaded himself, it is to be supposed, of the truth of his contention, he said that he used these words "manipulative surgeon" for the very purpose of directing attention to the fact that he was not a surgeon within the meaning of the statute.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the statute contained an absolute prohibition against the use of the title "surgeon" by an unregistered person and that the use of the word "manipulative" could not justify or legalise the use by the respondent of the word "surgeon."

The case has not been stated in a very satisfactory form and there is annexed to it a transcript of the notes of evidence. It is interesting to observe that, according to those notes, the respondent said on oath that he used the phrase "manipulative surgeon" to distinguish himself from the registered practitioner. He even went so far as to say that if any other name would properly describe his work he would gladly adopt that name. It is quite obvious that there are other names which would fulfil that purpose, as, for example—as his learned counsel seemed to admit in argument—the words "manipulative healer."

One would think that, in the absence of authority, the words of s. 40 of the Medical Act, 1858, are reasonably plain. [His Lordship read the section, and continued:] It is natural to ask immediately why that section is framed in that twofold form. It would have been quite simple to enact that any person who wilfully and falsely used any name implying that he was registered, &c., when he was not should be liable to a penalty. The legislature has not taken that course. It has set out in the first part of the section certain well-known expressions or descriptions "physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon, general practitioner or apothecary"—and it is not denied that, if for the moment the word "surgeon" is subtracted from that enumeration, every one of the other expressions there set out has this feature in common with the rest, that it is a well-known professional description. Why is not that remark equally true of the word "surgeon"? All these specific titles or names are enumerated in one phrase and treated as being on the same plane. Those specific and well-known descriptions having been enumerated and protected, the section goes on by way of addition to prohibit the false user of any name, title, addition, or description implying that a person is registered under this Act, or is recognised by law, &c. In other words, the section, having prohibited the improper use of any of the well-known names or titles of qualified practitioners, goes on to sweep into the net of what is forbidden any name which has the effect of implying that the unregistered person is a registered practitioner. And it is quite obvious that these words beginning with "implying that he is registered," &c., are words not purporting to describe the intent of the individual, but are words describing the effect of the name, title, addition, or description. If that name, title, addition, or description carries with it the implication referred to in the section, it matters not what the intention of the person using it may be. The section is for the protection of the public, and what is regarded is not the mind of the individual but the meaning likely to be conveyed by the words which are used. With regard to the first set of words—the descriptions which are specifically enumerated—it seems to me that the section regards the matter as being beyond doubt.

Our attention was directed in the course of the argument to cases, not very satisfactory either in argument or in report, which have approached the present question. There was, for example, Ladd v. Gould (2), in which the justices came to a certain conclusion of fact. The case related to a dentist, and the justices were of opinion that his use of the word "surgeon" was merely for the purpose of showing what kind of dental business he carried on and that he was not intending to represent himself as a surgeon within the meaning of the Act. All that the court decided, I think, was that there was evidence from which they might come to that conclusion, though they might have come to the opposite conclusion. That case seems to me to be no authority for anything beyond what it states.

There was a later case, Ellis v. Kelly (3), where a man who had, or thought he had, a diploma from a Bavarian University called himself simply "Dr. Kelly." What was charged against him was not that he had wilfully and falsely assumed the name of "doctor," but that he wilfully and falsely pretended to be a doctor of medicine, the information being based on other words in s. 40. On the particular facts of that case it was held that there was no evidence that he had wilfully and falsely pretended to be a doctor because, as was said by CHANNELL, B., he had not wilfully and falsely used the title of "doctor"; or, as WILDE, B., said (6 H. & N. at p. 227):

> "The defendant had a German diploma, which he might reasonably believe entitled him to describe himself as he did."

BRAMWELL, B., said (6 H. & N. at p. 226):

> "The fortieth section is intended to guard the public against being imposed upon by a person pretending to have a qualification when in fact he has none. It applies to the case of a person using a title falsely implying that he is registered or has a title to be registered. The object is to prevent people from assuming titles in respect of a qualification when they have none. . . . Did the respondent wilfully and falsely, in other words criminally, pretend to be, or use the title of a physician? There is nothing more than this, that having a foreign diploma he chose to put the word 'Dr.' before his name."

He added that the justices:

> "seem to have held that the respondent might well call himself 'Dr. Kelly,' on the supposition that he had a right to do so."

It may well be that words of that kind are relevant and appropriate where the particular offence which is charged is the offence of wilfully and falsely pretending. However, it may be observed that even so, on further reflection, BRAMWELL, B., was a little doubtful of the words which he had employed in Ellis v. Kelly (3). It appears that twelve years later, in Andrews v. Styrap (4), BRAMWELL, B., who was a member of the court with MARTIN and PIGOT, BB., observed in the course of the argument (26 L.T. at p. 706)—reference having been made to his observation in Ellis v. Kelly (3):

> "The matter does not appear to me now as it appears to have appeared to me then."

In other words, he was not quite certain whether he had been accurately reported. But, however that may be, it seems to me when one looks carefully at all these cases that there is no clear judicial authority on the true interpretation of this twofold section.

In my opinion, the effect of this section is to prohibit the use of any of the specifically named and well-known descriptions except in cases where they are lawfully employed. If one of those well-known professional descriptions is employed, I think a defendant cannot be heard to say, borrowing the latter words of the section which are applicable to names and descriptions of a different character, that the name which he employed did not imply that he was registered or recognised* in the sense described by the statute. If he is not a surgeon, he must not call himself a surgeon, and it seems to me to be quite idle to say that in this context the word "surgeon" is used to qualify or modify the word "manipulative." It is perfectly clear as a matter of grammar that the word "manipulative" is the adjective and the word "surgeon" the substantive, and what this respondent is asserting is: "I am a surgeon, and if you ask me what kind of surgeon I am, I am a manipulative surgeon." It is a curious epithet to apply to the word "surgeon." By its very name the profession of surgeon implies a person who does that which he does by means of his hands, and to say that he is a manipulative surgeon is, as it were, to say he is a surgical surgeon.

Various suggestions were made in the course of counsel for the respondent's ingenious argument by way of a reductio ad absurdum. He asked, for example, would it be unlawful for a man to describe himself as a quack surgeon? Of course, no man would do so, because the term would be contradictory within itself. It would be equivalent to saying: "I call myself a surgeon, but I am not." But when reference is made to expressions like "dental surgeon" and "veterinary surgeon" very different considerations apply. Dentists and veterinary surgeons are both expressly protected by statute. Let me refer to an Act of Parliament, which was not mentioned in the course of the argument, but which seems to me to dispose of all that type of argument and suggestion on which so much of the respondent's case seemed to rest. By the Veterinary Surgeons Act, 1881, s. 17, it was provided that if after a named day

* His lordship may well have meant to say "qualified," not "recognised": Younghusband v. Luftig, [1949] 2 All E.R. 72, 77, per curiam.

> "any person, other than a person who for the time being is on the register of veterinary surgeons, or who at the time of the passing of this Act held the veterinary certificate of the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland, takes or uses the title of veterinary surgeon or veterinary practitioner, or any name, title, addition, or description stating that he is a veterinary surgeon or a practitioner of veterinary surgery or of any branch thereof, or is specially qualified to practise the same, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds."

It is obvious that that section is deliberately framed on the scheme and system of s. 40 of the Medical Act, 1858. The use of the specific name in an improper case is forbidden. Apart from the specific name, the use of any other name, title, addition, or description having the same purport and effect is also forbidden. To suggest that the term "manipulative surgeon" does not come within the mischief of s. 40 of the Act of 1858 because a man may lawfully call himself a "dental surgeon" or a "veterinary surgeon" is obviously nothing to the point when one remembers that those persons are expressly protected in each case by a statute.

I am not inquiring into the frame of mind of the respondent. I take it that he is sincere. If, however, he desires to represent to the public that he is not a qualified surgeon, it is a very unfortunate thing that he should choose the description "surgeon," preceded though it be by the epithet "manipulative." If he would gladly achieve the same end—namely, that of telling the public that he is not a qualified surgeon—and have a title not likely to produce that prohibited effect, there are many descriptions open to him. Apparently he does not like the name "bone setter." Counsel seemed to be a little reconciled to the description "manipulative healer." But what does all that class of consideration involve except this, that the use of the word "surgeon" is, and is thought to be, desirable because of the well-known and particular connotation and association of the word? The thing which makes the name "surgeon" appear to be attractive and useful is precisely the thing which this section was enacted to prevent. If the respondent is, as we must take him to be, sincere, there are many ways open to him of telling the public that he is not a surgeon other than the way of telling the public that he is a surgeon.

It seems to me that this case is really beyond argument. The respondent has chosen to use the word "surgeon," the meaning of which is, and is intended to be, clear to the man in the street, and it matters not that he has chosen to attach to it the tautologous epithet "manipulative."

I have thought from an early stage in the discussion in the present case that it was concluded by the judgment of this court in Whitwell v. Shakesby (1), but I should like to add one word with reference to a passage in my own judgment in that case. No support is given by the judgment in Whitwell v. Shakesby (1) to the ill-reported and, it would seem, inadequately argued case of Ladd v. Gould (2). What I was doing in my reference to Ladd v. Gould (2) in Whitwell v. Shakesby (1) was to differentiate Ladd v. Gould (2) from the case then under consideration, and the differentiation was that in Ladd v. Gould (2) there was a finding of fact. I said nothing of the merits of that fact or that finding. All I said was (147 L.T. at p. 158):

> "There is no such finding as that in this case."

I would add this, that, speaking for myself, I cannot imagine any adjective which, being added to the title "surgeon," would excuse the use of the word "surgeon" by a person not registered or recognised as a surgeon under the Act of 1858, unless, as for example in the case of a veterinary surgeon, he is expressly protected by statute. In the present case the only fact which needed to be found was whether this man called himself a surgeon. The answer to that question was obvious.

On the first of these informations, therefore, it is clear to me that the justices had in law no alternative except to convict. I think the same consideration applies to the second information. With regard to the third, if my copy of this case is correct, the information did not use the word "wilfully." On the substance of the matter it is perfectly plain to me that this appeal must be allowed and the case must go back to the justices with a direction to find that the offence which was charged was proved.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered by my Lord for the reasons stated in that judgment, but, in view of the interesting and forcible argument addressed to us by counsel for the respondent, and since we are differing from the justices who acquitted the respondent, I will add a few words of my own.

I understand that the three informations in this case were intended to be alternative charges, and I do not think that the respondent could be mulcted in more than one penalty in respect of one act. Therefore, in my view, it is sufficient to deal with one, and it will be convenient to deal with the first of the informations which, following the words of the Act, charged the respondent with the offence of unlawfully, wilfully and falsely using the title of surgeon, contrary to the section.

Counsel for the respondent's argument, as I understood it, was to this effect. He said that the medical profession have no monopoly of the word "surgeon," and that the use by an unregistered and unqualified person of the title "surgeon" is prohibited by s. 40 of the Act of 1858 only if the use of that title implies that he is registered under the Act or recognised by law as a surgeon. I have great difficulty in accepting that argument, having regard to the perfectly plain language of the section, and I respectfully agree with the view which my Lord has expressed that the beginning of the section makes it an offence for any unqualified person to use any of the named titles. Then the section goes on to make it an offence for any person by the use of any title other than the named titles to imply that he is registered under the Act. But the matter is of very little importance in this case, because counsel for the respondent conceded that the use of the word "surgeon" simpliciter would imply that the person who used it was registered under the Act. He went on to say, however, that it was a question of fact for the justices in each case whether the title proved to have been used by a defendant does or does not imply that he is a registered person. Up to a point that is correct, but I observe in this case that the justices have not found as a fact any answer to that question. They have not found that the use of the words "manipulative surgeon" does not imply that a person is a registered surgeon. Indeed, in spite of an appeal to do so, they seem to have carefully refrained from finding any such thing. I am far from saying, expressing my own view on the matter, that if on the facts of this case the justices had found as a fact that the expression "manipulative surgeon" did not imply that the defendant was representing himself to be a surgeon, this court would not have taken the matter into their consideration and held that there was no evidence on which the justices could come to such a finding.

Counsel for the respondent's next point was that the use of the word "manipulative" in front of the word "surgeon" removed any implication which would otherwise arise from the use of the word "surgeon," and, therefore, that the expression "manipulative surgeon" did not mean "surgeon." I will deal with that argument in a moment, and proceed now to the consideration of the third of counsel for the respondent's arguments. He said that in any event an offence under s. 40 is not committed by an unqualified person unless it is shown that he intends by the use of the title which he takes to imply that he is a registered person. I can find no words in the section which give the smallest indication that that is its meaning. There are no such words as "intent to deceive" or "intention to persuade persons that he is registered." It appears to me that the prohibition against the use of the named words and titles or any other titles having the same implication is absolute.

But for Ellis v. Kelly (3), to which my Lord has referred, I should have thought that that argument was an extravagant argument. However, counsel supported it by reference to that case, which, he contended, was a decision to the effect that a person could not commit an offence under this section unless he wilfully and falsely took the name and title in question and that "wilfully and falsely" meant not only intentionally, but also with intent to deceive. Ellis v. Kelly (3) was a very remarkable case and, judging solely, as one must, by the reported facts of the case, it is a little difficult to understand why Mr. Kelly, or Dr. Kelly, as I have no doubt he was perfectly entitled to call himself, was ever prosecuted. Section 40 of the Act of 1858, as was observed in that case and others, is a section designed to deal with unqualified persons who in one way or another represent themselves to the public as being qualified, and "qualified" means registered under the Act or recognised by law. Mr. Kelly was a fully qualified and registered medical practitioner, as much entitled to practise medicine as even the chairman of the Medical Defence Union at that date. He was the holder, and nobody doubted it, of a degree from a well-known German University, which entitled him to call himself a doctor of medicine, and he produced that diploma. The charge against him was that he wilfully and falsely pretended to be a doctor of medicine and thereby implied that he was registered as a doctor of medicine. He was not registered as a doctor of medicine, but was registered under the titles of M.R.C.S. and L.S.A. which he was perfectly justified in using and which enabled him to call himself a registered practitioner. The sole difficulty in the minds of the justices seems to have been that he did not prove his diploma to their satisfaction. For my own part, I share the difficulty which was expressed by BRAMWELL, B., in understanding why the justices did not consider that the diploma was proved. Two witnesses were called who proved the seals of the University and of the medical faculty, and one of them expressed the opinion that the signature of the professor who purported to sign the diploma was the signature of a professor whose writing he knew. However, for some reason or other the justices were not satisfied of the fact of the proof of that document, but nevertheless said that they were not going to convict the defendant of a criminal offence.

All that the court decided in that case was that in such circumstances the qualified registered medical practitioner, who had called himself Dr. Kelly, because in truth he was in possession of a diploma which would entitle him to call himself Dr. Kelly, was not to be convicted of a criminal offence merely because he was not in a position to prove to the satisfaction of the justices the diploma which he produced.

In my opinion it is not necessary to prove, in order to convict an unqualified person under this section, any intention on his part to deceive or to represent himself as a qualified person. In my view, the section is silent as to any such matters and they are quite immaterial.

To return to counsel for the respondent's argument that the use of the word "manipulative" in front of the word "surgeon" in some way prevents the person who uses that word from describing himself as a surgeon, I do not think it necessary to consider whether there may or may not be some combination of words including the word "surgeon" which might properly be held not to imply that the person who uses that combination of words is a registered person. In this case we have to deal with the two simple words "manipulative surgeon," and, in my view, the case is concluded by a recent authority, Whitwell v. Shakesby (1). The decision in that case was that an unqualified person who described himself as a "bone setter"—that, of course, is unobjectionable—"osteopathic physician and surgeon," committed an offence against s. 40 by the use of the words "physician and surgeon." Now, if the description "osteopathic surgeon" is a description which implies that the person who uses it is a surgeon, how can we say that the expression "manipulative surgeon" does not imply the same? Without referring in detail to the judgments in that case, in my view it is conclusive of this matter, and on that ground I hold that the argument of counsel for the respondent must fail, and that the justices were wrong in the view which they took. The justices say: "We were of opinion that such use was not unlawful"—I suppose that means was not wilful and false—"in that it was used in order to describe the work or craft practised by the respondent." That seems to me to be an excellent reason for saying that the respondent is entitled to describe himself as a manipulator, because that is the art or craft which he uses. But it can be no reason for allowing him to describe himself as a surgeon, which is a description in terms forbidden by s. 40 to unqualified persons.

For these reasons I agree that this case must go back to the justices with a direction to find the offence charged in the first information proved.

SINGLETON, J.—I am of the same opinion. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] Section 40 of the Medical Act, 1858, creates a number of offences. In my view, the true reading of the section is that a person commits an offence (a) if he wilfully and falsely uses the name or title of surgeon, and also commits an offence, (b) if he wilfully and falsely uses any name, title, addition, or description implying that he is registered under the Act, or that he is recognised by law, as a surgeon. Counsel for the respondent argued that (a) is too strict a view, and that no offence is committed unless the person charged is thereby implying, or seeking to get others to draw an inference, that he is so registered or recognised. In my view, there is no need to look into any such questions, if the name or title "surgeon" is used. The question of implication only arises on the latter part of the section in reference to the words "or any name, title, addition or description."

It was argued, further, that this view would make it an offence under the section for anyone to describe himself as a "veterinary surgeon" or as a "dental surgeon," but "veterinary surgeon" is a well-recognised term under the Veterinary Surgeons Act, 1881, and a "dental surgeon" is well understood as one who is a dental practitioner under the Dentists Acts, 1878 and 1921. No one could think that one so describing himself was using the name or title of "surgeon" within s. 40 of the Act of 1858. The object of the Act, as stated in the preamble, is that persons requiring medical aid should be enabled to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners, and if one could imagine a case in which the word "surgeon" was qualified by words which made it clear that the person concerned was not qualified in one of the ways stated—in other words, that he was not a surgeon in the ordinary acceptance of the term—it is possible that magistrates would be justified in holding that such description was not false within the meaning of the section. The only instance of such a case suggested by counsel for the respondent in argument was "quack surgeon," a description which it is difficult to think that anyone would use. It is, however, unnecessary to consider any such cases, and I say no more on that matter.

The respondent's plate bore the words "manipulative surgeon." It is impossible to hold that that was not using the name or title of surgeon. The justices have found that the user was wilful, and their finding of fact shows that it was false. In such circumstances the justices ought to have convicted the respondent under the first information. The name or title of "surgeon" is there, even though it is preceded by the word "manipulative," and the offence is proved. There is no finding of fact to the contrary, and if there had been I do not think it could have stood on the facts of the case as stated.

Furthermore, I am of opinion, if it be necessary to consider the matter, that, by having a plate with the words "manipulative surgeon" on it, the respondent was using a description implying that he was recognised by law as a surgeon, which was the charge in the second information. He did that wilfully, and it was false. It is not a question of what he intended, but what was to be implied in and from the description.

The case seems to me to be precisely within the decision of this court in Whitwell v. Shakesby (1) and to be covered by the words used by LORD HEWART, C.J., towards the conclusion of his judgment in that case (147 L.T. at p. 159), that the respondent used the words or description "only because, as I think, they appear to convey that the respondent had qualifications which in fact he had not and which the Medical Act of 1858 prevented him from assuming without the lawful right so to do." The respondent here knew he was not entitled to use the name or title of surgeon simpliciter. He sought to avoid the effect of the section by putting in the adjective "manipulative," retaining the word "surgeon," which he wished to keep and use because he thought it would be attractive. None the less he is still within both limbs of the section.

I agree that the case must go back with a direction to the justices that there ought to be a conviction. I have no doubt that it was the intention of those who laid the information that the offences charged, if they were proved, should be treated alternatively, and it is sufficient for the purposes of this case if there is a conviction on the first information.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lewis, J.), November 21, 1935]

[Reported 154 L.T. 149; 80 Sol. Jo. 93]

Sale of Goods—Contract—Sale "subject to sample quantity" of specified dimensions—Sample of good quality, not of specified dimensions—Sample accepted, but buyer's claim for damages for breach of contract as to dimension—Obligation of seller to deliver bulk—Whether binding contract concluded.

A contract for the sale of timber provided that the sale was "subject to a sample quantity" of about fifty logs to be cut in specified thicknesses. The samples delivered were of the contract quality, but not of the specified dimensions. The buyer accepted the samples, but claimed damages for their failure to comply with the contract, and the seller thereupon refused to deliver the bulk.

Held: the buyer was entitled to damages both for the failure of the samples to comply with the contract, and for the failure of the sellers to deliver the bulk, because (i) the phrase "subject to sample quantity" did not prevent there being a binding contract: Hillas & Co. v. Arcos (1) (1932), 147 L.T. 503, applied; (ii) the object of the sample being to show quality and the buyer having accepted the sample, the seller could not refuse to deliver the bulk, notwithstanding that the buyer was claiming damages in respect of the incorrect dimensions of the sample.

Notes. As to when a contract constitutes a sale by sample, see 29 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 67, para. 75, and for cases on the subject, see 39 DIGEST 451–453, 789–799.

As to the enforceability of contracts made "subject to" certain events or conditions, see 8 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 76–77, para. 130, text and notes (b)–(k), and for cases on the subject, see 12 DIGEST (Repl.) 79 et seq., 438–440, 445–447, and 92 et seq., 523–587.

Case referred to:

(1) Hillas & Co., Ltd. v. Arcos, Ltd. (1932), 147 L.T. 503; 38 Com. Cas. 23, H.L.; Digest Supp.

Case Stated by an umpire in an arbitration between the sellers and the buyer of timber. A written contract between the sellers and the buyer provided for the sale of certain timber "to be sawn . . . into the following thicknesses unedged and bundled and subject to sample quantity as follows for November shipment; about twenty-five logs hewn all cut $1\frac{1}{8}$ in. thickness . . .; about twenty-five logs round unbarked all cut $1\frac{1}{4}$ in. thickness. . . ."

The dispute arose with regard to the meaning of the words "subject to sample quantity." A sample shipment was sent in November, and the buyer complained that the logs were not of the contract dimensions. The sellers then refused to deliver anything further under the contract. In the arbitration the buyer claimed damages for breach of warranty in delivering goods in the sample not of the contract description, and also damages for non-delivery of the bulk. The umpire awarded damages under both heads, subject to this special case.

The sellers did not now dispute that they were liable for breach of warranty with regard to the sample, but they contended that the words "subject to sample quantity" meant that a binding contract to deliver the bulk could only arise if the buyer approved the sample. The buyer contended that the contract was a sale subject to a proviso that, if the buyer did not approve of the quality of the sample, he need not take the bulk. If the sellers' contention were right, a seller could always avoid his obligation to deliver by purposely supplying an inferior sample. The object of the sample was to show the quality of the goods, which was satisfactory. The complaint was only with regard to the dimensions.

Sellers, K.C., and Cyril Connor for the sellers.
H. L. Parker for the buyer.

LEWIS, J.—This matter comes before me as a special case stated at the request of the sellers under the Arbitration Act, 1889. The dispute concerns a contract made between Messrs. Nicholson & Co., the sellers, and Mr. Saxton, the buyer, dated Oct. 30, 1933.

The contract was one under which the sellers, through the agency of certain brokers, sold to the buyer the goods specified (for shipment during the coming season) "fresh first-class Quebec birch timbers," about 1,000 logs cut into boules, subject to sample of about twenty-five logs hewn and twenty-five logs round, all cut to specified thicknesses. On Oct. 30, 1933, the season was nearly finished.

The arbitrator found as a fact that the consignment sent in November, referred to in the contract as the sample quantity, consisted of only forty logs, twenty round and twenty hewn, and was not in accordance with the description because the logs were not properly cut, that is to say, not cut to the thicknesses contained in the contract.

What happened was this. The buyer has accepted the logs but claimed damages because the November shipment was not according to the description given in the contract. The buyer, as the arbitrator finds, made repeated requests for the delivery of the balance of the timber, but no delivery has been made, and the buyer says that he is entitled to damages for the sellers' breach of the contract in failing to deliver the balance of the timber. That depends upon whether or not it is a contract for the sale of "about 1000 logs." The arbitrator has left two questions for the opinion of the court:

"Whether upon the true construction of the said contract of Oct. 30, 1933 [the sellers] committed breaches thereof by their failure to deliver the wood goods specified therein as to (a) a sample quantity for November shipment being about twenty-five logs hewn all cut to 1⅛ in. thickness at 3s. 3d. and about twenty-five logs round unbarked all cut to 1¼ in. thickness at 3s. 3d. per cubic foot, and (b) as to the remainder of the said wood goods, so as to entitle [the buyer] to claim damages for such breaches of the said contract."

With regard to (a), counsel for the sellers said, in my view quite properly, that it was impossible to argue on the finding of the arbitrator that the November shipment was in accordance with the contract, and I therefore answer the first question by saying that the buyer is entitled to damages for failure to ship the November goods in accordance with the contract.

Whether or not there has been a breach of contract on the part of the sellers in regard to the remainder of the contract must depend on whether the contract was for 1,000 logs or was nothing more than a contract to sell "about twenty-five logs round and twenty-five logs hewn," and whether, with regard to further goods mentioned, there was any binding contract to buy or sell. It was said that nothing in excess of fifty logs was in the agreement. I am satisfied that it is for the court to say on the proper construction of the document whether or not it is an agreement to make an agreement or a binding agreement.

My attention has been directed at some length to certain passages in Hillas & Co. v. Arcos (1), in the judgments of LORD TOMLIN and LORD WRIGHT, and I am satisfied, on reading these judgments, on the principles there laid down, together with consideration of the contract in the present case, that it would be incorrect to say that the contract is only an agreement to make an agreement.

I think that the object of the sample was in order to ascertain the quality and that

A there was a further agreement that so long as the sample with regard to quality was approved, there was a firm agreement by the sellers to sell to the buyer about 1,000 logs of the timber specified. I think the contract is far beyond what might be termed a contract to make a contract. The prices are set out, shipment is to be during "the coming season," the quantities are set out and also the size of the logs. For these reasons I think this was a firm contract for about 1,000 logs, subject to what I have said B about the sample.

There is no finding by the arbitrator that the sample was not approved in regard to quality. If I am right in saying that the object of the sample was in order to ascertain the quality, in my view one is entitled to infer from the facts that so far as the quality was concerned the sample was approved. There is no suggestion that the sample was not approved in respect of the quality but it is found that the buyer, having received the C sample, discovered it was not up to the description in the contract because of the sizes not being as stipulated. The arbitrator also found that the buyer received the sample and pressed for further delivery, and it is therefore not too much to say that the only inference to be drawn is that the buyer approved the sample as far as quality was concerned.

In these circumstances I must find that the sellers had committed breaches of the D contract by their failure to deliver the remainder of the timber, and the buyer is entitled to damages and costs.

A Case Stated by Glamorganshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Bridgend an information was preferred by Alun Thomas (the informant) against Police-sergeant Sawkins (the defendant), under s. 42 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, charging the defendant that he on Aug. 17, 1934, did unlawfully assault and beat the informant.

B On the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted: A public meeting was held at the large hall of the Caerau Library on the evening of Aug. 17, 1934, to protest against the Incitement to Disaffection Bill, which was then before Parliament, and to demand the dismissal of the Chief Constable of the county of Glamorgan. Between 500 and 700 persons were present at the meeting, the chairman being one Richard Davies. Certain persons had been appointed to act as stewards at the meeting and to assist in ejecting any police officers who might attend and might C refuse to leave after being requested so to do. The stewards attended the meeting for that purpose. The hall was used for meetings and was hired for the purpose of holding the meeting in question by one Fred Thomas. The public were invited to attend the meeting, but no charge for admission was made. The meeting was advertised extensively by posters in red chalk on paper and by the chalking of pavements, the public being invited to come in crowds. The informant and Fred Thomas were two of the D conveners of the meeting. The defendant, a sergeant of the Glamorgan County Police Force; one Richard Parry, a police inspector; and one Stephen Lawrence, a police sergeant of the force, presented themselves for admission to the meeting, but were informed by Fred Thomas at the entrance that he had been instructed not to admit the defendant or any other police officer. In spite of this, the defendant, with the two other police officers, insisted on entering the hall, and they seated themselves in the front row E seats of the meeting. The informant, soon after his arrival at the meeting, requested the defendant and the other police officers to leave the premises, but they refused to do so. The informant then lodged a complaint against them at the Caerau police station for not leaving the meeting when requested. The informant then returned to the meeting and read over to the defendant and the two other police officers the above-mentioned complaint and again requested them to leave, which they refused to do. He then made a F statement to the meeting with regard to their presence and again requested them to leave, which they refused to do. The informant then stated that the police officers would be ejected and he laid his hand upon Inspector Parry for the purpose of ejecting him. The defendant thereupon pushed the arm and hand of the informant from Inspector Parry, saying: "I won't allow you to interfere with my superior officer." As a result of the entrance of other police officers no further attempt was made to eject G the police officers. In attempting to remove Inspector Parry, the informant used no more force than was reasonably necessary for effecting that purpose, and the defendant used no more force than was reasonably necessary (assuming that he and Inspector Parry had the right to be and remain there) to protect Inspector Parry and to prevent him from being ejected. It was not alleged by the defendant that any criminal offence was committed by any person at the meeting at any time. There was not in or about H the meeting, and there had not been before the entrance of the police, any actual breach of the peace or disorder. The informant was the principal speaker at the meeting, and he and Fred Thomas were lawfully in possession of the hall and gave permission to members of the public to enter.

On the part of the informant it was contended that the premises upon which the meeting was held were private premises, to which neither the police nor the public had I right of access, and that any police officer who entered the premises against the expressed will of the conveners of the meeting was a trespasser; that any police officer lawfully present who remained after being requested to leave the premises became a trespasser either immediately on refusal to leave or after the lapse of time sufficient for him to take his departure; that the informant was entitled to remove the defendant and other police officers, using no more force than was reasonably necessary; and that the defendant, in resisting removal and in the circumstances, committed an unlawful assault upon the informant. On the part of the defendant it was contended that he had a legal right to enter the hall and meeting and remain there against the express wishes of the informant and Fred Thomas; that he did so remain because, in the judgment of himself and the other police officers (based on their experience and knowledge of previous meetings organised by the Communist Party at Caerau), it was anticipated that the meeting would become an unlawful assembly or a riot, or that breaches of the peace would take place, to the alarm of the residents, and that seditious and inflammatory speeches were likely to be made at the meeting.

The justices held that the defendant and the other police officers had reasonable grounds for believing that, if they were not present at the meeting, seditious speeches would be made, and (or) incitements to violence, and (or) breaches of the peace would take place, and that they were entitled to enter and remain in the hall and meeting. They held, accordingly, that the defendant did not assault the informant and dismissed the information.

The informant appealed by Case Stated to the Divisional Court.

Sir Stafford Cripps, K.C., and Dingle Foot for the appellant.
R. Vaughan Williams, K.C., and Dapho L. Powell for the respondent.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—It is apparent that the conclusion of the justices in this case consisted of two parts. One was a conclusion of fact that the respondent and the police officers who accompanied him believed that certain things might happen at the meeting then about to be held. There were ample materials on which the justices could come to that conclusion. The second part of the justices' finding is no less manifestly an expression of opinion. Finding the facts as they do, and drawing from those facts the inference which they have drawn, they go on to say that the officers were entitled to enter and to remain on the premises on which the meeting was being held.

Against that determination, it is said that it is an unheard-of proposition of law, and that in the books no case is to be found which goes the length of deciding that, where an offence is expected to be committed, as distinct from where an offence has been committed, there is a right in the police to enter on private premises and to remain there against the will of those who, as hirers or otherwise, are for the time being in possession of the premises. When, however, I look at the passages which have been cited from BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES (8th Edn.), vol. 1, p. 356, and from the judgments in Humphries v. Connor (1) and O'Kelly v. Harvey (2) and certain observations of AVORY, J., in Lansbury v. Riley (3), I think that there is quite sufficient ground for the proposition that it is part of the preventive power and, therefore, part of the preventive duty, of the police in cases where there are such reasonable grounds of belief as the justices have found in the present case, to enter and remain on private premises. It goes without saying that the powers and duties of the police are directed, not to the interests of the police, but to the protection and welfare of the public.

It was urged in one part of the argument of counsel for the appellant that what was done here was really a trespass. It seems somewhat remarkable to speak of trespass when members of the public who happen to be police officers attend a public meeting which has been publicly advertised, a meeting to which the public has been invited, and which is to discuss as one part of its business a proposal to demand the dismissal of the chief constable of the county. It is elementary that a good defence to an action for trespass is to show that the act complained of was done by authority of law. I am not at all prepared to accept the doctrine that it is only where an offence has been, or is being, committed that the police are entitled to enter and remain on private premises. On the contrary, it seems to me that a police officer has ex virtute officii full right so to act when he has reasonable ground for believing that an offence is imminent or is likely to be committed. I think, therefore, that the justices were right and that this appeal should be dismissed.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that it is very material in this case to observe that the meeting was described as a public meeting and that it is conceded that it was extensively advertised, the public being invited to attend it. There can be no doubt that the police officers who attended the meeting were members of the public and were included in that sense in the invitation to attend. It is true that those who had hired the hall for the meeting might withdraw that invitation from any particular individual who was likely to commit a breach of the peace or some other offence, but it is quite a different proposition to say that they might withdraw the invitation from police officers who might be there for the express purpose of preventing a breach of the peace or the commission of any offence.

With regard to the general question regarding the right of the police to attend the meeting notwithstanding the opposition of the promoters, I cannot help thinking that that right follows from the passage which counsel for the appellants relies on in Stone's Justices' Manual (1935, p. 208)*, where it is said that if a constable hears an affray in a house he may break in to suppress it, and may, in pursuit of an affrayer, break in to arrest him. If he can do that, I cannot doubt that he has a right to break in to prevent an affray which he has reasonable cause to suspect may take place on the premises. In other words, it comes within his duty as laid down by Blackstone (Commentaries (8th Edn.), vol. 1, p. 356) to keep the King's peace and to keep watch and ward. In my view, the right is correctly expressed in R. v. Queen's County Justices (4), where Fitzgerald, J., said (10 L.R.Ir. at p. 301):

> "The foundation of the jurisdiction [to bind persons over to be of good behaviour] is very remote, and probably existed prior to the statute of 1360–61; but whatever its foundation may be, or by whatever language conveyed, we are bound to regard and expound it by the light of immemorial practice and of decision, and especially of direct modern decisions. It may be described as a branch of preventive justice, in the exercise of which magistrates are invested with large judicial discretionary powers, for the maintenance of order and the preservation of the public peace."

That passage was expressly approved in Lansbury v. Riley (3), and its effect was expressed by Lord Alverstone, C.J., in Wise v. Dunning (5) ([1902] 1 K.B. at p. 175). In principle, I think that there is no distinction between the duty of a police-constable to prevent a breach of the peace and the power of a magistrate to bind persons to be of good behaviour to prevent a breach of the peace.

I am not impressed by the fact that many statutes have expressly given to police constables in certain circumstances the right to break open or to force an entrance into premises. Those are all cases in which a breach of the peace is not necessarily involved and express statutory authority is, therefore, required to empower the police to enter. In my opinion, no express statutory authority is necessary in a case where the police have reasonable ground to apprehend a breach of the peace, and in the present case I am satisfied that the justices had before them material on which they could properly hold that the police officers in question had reasonable ground for believing that, if they were not present, seditious speeches would be made and (or) that a breach of the peace would take place. To prevent any such breach of the peace the police were entitled to enter and to remain on the premises. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

LAWRENCE, J.—As my Lord has pointed out, our judgment proceeds on the particular facts of this case and on those facts I agree with the conclusion. I will only add that I am unable to follow the distinction which counsel for the appellant has drawn between the present matter and the cases which have been cited. If a constable in the execution of his duty in the preservation of the peace is entitled to commit an assault, it appears to me that he is equally entitled to commit a trespass.

Appeal dismissed.

EVANS v. EMPLOYERS MUTUAL INSURANCE ASSOCIATION, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Greer, Slesser and Roche, L.JJ.), May 7, 8, and 28, 1935]

[Reported [1936] 1 K.B. 505; 105 L.J.K.B. 141; 154 L.T. 137]

Insurance—Mis-statement in proposal form—Insurer's clerk informed of mis-statement by contents of claim form—Clerk's knowledge not communicated to management—Subsequent conduct of third-party negotiations by insurers—Right to repudiate policy.

The proposal form on which a policy insuring a motor car was based contained an untrue statement. An accident occurred which resulted in the insured making a claim under the policy for damage to the car and for liability which he had incurred to third parties. The fact that the statement was untrue came to the knowledge of a clerk in the employment of the insurance company when, in the course of his duty, he compared the proposal form with the claim form which the insured sent in at the insurance company's request, but the clerk wrongfully neglected to inform the claims superintendent, the servant of the company whose duty it was to decide whether to admit the claim.

The insurance company made payments to the insured in respect of the damage to his car and person, and thereupon, pursuant to the policy and with the assent of the insured, took on the conduct of the negotiations with and resistance to the claims of the third party. Subsequently, the claims superintendent became aware of the untruth of the statement in the proposal, and the insurance company repudiated liability. On a claim by the insured based on the policy, the insurance company contended that it did not know of the untruth of the statement until it was discovered by the claims superintendent.

Held: the insurance company was not entitled to repudiate liability because (i) the knowledge of the untruth acquired by the clerk in the course of his duty of comparing the forms was the knowledge of the company which had delegated that duty to him. Wing v. Harvey (1) (1854), 5 De G. Appeal from a decision of BRANSON, J., on a special case stated by an umpire, MR. SCHILLER, K.C. B

A policy of insurance on a motor car was based on a proposal form which contained the question:

> "(a) Will the car be solely driven by proposer or other named driver? If so, please give name," to which the insured answered "No"; and C

> "(b) For how long has proposer and proposer's driver (i) held a driving licence? (ii) had a practical experience of motor car driving?"

The insured answered "five years." This was, in fact, an untrue answer to both branches of the second question, since the insured had never previously held a driving licence, and his experience was limited to driving other people's cars on a few occasions. An accident took place during the currency of the policy, in which the car was damaged, D and as a result of which the insured became liable to third parties for injuries inflicted on them. The assured made a claim on the insurance company, and for that purpose filled up a claims form in which the question was asked: "How long have you driven a motor car?" to which the insured answered: "Six weeks." The claim form was received by one Mitchell, a clerk of the insurance company, whose duty it was to check the claims form with the proposal form, and he noticed the discrepancy, but did not communicate it to his superior officer, the claims inspector. E

A sum of £60 was then paid to the insured in settlement of the claim for damage to the car. Shortly afterwards, the claims inspector ascertained that the statement in the proposal form was untrue and repudiated the policy, and refused to pay the claim for third-party liability. It was contended for the insured that the company knew at all material dates that the answer to the question in the proposal form was untrue, and F that by paying the £60 they had affirmed the policy after becoming aware of the real facts, and were therefore estopped from now repudiating it.

The umpire accepted that contention, and made an award in favour of the insured, subject to this special case.

BRANSON, J., held that the company was not estopped by that payment from repudiating the policy or from refusing to admit the claim for third-party liability, since G the company was not affected with notice of mis-statement until it came to the knowledge of the person whose duty it was to determine, on behalf of the company, whether the claim should be admitted.

The insured appealed.

H. D. Samuels, K.C., and Roger Bacon for the insurers.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 28, 1935.—The following judgments were read:

GREER, L.J.—On Nov. 27, 1933, the appellant, Mr. R. S. Evans (hereinafter referred to as "the insured"), accompanied by his fiancée, Miss Comfort, and others, was driving his Morris Isis car, when he became involved in an accident which resulted in substantial I damage to his motor car, serious injuries to Miss Comfort, and slight injuries to the insured and his sister. We were told, and it was admitted, that third parties, including Miss Comfort, alleged that they had claims against the insured for damages for negligence, but the only finding in the case stated by the umpire with reference to this matter is contained in para. 30 of the case, where he says that the insured, on the faith of certain representations, which he found were made to him by the insurers' representatives, relinquished his right to deal with the matters arising out of the accident, and allowed the insurers to deal therewith. I think this is meant to include the fact that claims were put forward against the insured by Miss Comfort for personal injuries, and, as we were told, by the Holborn Borough Council and the London County Council, for damage to their property. At the time of the accident the insured had only been driving a motor car for six weeks, and had only held a licence as from the beginning of that period, that is to say, from some time in October, 1933. The insured had, on July 31, 1933, signed an application containing certain declarations in answer to questions put by the respondents (hereinafter referred to as "the insurers"). The only material question and answer to the proposal form is No. 2, which is as follows:

> "(a) Will the car(s) be solely driven by proposer or other named driver? If so, please give name.—No. (b) For how long has proposer and proposer's driver (i) held a driving licence? (ii) had a practical experience of motor-car driving?—five years."

With regard to the answer to this question, it is not very easy to say what the answer "five years" applies to. It does not seem to have been contended that it referred to the experience and length of the licence held by the proposer's driver, but to refer to the experience and length of licence of the insured. So understood, the answer, as the umpire has found, was definitely untrue for the reasons stated in the award. To prevent misunderstanding, I should say I do not consider the umpire's finding as being that it was consciously or intentionally untrue. At the date of the application the insured had had no experience of driving cars, except that he had occasionally driven friends' cars five years before the date on which he signed the proposal form, and that up to date he had never had a licence. The proposal form contained the usual statement that the declaration should be the basis of the contract between the insured and the insurers.

Pursuant to this application, the insurers issued to the insured their policy insuring him as therein stated as from July 31, 1933. The policy incorporated the statements contained in the proposal form as part of the contract, and provided that the truth of the statements and answers in the proposal form should be conditions precedent to any liability of the insurers to make any payments under the policy. Certain instructions to the policy-holder were endorsed on the policy, which called upon a policy-holder whose car sustained damage, or in cases where there were claims by third parties, to supply full particulars to the insurers of the occurrence on one of the insurers' "Particulars of Accident" forms.

On Nov. 30, 1933, one of the insurers' claims inspectors called on behalf of the insurers upon the insured, bringing with him a document which is headed: "Particulars of Claim Form. Particulars of Accident." This document, like the proposal form, contained a number of questions for the insured person to answer. In it the insured stated his name in full, and that he was the person driving at the time of the accident. In answer to the question: "How long have you been driving motors?" with the authority of the insured the inspector wrote, "Six weeks," and the insured signed the form, which is a document addressed to the insurers. When this form was read by an employee of the insurers who was authorised to deal with claims, it was at once understood as meaning that the insured's experience as a driver did not exceed six weeks, and that his statement in the proposal form that he had had five years' driving experience, and had held a licence for five years, was untrue. The claim form with particulars of accident was taken by Mr. Anderson, the claims superintendent mentioned above, to the insurers' head office in London, and given to a Mr. Morice, the insurers' claims superintendent. Before stating what happened to the claims form afterwards, it is worth noting that Mr. Anderson was definitely told by the insured that he had only been driving for six weeks, and that he had had no licence except the one he obtained in October at the beginning of the six weeks.

Mr. Anderson had, of course, not present to his mind, if he had ever seen them, the declarations contained in the proposal form, but I think it may be assumed that he visited the insured not merely with the object of having the claim form filled in, but with the object of ascertaining on behalf of the insurers whatever information he could obtain from the insured relevant to the question whether they should admit or dispute the claim. Be that as it may, it seems clear that the man to whom he gave the claim form, Mr. Morice, was an employee of the insurers authorised to receive the information contained in the form. According to the finding of the umpire he followed the usual practice of the insurers in handing the form to Mr. Mitchell, a clerk in the employ of the insurers, to check over the statements in the claim form with those contained in the proposal form, and to note any discrepancies between the proposal and claims forms. To do this was in the ordinary course of Mitchell's duty. Mitchell did notice this discrepancy but did not call attention to it because he did not consider it of importance. It seems obvious that the insured in stating his experience as only extending to six weeks was in all probability stating the truth, and not understating his experience, as it could not be in his interest to understate his experience. It seems to me involved in the findings of the umpire that the statements in the claim form interpreted by any reasonable person, when compared with the proposal form, meant that the statements in the proposal form were untrue in two respects, namely, that the insured had not had practical experience of motor car driving for five years, nor had he had a licence for five years. On Jan. 12, 1934, the insurers paid the insured £60 for damages to his car in accordance with the terms of the policy, and on Jan. 17, 1934, £10 1s. for the medical expenses of the insured and his sister. Thereafter they took upon themselves pursuant to condition No. 2 endorsed on the policy the conduct of all negotiations with the third parties for the purpose of settlement of or defence to their claims. On Feb. 22, 1934, Morice had an interview with a member of a firm of solicitors who were acting for Miss Comfort to discuss this lady's claim for damages against the insured. At the interview the solicitor for Miss Comfort stated that the insured was a reckless driver and had had very little experience of driving. After this interview Morice compared the claim form with the proposal form, became aware of the discrepancy between the two documents, and pointed it out to the general manager of the London office. The insurers then repudiated liability. It is to be observed that neither Mr. Morice nor the general manager had the slightest doubt that the statements in the claim form informed them, when they looked at the proposal form, that a condition precedent had been broken by the insured which entitled them to repudiate liability.

The above summary of the facts is taken from the special case stated by MR. SCHILLER, K.C., upon whom devolved the decision of this case under the arbitration clause contained in the policy. The umpire decided that the insurers could not repudiate their liability under the policy after having received the information they received through their agents, Anderson, Morice and Mitchell, and, notwithstanding that information, paid the insured and took to themselves the right of dealing with the third-party claim. The umpire does not use the word "waiver," but I think his decision amounts to a decision that by their conduct the insurers affirmed the policy after notice of the facts which entitled them to repudiate, and thereby waived their right to repudiate liability under the policy. The question he states for the court is whether his decision is correct, which necessarily means correct in law.

In my judgment, it is correct, or, to put it the other way, it is not wrong in law, for two reasons. First, I think the knowledge of Mitchell, to whom in the ordinary course of their business the insurers entrusted the duty of comparing the claim forms with the proposal forms so as to ascertain whether there was any discrepancy between them, fixes the insurers with the knowledge of that which came to the knowledge of Mr. Mitchell. Secondly, I think the award of the umpire was right because the insurers are not entitled in law to say that they were not aware of the contents of documents such as the proposal form and the claim form, which, at their request, the insured addressed to them. They must be treated as having received the information contained in these two documents, and they cannot be heard to say that they did not know their contents. A limited company cannot know anything itself except through its agents or servants. The knowledge which is to be attributed to a company must be the knowledge of some agent or servant. If there be no evidence that the company has delegated the ascertainment of relevant facts to some officer of the company, it may well be that nothing short of knowledge by the board of directors will bind the company. But the knowledge of the directors is attributed to the company because they are agents of the company to whom the duty of knowing the particular facts in question has been delegated by the company. If it be established by evidence that the duty of investigating and ascertaining the facts has been delegated in the ordinary course of the company's business to a subordinate official, the company will in law be bound by his knowledge for the same reasons that they are affected by the knowledge of the board of directors. In my judgment the umpire was entitled to infer from the facts found by him and stated in the special case that the insurers were bound by the knowledge obtained by Mr. Mitchell in carrying out the duties entrusted to him in the ordinary course of the conduct of the business of the insurers. It would be impossible for an insurance company's business to be carried on if they did not delegate to officials the duty of exercising their contractual rights in considering and deciding what course to take with reference to claims which have to be dealt with from day to day.

The decision of the umpire in favour of the insured can be supported on the above ground, and it is, therefore, in my judgment not incorrect in law either on the claim or counterclaim.

There is, moreover, an alternative ground on which the umpire's decision can be supported. The claim form was sent to the insurers by their own request. If the insured had written a letter to the insurers stating that he had only had six weeks' experience of driving motor cars at the date of the accident, after the insurers had asked him to send the information by letter, I am of the opinion that the insurers would be fixed with notice of the statements contained in the letter. The insurers could not say they had no knowledge of its contents because no authorised official read it.

The communication would be a communication to the insurers, and they could not in law be entitled to say they did not know the contents of the letter because it was handed over to the wrong official to consider and to deal with the information it contained. In the present case, the relevant information was not sent by letter, but was sent on a form addressed to the insurers which the insured undertook to send them in the case of immediate repairs being required, and which, in any event, he was instructed to send to the insurers by the instructions endorsed on the policy. I cannot think that the insurers can be allowed to deny knowledge of the contents of a document they asked the insured to fill up and send to them, on the ground, if such be the case, that the document was never read by the official authorised to read it and act on the information contained in it.

I have considered the authorities cited in argument in support of the insurers' case, but I do not think it necessary to refer to them except by saying that they have, in my judgment, no application to the present case, which falls to be decided on the special facts stated expressly or by implication in the special case. Some of the decisions afford definite support for the insured's contentions—see especially Wing v. Harvey (1). I have had an opportunity of reading Slesser, L.J.'s judgment, where the facts and the decision in Wing v. Harvey (1) are accurately summarised. Support can also be found for the present judgment in the words of Lord Dunedin in his speech in Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe, and Wills, Ltd. (2) ([1928] A.C. at p. 14).

The appeal will be allowed, with costs here and below, and the question put by the umpire will be answered by saying that his decision is correct in law.

SLESSER, L.J.—In this case the facts have been stated by my Lord, and I do not think it necessary to repeat them.

In my opinion, the fundamental question in this case is whether the knowledge which Mr. Mitchell acquired in comparing the claim form with the proposal form thereby became the knowledge of the insurers. It is true that in Houghton's Case (2) ([1928] A.C. at p. 18) Lord Sumner points out that > "the mind, so to speak, of a company is not reached or affected by information merely possessed by its clerks. . . . the knowledge, which is relevant, is that of directors themselves, since it is their board that deals with the company's rights."

But it must depend upon the facts of each case, where the matter is not specially determined by the articles, by what particular means of information and in what circumstances a company may properly be said to acquire knowledge, or have knowledge thrust upon them.

A In this case, as to the two documents themselves, the proposal form and the claim form, it cannot in any view be said that the insurance company did not know their several contents, since both were addressed to the insurance company; but the correlation of the two leading to discrepancy and consequent falsity of the insured's statement, depended solely upon the investigations of Mr. Mitchell. Now, Mr. Mitchell was not a mere clerk. It was his specific duty to do the very act of comparison which here resulted in his ascertainment of the conflict between the insured's two statements. B He carried out his duty and he made the comparison, and the fact that he did not think fit to convey the information so obtained to Mr. Morice or Mr. Last, who were the persons who properly decided that the insurance company should deal with the matter, does not enable the insurance company, in my judgment, to deny that they were bound by the knowledge which he obtained in carrying out the duties entrusted to him, albeit negligently performed, by the insurance company through Mr. Morice. C The history of the dealings between Anderson and Evans points to the same conclusion.

In Newsholme Brothers v. Road Transport and General Insurance Co., Ltd. (3) ([1929] 2 K.B. at p. 374) SCRUTTON, L.J., quoting LORD SUMNER, says:

> "The knowledge of a person who acquires it in breach of duty and is guilty of a breach of duty, in respect to it, is not to be imputed to a company to whom, from the hypothesis, he would be very unlikely to disclose it in fact." D

In this case, so far from acquiring the knowledge in breach of duty, Mr. Mitchell acquired it in the course of his duty and, but for an erroneous estimate of its significance, he would, in the ordinary course of his work, have communicated it to Mr. Morice or Mr. Last, who were the persons, as I have said, who were competent and in fact decided on behalf of the insurance company to maintain the action in place of the insured. E I think that the knowledge of Mr. Mitchell must be imputed to Mr. Morice, to Mr. Last and to the insurance company, and that the insurance company cannot escape merely because Mr. Mitchell was negligent in the performance of it. If Mr. Morice had such imputed knowledge, it follows, as the learned umpire has found, that he, with such knowledge of the untruth, on behalf of the insurers affirmed the policy after the insurers had notionally become aware of the true facts, F and if the insured, with the matters arising out of the accident, thereupon relinquished his rights to deal and allowed the insurers to deal with them by subrogation or otherwise, the insurers are precluded from repudiating their liability (see Bentsen v. Taylor, Sons & Co. (4), per BOWEN, L.J., [1893] 2 Q.B. at p. 283).

The case of Forder v. Great Western Rail. Co. (5), was, as LORD ALVERSTONE said, "very near the line," but KENNEDY, J. ([1905] 2 K.B. at p. 537), G speaking of the knowledge to be imputed to a railway company by acts of its officials, says:

> "In my opinion, the knowledge which is necessary . . . must be knowledge on the part, not of some official of the company . . . but of the person who under the rules of the company is engaged in, or entrusted with the control of, the transaction. . . ."

H The case was dealing with misconduct, but his opinion fortifies my view that once it was established that Mr. Mitchell was so performing his duty, the insurance company acquired the knowledge which he obtained notwithstanding the fact that he did not think it worth while to communicate the information which he had acquired to his superiors.

The case of Wing v. Harvey (1) is also in point. There, the agent of an insurance company received payments from a gentleman outside Europe without objection, I though there was a clause in the policy making it void if the assured went beyond the limits of Europe without licence. The assignee of the policy, on paying the premium to a local agent at the place where the assurance had been effected, informed him that the assured was resident in Canada; the agent stated that this would not avoid the policy and received the premiums until the assured died. The office in London received the money in their turn, without having notice of the assured's residence beyond the prescribed limits. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., was of opinion that whether the agent did or did not inform them in fact of the true state of circumstances in which the premiums were paid to him, the directors became and were as much bound as if the premiums had been paid directly to themselves, they knowing at the time, on each occasion, the place of the assured's residence. And Turner, L.J., was of opinion that "the office was affected with notice of the absence of (the assured) beyond the boundaries limited by the policies."

For these reasons I agree with Greer, L.J., that this appeal must be allowed and the award of the learned arbitrator upheld.

ROCHE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be allowed. We are differing from the view of the learned judge and are holding that the contrary view of the learned legal arbitrator was right in law. It is therefore clear that the points involved are of some difficulty and nicety, and I propose to state shortly, in my own way, the views which lead me to the conclusion that the arbitrator was right, and that the judge should have so held.

The provisions in the contract of insurance as to the truth of the statements in the proposal made by the insured were of unilateral operation in favour of the insurance company, and could be waived by that company: (see Wing v. Harvey (1)). In the case of Bentsen v. Taylor, Sons & Co. (4), Bowen, L.J., stated the principles governing waiver in such a case, in language that is to be found [1893] 2 Q.B. at p. 283, and has often been quoted with approval, as follows:

> "In order to succeed, the plaintiff must show, either that he has performed the condition precedent, the onus being on him, or that the defendants have excused the performance of the condition, and we have to consider whether the plaintiff has sustained that burthen, so that no reasonable man could doubt that there had been a waiver of the condition or an excuse of its performance. In other words, did the defendants by their acts or conduct lead the plaintiff reasonably to suppose that they did not intend to treat the contract for the future as at an end, on account of the failure to perform the condition precedent, but that they only intended to rely on the misdescription as a breach of warranty, treating the contract as still open for further performance? Did the defendants lead the plaintiff to believe that they intended to treat the misdescription as a breach of contract only, and not as a failure to perform a condition precedent?"

The arbitrator has found in the present case in para. 30 the following facts:

> "On these contentions I hold that the insured was right in his argument that the insurers in fact at all material times had knowledge that the answer to Question 2 (b) of the proposal was untrue, that this knowledge being possessed by their servants who were deputed to receive it, namely, Anderson and Mitchell, must be imputed to the insurance company, and I hold therefore that the insurers affirmed the policy after becoming aware of the true facts, and that they, by their conduct, represented that the policy was a valid policy, and that the insured on the faith of such representation relinquished his right to deal with the matters arising out of the accident and allowed the insurers to deal therewith, and that the insurers are precluded from repudiating their liability under the policy."

The facts so found by the arbitrator in law justified his conclusion, unless he was not justified in law in arriving at that part of his finding which refers to and finds knowledge of the true facts on the part of the insurance company. In my opinion, he was so justified, and the insurance company had the necessary knowledge.

Certain material questions contained in the claim form were directed to ascertaining whether the statements in the proposal form were true. The answers stated the truth and showed that the statements in the proposal form were untrue in the sense that they were inaccurate. I agree with my Lord that if such information is invited by a company and is given and communicated to that company in the manner invited, that fact alone would be sufficient.

But in this case the matter does not rest there. There are further findings of the arbitrator which make the matter even plainer. It was conceded that if the matter came to the notice of Mr. Morice that was sufficient. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider any question of the directors' knowledge, and for other reasons I do not deem it to be necessary to consider Mr. Anderson's knowledge. As to Mr. Morice, the answers of the insured in the claim form came to his knowledge in the sense that he knew that the questions were answered, but he deputed, as was his practice and proper practice, the ascertainment of the nature and effect of the answers and the existence of discrepancies, if any, between the proposal and claims forms, to his clerk, Mitchell. Mitchell obtained the necessary knowledge, but he failed to appreciate its importance, or to pass it on, as he ought to have done, to his superior, Mr. Morice. The insurance company therefore acquired the knowledge through the very person appointed to acquire it, and, if it failed to use it, the failure was due to that person's default. Cases in which knowledge was acquired by a company for other purposes and by other persons than those concerned with the particular matter under inquiry, have no application to the present case: (see Houghton's Case (2), per Lord Sumner in the passage already cited by Slesser, L.J.). The test is well laid down by Lord Dunedin in the same case ([1928] A.C. at p. 14) as follows: The knowledge of the company can only be the knowledge of persons who are entitled to represent the company. It may be assumed that the knowledge of directors is in ordinary circumstances the knowledge of the company. The knowledge of a mere official like the secretary would only be the knowledge of the company if the thing of which knowledge is predicated was a thing within the ordinary domain of the secretary's duties.

In this case, this matter which was under discussion was in the ordinary domain of the duties of Mr. Morice and Mr. Mitchell, and the responsibilities with regard to it were distributed between them in the manner I have above stated. To depute and refer to subordinates matters of detail is essential for the conduct of business on any large scale by companies or others, and, if an official of a company, such as Mr. Morice, does properly depute any matter to a subordinate and the subordinate deals with it, it is as if Mr. Morice dealt with it for himself, and the same consequences follow in the one case as in the other.

In my judgment, the consequence here is that the arbitrator's decision that the insured was entitled to succeed was right, and the appeal should, therefore, be allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

MANCHESTER CORPORATION v. MARKLAND

[House of Lords (Lords Atkin, Tomlin, Thankerton, Wright and Alness), June 4, 6, and July 8, 1935]

Water Supply—Duties and liabilities of undertakers—Duty to obtain information as to leaks in pipe—Burst pipe—Leakage to road above—Freezing of water—Resultant skidding of motor car three days after burst—Burst still unknown to undertakers—Reliance on local authority officers for information—Whether duty to take all reasonable precautions discharged.

On Feb. 9, 1933, a burst occurred in a water undertakers' service pipe and water escaped and formed a pool in the road beneath which the pipe ran. The pool was frozen by a severe frost at about 8 p.m. on Feb. 11, 1933. Later that night, and before the burst came to the knowledge of the undertakers, the frozen pool caused a car to skid, without any negligence by the driver, and to knock down and kill the plaintiff's husband. Apart from periodic routine inspections involving a visit to any given spot about once in nine days, the undertakers did nothing to secure prompt notification of bursts in the area, but relied on the officials of the local highway authorities, in their own interests, to inform them of any leakages. On appeal against judgment for the plaintiff in a claim under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, the undertakers contended (i) that this reliance on the local authorities discharged the undertakers' duty to take all reasonable precautions to secure that leaks in their system should be brought to their knowledge and repaired with promptitude, and (ii) that the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed because she had failed to show what steps the undertakers should have taken to discharge this duty.

Held: the appeal should be dismissed because (i) the steps taken were unreliable and unco-ordinated methods of receiving information, which without any precautions being taken by the undertakers on their own part, did not discharge the duty above referred to; (ii) the plaintiff proved negligence by showing that, apart from the routine inspections, the matter was left to chance, and that, in this particular instance, no notice of the burst was given to the undertakers until at least three days after it happened.

Notes. The freezing of the water in this case was a danger which the undertakers should have anticipated. For a case in which the danger resulting from a leak was not one which the undertakers should have anticipated, and for which they were, therefore, not liable, see Longhurst v. Metropolitan Water Board, [1948] 2 All E.R. 834. As to the duty of undertakers with regard to bursts and leaks in pipes, see 33 Halsbury's Laws (2nd Edn.) 440, para. 720. As to the degree of care in making inquiries which is required in ordinary circumstances, see 23 Halsbury's Laws (2nd Edn.) 573–4, para. 826, text and note (q).

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Slesser, L.J., and Talbot, J.; Scrutton, L.J., dissenting) affirming the decision of Macnaghten, J., without a jury at Manchester Assizes.

The plaintiff, Rose Ethel Markland, sued the water undertakers, Manchester Corporation, for damages for negligence under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, which negligence she averred caused the death of her husband. The material facts were as follows: On Saturday, Feb. 11, 1933, one Bamford, who was a co-defendant of the undertakers, was driving a motor car at night when his car skidded into the rear of a tramcar at Eccles, near Manchester, from which the deceased man was descending, and killed him. The judge found that Bamford was driving properly and reduced his speed when he saw that the tramcar was about to stop to set down passengers, but his wheel came into contact with a sheet of ice which caused the car to become unmanageable and that the presence of this sheet of ice was the cause of the accident. The ice had admittedly been produced through the road having been flooded from a burst in the service pipe running beneath the road through which the undertakers, who were the statutory water authority, supplied the district with water. The burst had occurred three days previously. The negligence alleged was that the undertakers ought to have known that the water-main was leaking and causing water to run over the surface of the roadway and that, in view of the coldness of the weather, the water was likely to freeze and cause ice to form in the roadway, and that they failed to take any reasonably sufficient steps to prevent this happening.

Macnaghten, J., freed the owner of the motor car from liability, but he found that the undertakers were negligent in not knowing of the burst and flooding before the accident, with the consequence that they negligently took no steps to render the roadway safe for persons using it.

In the Court of Appeal it was held by Slesser, L.J., and Talbot, J.; Scrutton, L.J., dissenting, that the learned judge was justified and was right, on the evidence, in coming to the conclusion that the undertakers had failed to discharge the duty which rested upon them. They did not do that which a reasonable authority ought to have done and failed to take reasonable precautions against an obvious and known danger.

The undertakers appealed.

Stuart Bevan, K.C., T. Eastham, K.C., and Harold Rhodes for the defendant corporation, the water undertakers.

William Gorman, K.C., and G. Jessel Rycroft for the plaintiff, the widow, were not called upon to argue.

The House took time for consideration.

July 8. LORD ATKIN.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Tomlin. I entirely agree with it and have nothing to add.

LORD TOMLIN read the following opinion:—I am authorised to say that my noble and learned friends Lord Thankerton, Lord Wright and Lord Alness concur in the opinion I am about to deliver. In this case the plaintiff sued the undertakers and one William Bamford under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, for damages for loss sustained by her by reason of the death of her husband. He had been killed in an accident occurring in circumstances which I will shortly narrate.

The accident happened on the main road running between Salford towards the north-west and Bolton towards the south-east.

About 50 ft. or 60 ft. southward of the point on this road where the accident happened the boundary between the urban district of Worsley towards the north and the borough of Eccles towards the south crosses the road at right angles.

The highway authority immediately north of this boundary is the Urban District Council of Worsley and immediately south of this boundary is the Corporation of the Borough of Eccles.

Along the length of this road runs an electric tram line owned and operated by the Corporation of Salford. The Lancashire county police have jurisdiction in the neighbourhood of the accident.

The districts through which the road runs are outside the city of Manchester, but within the area of supply of the defendant corporation as water undertakers under the Manchester Corporation Waterworks Act, 1897, and the Acts incorporated therewith and amending the same, and as such undertakers the corporation own (inter alia) a 5-inch main running the length of the road on its easternmost side and the service pipes connecting such main with the adjoining houses on each side of the road.

At about 11.15 p.m. on Saturday, Feb. 11, 1933, the deceased descended from the rear of a tram car which was travelling towards Salford and had stopped at a point with its rear end about fifty ft. or sixty ft. north of the boundary already mentioned.

While still holding the rail of the car he was struck by a motor car driven by Bamford and also travelling towards Salford.

The deceased died from his injuries shortly after the accident.

The action was tried at Manchester by Macnaghten, J., sitting without a jury.

The facts as found by the learned judge were in effect as follows: (1) on Thursday, Feb. 9, 1933, a burst occurred in the lead service pipe of the undertakers leading from the five-inch main to two houses on the west side of the road to the south of the point where the accident happened; (2) as the result of the burst, water was forced up on the surface of the road and formed a pool extending northwards towards the site of the accident; (3) this state of things continued all Thursday, Friday and Saturday, Feb. 9, 10 and 11; (4) about 8 o'clock on Saturday evening, Feb. 11, there was a sudden and severe frost which froze the pool; and (5) the skidding of Bamford's car on the ice thus formed was the immediate cause of the accident.

The learned judge held that there was no want of care on the part of Bamford and that the action failed against him. There was no appeal against this conclusion.

With regard to the undertakers the particulars of negligence alleged that they (1) caused and (or) permitted a certain water-main the property of the undertakers to flood the roadway with water in such a manner as to render the roadway dangerous for traffic proceeding thereon; (2) knew or ought to have known that the water-main was leaking and causing water to run over the surface of the roadway and knew or ought to have known that in view of the coldness of the weather the water was likely to freeze and cause a sheet of ice to form in the roadway to the danger of traffic proceeding thereon and failed to take any or any reasonably sufficient steps to prevent this happening and (or) to warn traffic using the roadway of the said danger or otherwise to provide for the safety of persons lawfully using the roadway.

The learned judge held that there was no ground for alleging any negligence or want of care against the undertakers either in the laying of the pipe which burst or in the maintenance of that pipe, and that, therefore, the case made against them under the first head of the particulars failed.

Upon the second head of the particulars the learned judge held that it was incumbent upon the undertakers to take all reasonable steps to inform themselves of bursts in the pipes of their system and to effect prompt repairs and that they had failed to discharge that duty in the present case and were liable to the plaintiff for the result of their negligence.

By consent an order was made for payment by the undertakers to the plaintiff in lieu of a lump sum for damages of the sum of £2 10s. per week during her widowhood.

On appeal by the undertakers the Court of Appeal by a majority (Scrutton, L.J., dissenting) affirmed the learned judge. Scrutton, L.J., took the view that what occurred was due to a failure of the undertakers' precautions or sources of warning, and was not a failure due to negligence.

It is not disputed that the undertakers have a duty to take all reasonable precautions to secure that leaks in their system should be brought to their knowledge and repaired with promptitude. The question is whether they failed in that duty in the present case.

The undertakers' area of supply extends considerably beyond the boundaries of the city of Manchester and into districts in which the highways, the police and transport undertakings such as tramways are under the control of other bodies. The area of supply is 130 square miles in extent. It contains 1,250 miles of mains and 200 miles of lead service pipes. There are said to be an average of about fifty bursts a week.

Now what is it that the undertakers did to secure that in districts outside the city bursts in their pipes should be promptly made known to them? They had certain periodical examinations and tests made at the various stopcocks and hydrants, involving a visit to any given spot about once in nine days, but beyond this they did nothing. I adopt the words of Talbot, J. ([1934] 1 K.B. at p. 505):

> ". . . but as to anything more they rely entirely on the chance that some policeman > or road officer or other servant of another authority, or some householder or other person may give them information." A

This was a system or want of system which the undertakers' own officer, Mr. Dalton, did not apparently regard as satisfactory.

It is said on the undertakers' behalf that the interest of the several authorities outside the city, to see that no damage is done to the roadways within their several districts and that no loss or inconvenience is occasioned to the inhabitants, is so strong as to make it B reasonable on the part of the undertakers to trust to the officials of such authorities to communicate to them news of leakages.

I do not think so. I agree with SLESSER, L.J., that the learned judge was fully entitled to come to the conclusion that these precarious, unreliable and unco-ordinated methods of receiving information did not exonerate the undertakers. C

If the undertakers choose to rely upon the chance of being kept informed by the outside means which I have indicated without taking any precautions on their own part and that chance fails them, they cannot be heard to say that they have discharged their duty.

It is contended, however, that the plaintiff was bound to show what steps the undertakers ought to have taken. I do not agree. It is obvious that there are many things D which might reasonably have been done to secure to the undertakers early notice of any burst. It is, in my opinion, enough for the plaintiff to have shown, as she has shown here, that apart from the routine examinations which I have mentioned the matter was left to chance, and that in the particular case no notice of the burst was given to the undertakers until at least three days after the burst happened.

I think that upon the material before him the trial judge was fully entitled to reach E the conclusion he did. In my opinion his conclusion was the right one, and this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SIMPSON (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. GRANGE TRUST, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Atkin, Lord Tomlin, Lord Russell, Lord Macmillan and Lord Wright), February 25, 26, and March 15, 1935]

Income Tax—Reliefs—Investment company—Restriction of relief—Management expenses—Restriction of relief by reference to tax payable if company charged to tax under Case I of Sched. D—Company not chargeable under Case I of Sched. D—Application of restriction—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), s. 33 (1).

A company carried on the business of an investment trust company, and was not carrying on a trade the profits of which were assessable to tax under Case I of Sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. The receipts of the company's business, being derived from shares and bonds and from interest on State and municipal loans, were taxed by deduction of the income tax from its dividends and interest. The management expenses of the company for the year ended April 5, 1932, amounted to £2,294, and the company claimed repayment under s. 33 (1) of the Act of 1918 of £573 10s., being the tax at 5s. in the pound on £2,294. The inspector of taxes, in reliance on proviso (a) to s. 33 (1), objected to the claim for relief on the ground that the amount of tax paid by the company was less than the tax which would have been paid if the profits had been charged under Case I, Sched. D, and that proviso (a) to s. 33 (1) applied to all companies seeking relief under that sub-section.

Held: proviso (a) to s. 33 (1) applied only where an assessment under Case I of Sched. D, though not in fact made, could properly have been made, and, therefore, since the company was not so assessable, it was not excluded by proviso (a) from relief under s. 33 (1).

Notes. The Income Tax Act, 1918, was repealed by the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 527. See s. 425 of the latter Act, which replaced s. 33 (1)–(3) of the Act of 1918.

As to restriction of relief in respect of expenses of management, see 20 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 475, para. 903; and for cases on the subject, see DIGEST SUPP., tit. Income Tax.

Appeal by the Crown from the decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HANWORTH, M.R., SLESSER and ROMER, L.JJ.) on a Case Stated under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 33 (2), and s. 149, by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

The Case stated as follows:

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on Dec. 15, 1932, they heard the claim of the Grange Trust, Ltd., hereinafter called "the company," for relief under s. 33 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the year 1931–32, in respect of its expenses of management.

2. The company's claim for relief under s. 33 had been objected to by the inspector of taxes on the ground that proviso (a) of s. 33 (1), applied to this claim, and that as a result no relief was due.

The relevant provisions of s. 33 (1) are as follows:

> "(1) Where an assurance company carrying on life assurance business, or any company whose business consists mainly in the making of investments and the principal part of whose income is derived therefrom or any savings bank or other bank for savings, claims and proves to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners that for any year of assessment it has been charged to tax by deduction or otherwise and has not been charged in respect of its profits in accordance with the rules applicable to Case I of Sched. D, the company or bank shall be entitled to repayment of so much of the tax paid by it as is equal to the amount of the tax on any sums disbursed as expenses of management (including commissions) for that year: Provided that (a) relief shall not be given under this section so as to make the tax paid by the company or bank less than the tax which would have been paid if the profits had been charged in accordance with the said rules."

3. The company, which was incorporated in 1926, carried on the business of an investment trust company. It was admitted by the inspector of taxes that the company was not carrying on a trade, the profits of which were assessable under Case I of Sched. D.

4. The company's year of account ends on May 31. The management expenses of the company for the year ended April 5, 1932, arrived at by aggregating one-sixth of the expenses for the year ended May 31, 1931, and five-sixths of the expenses for the year ended May 31, 1932, amounted to £2,294, and the company's claim was for repayment of the sum of £573 10s., being the tax at 5s. in the £, on £2,294.

5. The receipts of the company were derived from shares and bonds of English and foreign companies, and from interest on State and municipal loans. Nearly the whole of the receipts were taxed by deduction. The greater part of such receipts fell within the charge under Sched. D, but about fifteen per cent. fell under Sched. C.

6. If the company's profits had been charged in accordance with the rules applicable to Case I of Sched. D, on the basis of no tax having been deducted at the source, the amount of the tax which would have been paid for the year 1931–32, based on the profits for the company's year ended on May 31, 1930, would have been tax on a sum of £48,048. The amount of tax actually paid by the company (by deduction and by direct assessment) for the year ended April 5, 1932, computed by taking one-sixth of the tax so paid for the year ended May 31, 1931, and five-sixths of the tax so paid for the year ended April 5, 1932, amounted to tax on a sum of £42,159.

7. The inspector of taxes had objected to the claim on the ground that the amount of tax paid by the company was less than the tax which would have been paid if the profits had been charged in accordance with the rules applicable to Case I of Sched. D.

8. It was contended on behalf of the company:

(1) That under the decision in the case of The Rosyth Building and Estates Co., Ltd. v. Rogers (1), proviso (a) of s. 33 (1), could only be applied to the claim of a company, the profits of which the Crown was entitled to charge under Case I of Sched. D;

(2) That this company was admittedly not chargeable under Case I of Sched. D;

(3) That proviso (a) did not apply to the claim of the company;

(4) That even if proviso (a) applied, the hypothetical assessment ought to be based on the company's profits for the year to May 31, 1931, corresponding to the income tax year 1931–32, and not on its profits for the year to May 31, 1930, corresponding to the income tax year 1930–31;

(5) That in the alternative if proviso (a) did apply, the only profits of the company which would be chargeable in accordance with the rules of Case I of Sched. D, were the profits which were not chargeable under any other schedule, and had not been already charged by deduction; and

(6) That the claim should be allowed.

9. It was contended on behalf of the inspector of taxes:

(1) (a) That on a true construction of s. 33 (1), proviso (a) applied to all companies and banks which claimed repayment under its provisions, whether the profits of such companies or banks were assessable to tax under Case I or otherwise;

(b) That accordingly the said proviso applied to the present claim;

(2) That the tax which would have been paid if the profits had been charged in accordance with the said rules (i.e., the rules applicable to Case I of Sched. D) was tax on the profits of the company for the year ended May 31, 1930, in accordance with the Income Tax Act, 1918, Sched. D, rule applicable to Case I and the Finance Act, 1926, ss. 29 and 34;

(3) (a) That such last-mentioned amount of tax was tax on a sum of £48,048, arrived at as set out in para. 6 above;

(b) That accordingly as the tax which had been paid by the company (i.e., tax on £42,159—see para. 6 above) was less than the tax on £48,048, no relief was due to the company;

(4) Alternatively to (3) above that if in calculating the amount of "tax which would have been paid if the profits had been charged in accordance with the said rules"—for whatever year such tax had to be calculated—the profits of the company were to be arrived at by excluding from the computation receipts taxed by deduction, "the tax which would have been paid" by the company would be the tax on the profits as so computed together with the tax deducted from its interest and dividends, and that the aggregate of these amounts would be greater than the tax actually paid by the company for the year 1931–32; and

(5) That the claim should be refused.

10. Having considered the arguments the commissioners gave the following decision:

> "(1) The view held by the Court of Session in the case of The Rosyth Building and Estates Co., Ltd. v. Rogers (1) that in order that proviso (a) of s. 33 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, may operate the company must be capable of assessment under Case I of Sched. D, was left untouched by the observations made on that case in the case of Fry v. Salisbury House Estates, Ltd. (2).
> "The company is admittedly not assessable under Case I of Sched. D, and consequently, following the view of the court in the Rosyth Case (1), we hold that the proviso cannot be applied in this case.
> "We accordingly allow the claim in principle.
> "(2) If we are wrong in this opinion, and what is required by the proviso is a notional assessment under Case I of Sched. D, whether the company is capable of assessment under that case or not, we hold that that notional assessment must include the whole profits of the company irrespective of the schedule under which they are actually taxed, and must be computed on the previous year's profits in the manner laid down in the rules of Case I.
> "Even if this is not so, the 'tax which would have been paid' by the company includes in our opinion not only the tax which would have been paid under the notional Case I assessment but also that paid by the company by deduction or under the other cases or schedules."

11. The commissioners requested that if they were wrong on both (1) and (2) above the case be remitted to them for consideration of the figures in accordance with the judgment of the court.

12. The appellant, the inspector of taxes, immediately after the determination of the appeal, declared to the commissioners his dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law, and in due course required them to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 33 (2), and s. 149.

The Court of Appeal held, affirming the decision of FINLAY, J., that, this company not carrying on a trade and having nearly all its income taxed by deduction, there would be great difficulty in applying the rules to Case I in such a case, and, further, to do as the Crown suggested would be to do what the House of Lords in Ormond Investment Co. v. Betts (3) had said ought not to be done.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and R. P. Hills for the appellant, the inspector of taxes.

Latter, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the respondent, the company.

The House took time for consideration.

March 15. LORD ATKIN.—I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend LORD WRIGHT, and I entirely agree with it and have nothing to add.

I am asked to say that my noble and learned friend, Lord Tomlin, also agrees with it.

LORD RUSSELL.—I find myself in the same position and have nothing to add to the opinion about to be read by my noble and learned friend, LORD WRIGHT.

LORD MACMILLAN.—I also agree.

LORD WRIGHT.—The question in this appeal is whether the respondent, which for purposes of this case is admitted (whether rightly or not need not be here considered) to be a non-trading company, is excluded by proviso (a) to s. 33 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, from the relief in respect of management expenses to which under s. 33 (1), they are primâ facie entitled; or to state the question in another form, whether proviso (a) applies to non-trading companies.

It may be convenient to set out the material parts of s. 33 (1), which are as follows:

> "Where an assurance company carrying on life assurance business, or any company whose business consists mainly in the making of investments, and the principal part of whose income is derived therefrom, or any savings bank or other bank for savings, claims and proves to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners that, for any year of assessment, it has been charged to tax by deduction or otherwise, and has not been charged in respect of its profits in accordance with the rules applicable to Case I of Schedule D, the company or bank shall be entitled to repayment of so much of the tax paid by it as is equal to the amount of the tax on any sums disbursed as expenses of management (including commissions) for that year: Provided that: (a) relief shall not be given under this section so as to make the tax paid by the company or bank less than the tax which would have been paid if the profits had been charged in accordance with the said rules; and (b) the amount of any fines, fees, or profits arising from reversions in the case of an assurance company, and, in the case of any other company or any such bank, the amount of any income or profits derived from sources not charged to tax, shall be deducted from the amount treated as expenses of management for the year."

The section reproduced s. 14 (1) of the Finance Act, 1915, which first gave relief in such cases. An ordinary trading company assessed on the balance of its profits and gains for the year under Sched. D, Case I, is entitled in order to arrive at the balance to an allowance for outlays incurred for the purpose of earning its profits: the companies or concerns enumerated in s. 33 (1), whose income is in the main taxed by deduction, would be placed at a disadvantage if no allowance was made to them for management expenses.

The respondent is a limited company incorporated in 1926; it is conceded for purposes of this case that it has been at all material times a company within the description in s. 33 (1), as being a company "whose business consists mainly in the making of investments and the principal part of whose income is obtained therefrom." Its income has been almost entirely derived from shares and bonds of English and foreign companies and from interest on State and municipal loans, and nearly the whole of these receipts have been taxed by deduction. The greater part of these receipts from investments have been chargeable under Sched. D, but about fifteen per cent. have been chargeable under Sched. C. During the material period the respondent has not been charged under Case I of Sched. D, and it is conceded for the purposes of this case that it is not chargeable under that case.

The fiscal year in respect of which relief is claimed is 1931–32; the respondent's net income during that fiscal year amounted to £42,159; the actual receipts were almost entirely derived from the sources enumerated above, but there were in addition some other small items, namely, bank interest amounting to £20 in all, separately assessed under Case III of Sched. D, and certain underwriting commissions amounting to £200, which sum was assessed under Case VI of Sched. D. The actual receipts from investments for the fiscal year, all of which were taxed at the source, came to £45,356, but from the sum of these and the other receipts there was deducted interest paid to the bank amounting to £3,417, giving £42,159 as the net figure of income.

The respondent's expenses of management for the same period came to £2,294. The respondent accordingly claimed under the section repayment of £573 10s. as being the tax on £2,294 at 5s. in the £ of these expenses.

The appellant resisted this claim on the ground that it was barred by proviso (a). The respondent's taxed income for the previous fiscal year 1930–31 had amounted to £48,048; it has been found by the commissioners that if the respondent's profits for 1931–32 had been assessed as profits of a trade under Sched. D, Case I, on the basis of no tax having been deducted at the source, the amount of tax which would have been paid for that year (which would have been, so it is said, assessed under the rules of Case I, as amended by s. 29 of the Finance Act, 1926, on the profits of the preceding year) would have been a tax on £48,048, whereas the actual tax paid was tax on £42,159 only. Hence, it was said, proviso (a) came into force so that no relief could be granted, because the tax that was paid was less than the tax which would have been paid under the Rules of Case I. Such was the argument.

In the case of a trading company which comes within the terms of s. 33 (1), the Crown has an option where more than one case of Sched. D is applicable, to elect to tax under the case which is most advantageous to it, though the Crown cannot elect as between different schedules (Fry v. Salisbury House Estates, Ltd. (2)). An illustration of the Crown's right to elect between cases of Sched. D is furnished by Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co. v. Bennett (4), where it was held by this House that in regard to an assurance company the Crown could elect to tax under Sched. D, Case I, interest collected abroad, even though not received in this country; the company was a trader and the interest on its invested funds was a part of the profits of its business because these investments were made in the ordinary course of its business as an insurance company and for the purpose of that business. In such a case the company might come within s. 33 (1), provided that it had not in fact been taxed in respect of any of its profits in that year under the rules of Case I, and hence in proper cases proviso (a) would apply to it. Even in a case where the profits of the company had been in fact charged under some other case of Sched. D, yet as the particular profits might have been assessed under Case I, it would in these conditions be easy to calculate what tax it would have paid if it had been charged under the rules of Case I. Such an assessment may be described as a notional assessment.

But a different state of things arises where, as in the present case, the company, though answering one of the descriptions contained in s. 33 (1), is not a trading company. Since it is a non-trading company, the Crown has no option to assess it under Case I or the rules of that case; it can only be taxed normally by deduction in respect of its invested funds under whatever other cases of Sched. D are appropriate, that is Cases III, IV, or V, or under Sched. C; if it has also some other receipts, these will generally be taxed under the relevant cases or schedules. Case I is limited to profits of a trade and the respondent ex hypothesi carries on no trade. Hence it follows that what is called the "notional assessment," if it can be made at all, must be something which not only had not in fact been made but could not ever according to income tax law have been made at all: the respondent could not legally be charged in accordance with the rules of Case I of Sched. D, nor could it ever pay any tax under these rules. Not only has the actual tax paid been outside the rules of Case I, but the Crown has never been entitled to elect to assess under these rules. It would seem, therefore, that while the respondent has a right primâ facie to the benefit of s. 33 (1), that right is not affected by proviso (a), which by its very terms can only be applied to a case in which, if the Crown had so elected, tax could have been paid and charged under the rules of Case I. In my opinion proviso (a) in its true construction is restricted to cases where tax would have been paid in fact under a legal assessment. The postulated assessment is one which is not only notional as regards the fact, but as to the legal possibility.

The appellant contends for a different construction: he contends that proviso (a) on its true construction requires a "notional assessment" even though the income is not taxable under Case I, an assessment in which all the receipts are deemed to be A profits of a trade and the balance is to be arrived at by some computation of allowances corresponding as far as possible to the allowances under the rules applicable to Case I of Sched. D. But I do not think the words of proviso (a) are susceptible of such a construction. The word "profits" in s. 33 (1) clearly means trade "profits" chargeable under Case I, and I think in proviso (a) "profits" must have the same meaning. But, furthermore, clear words would, in my opinion, be necessary to justify a fictitious B assessment so arbitrary and so far removed from the provisions of the income tax law. This construction would mean re-writing Case I, so that Case I, which is limited expressly to trades, should be notionally applied to what is not a trade at all; but, even if that were done, it would be impossible to apply in the notional assessment the rules which are applicable to Cases I and II. Thus r. (1) of these rules prescribes that tax shall be charged "without any other deduction than is by this Act allowed." Rule (3) says C that no sums shall be deducted unless for "money wholly or exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade"; this express limitation to "the trade" is repeated in respect of all the allowances permitted under that rule. I need not give further instances to show that the rules applicable to Case I cannot be applied as they stand to the receipts of non-traders, such as the respondents. But there is nothing in proviso (a) to provide that the rules are to be applied with necessary modifications or D that they are to be applied to income to which not only is Case I of Sched. D inapplicable, but as to some parts of which, for instance, that falling within Sched. C, even Sched. D is inapplicable. In the absence of clear and express words to justify the course for which the appellant contends, I think he must fail. It is a recognised rule in the construction of the Income Tax Acts that taxation cannot be imposed by analogy or by implication or by any sort of cy près doctrine; the same rule equally applies to the E construction of a provision like proviso (a) which is directed to excluding the enjoyment of a relief from taxation given by the section unless the proviso applies.

In my opinion the construction put forward by the appellant cannot be accepted. It is retorted on his behalf that the respondent's construction involves reading in words which are not there. Thus, it is said, on that construction proviso (a) must be read as if its words were "paid if the profits had been (chargeable and) charged." I do not F agree with this argument because I think, as I have already said, that the actual language of the proviso on its true construction can only refer to the case of profits capable of being brought within Case I, but I may observe that the sense which the appellant seeks to impose on the proviso involves a substantial re-writing of its language, somewhat to this effect, "less than the tax which would have been payable if the receipts had been deemed to be profits chargeable under the rules modified so as to apply as far as possible G to such receipts, and had been charged accordingly." I certainly cannot extract any such meaning from the words as they stand. And I cannot help protesting against the idea of a "notional assessment" which not only would confuse Case I with the other cases of Sched. D, but would also overleap the bounds between the different schedules and as in this case confuse Sched. D with Sched. C. Proviso (a) on its true construction is, in my opinion, limited to cases where an assessment under Case I of Sched. D, though H not made in fact, could properly have been made under the Income Tax Law. If words have to be read in the proviso (a) it is much simpler to read in the word "chargeable" as ROMER, L.J., suggests, than to re-write the proviso as the appellant's construction requires. But for myself, I find the words sufficient as they are.

This conclusion is sufficient to dispose of the appeal, which after all depends simply on the construction of proviso (a). I think it unnecessary to discuss some further I matters which were mooted in argument but do not help a decision on the real point.

I should, however, add that the difficulties felt by ROMER, L.J., would, I think, disappear if it were remembered that a company like the respondent whose business is mainly in the making of investments, may have some sources of income taxable by direct assessment, for instance, under Sched. A or Sched. B, or under Case VI of Sched. D: these pieces of income would be subject to appropriate taxation, like the bank interest and underwriting profits received by the respondent. And if it had trading profits in respect of which it was actually taxed under Case I of Sched. D, s. 33 (1) would by its very terms not apply at all. It is clear that a concern may be taxed in respect of different parts of its income under different schedules of cases (see, for instance, Fry v. Salisbury House Estates, Ltd. (2)).

It is not necessary to refer to Rosyth Building and Estates Co., Ltd. v. Rogers (1), which cannot be regarded as law in view of what was said in Fry v. Salisbury House Estates, Ltd. (2), even though the observation of LORD SKERRINGTON in reference to proviso (a) is, abstracted from its application in that case, correct.

In my opinion the conclusions of the commissioners, of FINLAY, J., and of the Court of Appeal were right.

I think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Farwell, J.), October 15, 1935]

Will—Vesting—Gift to A. of personalty if she should survive testator and attain age of twenty-one years or marry—Gift over to B. if A. predeceased testator or died under twenty-one unmarried—Death of testator while A. under twenty-one and unmarried.

A testator gave £5,000 to A. if she should survive him and his wife and should attain the age of twenty-one years or marry under that age, and directed that, if A. should not survive him or should survive him and not attain the age of twenty-one years or should not marry under that age, the legacy was to go to B. A. survived the testator and his wife, but had not reached the age of twenty-one years and was unmarried.

Held: the rule in Phipps v. Ackers (1) (1842), 9 Cl. & Fin. 583, applied to a gift of pure personalty, and, therefore, the gift to A. was, not a contingent gift, but a vested gift, liable to be divested in the events stated in the gift.

Adjourned Summons.

By his will made on Feb. 8, 1929, the testator provided that:

"From and after the death of the survivor of me and my wife, I direct my trustees to raise out of the residuary trust funds and pay the following sums free of duty:

> "The sum of £5,000 to my granddaughter, Elizabeth Lorna Heath if she shall be living at the date of the death of the survivor of myself and my wife and shall attain the age of twenty-one years or marry under that age. In case the said Elizabeth Lorna Heath shall predecease me or shall survive me, but shall not attain the age of twenty-one years or marry under that age, then . . . I give the said legacy of £5,000 to Lorna Keell Baynes."

The testator died on July 4, 1934, his wife having died before that date. The defendant, Elizabeth Lorna Heath, was then a spinster of the age of nineteen years. She did not stand in loco parentis to the testator.

By this summons the court was asked the question whether the gift of £5,000 to Miss Heath was a contingent legacy or a vested legacy subject to be divested in the event of her dying under the age of twenty-one years unmarried.

FARWELL, J.—The question that is raised on this summons is whether the legacy of £5,000 given to the granddaughter, Elizabeth Lorna Heath, is a vested gift liable to be divested in certain events or whether it is a contingent legacy. The question is one of some importance in this case, because, if the legacy of £5,000 is vested, the income derived from it will be applicable for the maintenance of the granddaughter until she attains the age of twenty-one years. On the other hand, if the legacy is a contingent legacy, then the income will not be so applicable. It is, therefore, of importance for the parties to know which is the true construction of this gift.

Apart altogether from authority I think that anyone looking at the terms of the gift itself would not hesitate long before they said that it was a contingent gift; it looks from the language used as though that was what the testator intended and that it ought to be so construed. It is said, however, that that is not the true construction, because there is a primâ facie rule, which ought to be applied in a case of this kind, namely, that a gift in these or similar terms, where there is a gift over to a particular person, is a vested and not a contingent gift. The rule is frequently referred to as the rule in Phipps v. Ackers (1), because it was so decided in that case, which was a decision of the House of Lords. The question there concerned a devise of realty. The rule is stated in Mr. Hawkin's book (3rd Edn.), p. 286. It is mentioned under the heading of Edwards v. Hammond (2), which was an earlier case than Phipps v. Ackers (1), but was one of the cases cited and approved by the House of Lords in Phipps v. Ackers (1). The rule is stated in this way:

> "If real estate be devised to A., 'if' or 'when' he shall attain a given age, with a limitation over in the event of his dying under that age, the attainment of the given age is held to be a condition subsequent and not precedent, and A. takes an immediate vested estate, subject to be divested upon his death under the specified age. And if the devise be to A. if or when he shall attain a given age, with a limitation over upon his death under that age without issue, A. takes a vested estate, defeasible only in the event of his death without issue under the specified age."

The rule is stated in Mr. Jarman's book (7th Edn.), p. 1350, in very much the same terms: "The construction also obtains" (that is, the construction which the House of Lords put upon the devise in Phipps v. Ackers (1)) "where the lands are devised to trustees, upon trust to convey to limitations of the nature of those under consideration." Then he cites Phipps v. Ackers (1) and says:

> "This decision is generally treated as the leading case on the question; the principle on which it was decided is, that the gift over in the event of the devisee dying under twenty-one shows the meaning of the testator to have been, that the first devisee should take whatever interest the party claiming under the gift over is not entitled to, which gives the first devisee the immediate interest, subject only to the chance of its being divested on a future contingency."

MR. HAWKINS, in the first edition of his book, p. 241, stated the principle in this way:

> "Where the devise is to a party at a given age, and the property is given over if the devisee dies under that age, . . . the court has discovered an intention expressed in the will, that the first devisee shall take all that the testator has to give, except what he has given to the devisee over; and in order to give effect to that intention, has held by force of the language of the will, that the first devise was not contingent, but vested, subject to be divested upon the happening of the event upon which the property was given over."

This passage appears to be a quotation from the judgment of WIGRAM, V.-C., in Bull v. Pritchard (3).

If that be the true ratio decidendi of this rule of construction in the case of a devise of real estate it appears to me it must apply notwithstanding that there may be more than one contingency, that is to say, supposing in this case there had been a devise of real estate, this rule would have applied although the gift over was to take effect in either of the two events, i.e., the devisee predeceasing the testator or surviving the testator and not attaining the age of twenty-one years or marrying under that age. In my judgment, apart from anything else in the will, had this been a case of a devise of real estate the rule to which I have referred as the rule in Phipps v. Ackers (1) would have applied.

Further, it appears from the cases which have been cited that the rule is applicable in a case where the gift is a gift of both personalty and realty. It was so decided in Whitter v. Bremridge (4), where reading the headnote there was a > "Gift of residuary real and personal estate upon trust to sell and invest, and pay 'the said property and interest arising therefrom to A., on his attaining the age of twenty-four years; but in case of his not attaining that age or leaving male issue, I give, devise, and bequeath the said properties' to other persons:—Held, that A. took an absolute vested interest in the testator's residuary estate liable to be divested in the events mentioned in the will."

PAGE WOOD, V.-C., dealing with that case in his judgment, begins by saying: "The case follows Phipps v. Ackers" (1). So it is quite plain the learned Vice-Chancellor took the view that the rule of construction to be found in Phipps v. Ackers (1) applied, although the subject-matter of the gift was not confined to realty, that is to say, it was applicable to a case where both real and personal estate were the subject-matter of the gift.

There is another decision to the same effect, Finch v. Lane (5), where LORD ROMILLY, dealing with the case of real and personal estate, used the same words (L.R. 10 Eq. at p. 503): "The case is governed by Phipps v. Ackers" (1). I think it is reasonably plain that the rule of construction is one which is not confined to a devise of realty, but is applicable where the gift is a mixed gift of realty and personalty. So far as the industry of counsel has been able to discover there is no case in which it has been definitely held that this rule applies in the case of personalty alone, although there is some indication that the rule does so apply to be found in Re Francis, Francis v. Francis (6). When one looks at the ratio decidendi of the rule in Phipps v. Ackers (1), as stated both by MR. JARMAN and by MR. HAWKINS—and the learned text writers in both those cases in my judgment rightly interpreted that decision—when one looks at the ratio decidendi it is difficult to see why it should not apply to a case of personal estate. That view is greatly strengthened when one finds two learned judges having, apparently, no doubt whatever that the rule is applicable in a case where there is a gift, not only of realty but also of personalty.

I confess I am unable to find any logical reason for saying that the rule applies to a gift of realty and to a gift of mixed realty and personalty, but not to a gift of pure personalty. No doubt, in some respects different considerations apply to devises of real estate and gifts of pure personalty, but in a case of this kind there does not appear to be the smallest reason for saying that the rule in Phipps v. Ackers (1) does not equally apply in both cases. In my judgment, it is impossible not to come to the conclusion that that rule, applicable as it undoubtedly is to realty, applicable as it undoubtedly is to a mixed gift of realty and personalty, is also applicable to a gift of personal estate. But there is this to be remembered, the rule in Phipps v. Ackers (1) is a rule of construction only, and, therefore, a rule which, whether the gift be of real estate or of real and personal estate, may be excluded if it appears from the will itself that the primâ facie rule of construction was not intended to apply. One has, therefore, to look at the will as a whole in each case to see whether there is anything which excludes what otherwise is the primâ facie rule of construction. Looking at the gift in this case it seems to me that the rule in Phipps v. Ackers (1) does apply, and that, accordingly, this gift is vested and not contingent. In the absence of a gift over this would be a contingent gift, because the whole basis of the decision in Phipps v. Ackers (1) rests upon the fact that there is a gift over, but there being a gift over in this case, the rule is applicable unless there is anything in the other parts of the will to exclude it.

I have looked carefully at the various provisions in the will to which my attention has been directed and I am unable to satisfy myself that there is anything in those provisions which excludes the application of the primâ facie rule in this case. According, in my judgment, the gift in this case of the £5,000 to Elizabeth Lorna Heath is a vested gift, liable to be divested in the events stated in that gift.

A defendant was convicted by a metropolitan police magistrate of obstructing a police constable in the execution of his duty. He had been on seven previous occasions convicted of similar offences, and the magistrate ordered him to enter into a recognisance for good behaviour in the sum of £20, with two sureties of £10 each, or in default to undergo two months' imprisonment. The maximum penalty for the offence of obstructing a police constable in the execution of his duty, under s. 12 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, as extended by the Prevention of Crimes Amendment Act, 1885, is £5.

Held: there was an apprehension that the defendant might do something against the law, and, therefore, the magistrate had power to order him to enter into a recognisance, although there was no apprehension of violence towards any person, and although the defendant, in the event of a breach of the recognisance, might become liable to a penalty greater than the maximum penalty allowed by the statute under which the conviction took place.

Lansbury v. Riley (1), [1914] 3 K.B. 229, followed.

Notes. As to orders for recognisances, see 21 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 633 et seq., and for cases, see 33 DIGEST 365 et seq. For the Prevention of Crimes Acts, see 5 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 898 et seq., 33 ibid., 34.

Rule nisi for certiorari.

One Williams was charged before Mr. Sandbach, a metropolitan police magistrate, with obstructing a police constable in the execution of his duty, contrary to s. 12 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, as extended by s. 2 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1885. It was alleged that Williams had given warning to a street bookmaker and thereby enabled him to evade arrest. The magistrate convicted Williams, who had been previously convicted on seven occasions of similar offences, and ordered him to enter into a recognisance for good behaviour in the sum of £20, with two sureties of £10 each, or in default to be imprisoned for two months.

At the instance of Williams a rule nisi for certiorari was granted, calling on the magistrate to show cause why the above order should not be removed into the High Court in order that it might be quashed. The grounds urged in support of the rule were (i) that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to make the order because there was no allegation or evidence of any actual or apprehended breach of the peace by the applicant or any other person as a result of any conduct of the applicant; and (ii) that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to make the order because it in effect imposed on the applicant a penalty different from and possibly more severe than the maximum which could be imposed for the offence of which he was actually convicted, namely, a fine of £5.

Montgomery, K.C., and G. G. Raphael showing cause.

Comyns Carr, K.C., and Derek Curtis Bennett in support of the rule.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—I am clearly of the opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. There is no need to reiterate the facts which have been put before the court. This case is covered in all material respects by Lansbury v. Riley (1), and especially by the judgment of AVORY, J., in that case. Counsel, who argued in support of the rule, asks: If this action by a magistrate be permissible, in what way can the power be limited? The answer I give is that the matter is discretionary and the limits are to be found in discretion. We should assume that judicial powers, when given, will in all cases be exercised properly, as they have been in this case.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and in view of the judgment of LORD HEWART, C.J., I do not think it right to add anything to what I am reported to have said in Lansbury v. Riley (1). In view, however, of the argument of counsel supporting the rule, which, undoubtedly, at first sight is impressive, namely, that the effect of what was done in this case is to increase the penalty which has been fixed by statute for a particular offence, I must say that I am not prepared to assent to his proposition that there can be no binding over of a person to be of good behaviour unless he has done something which tends to a breach of the peace in the sense of something which is calculated to lead to violence, that is, to personal violence. In my view, the phrase, "calculated to lead to a breach of the peace," is far more extensive in its meaning than counsel has suggested. If further authority is wanted, I think a passage from BLACKSTONE, vol. 4, c. xviii, p. 251, shows that the scope of this remedy is what is called "preventive" justice. This passage reads:

> "This preventive justice consists in obliging those persons, whom there is a probable ground to suspect of future misbehaviour, to stipulate with and to give full assurance to the public that such offence as is apprehended shall not happen: by finding pledges or securities for keeping the peace, or for their good behaviour."

With that addition I content myself with saying that I am in agreement with the judgment delivered by LORD HEWART, C.J.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I also agree. Counsel appearing to support the rule has argued that the power of a magistrate to order a person to enter into recognisances and to find sureties to be of good behaviour is confined to cases where there is apprehension of a breach of the peace in the sense of violence towards some person. In my view, it is quite impossible to accept that argument without refusing to agree with a very important chapter in Blackstone. Avory, J., has referred to some words used by that great author. I only desire to read a few more words. After dealing with such matters as the nature of this security, how it may be demanded and how it may be discharged, and when it is grantable, the learned author says (vol. 4, c. xviii, p. 255):

> "The other species of recognisance, with sureties, is for the good abearance, or good behaviour. This includes security for the peace, and somewhat more; we will therefore examine it in the same manner as the other. First, then, the justices are empowered by the statute 34 Edw. 3, c. 1, to bind over to the good behaviour towards the King and his people, all them that be not of good fame, wherever they be found; to the intent that the people be not troubled nor endamaged, nor the peace diminished, nor merchants and others, passing by the highways of the realm, be disturbed nor put in the peril which may happen by such offenders. Under the general words of this expression, that be not of good fame, it is holden that a man may be bound to his good behaviour for causes of scandal, contra bonos mores, as well as contra pacem."

I cannot think that the expressions "against the peace" or "apprehension of a breach of the peace" are confined to a breach or apprehension of a breach of that part of the law which provides that persons shall not commit assaults, and I think that the distinction which is there drawn by Blackstone is the distinction between such matters as are contrary to morality, "contra bonos mores," and such matters are as contrary to law, "contra pacem." Blackstone says in terms that a magistrate may properly bind over a person in any case where it is apprehended that he will commit a breach of the peace or that he will do something against the law. That, in my judgment, is the law, and it is too late in 1935 to attempt to show that Blackstone was wrong. I, therefore, agree with the judgments delivered by Lord Hewart, C.J., and Avory, J.

Rule discharged.

FLEETWOOD-HESKETH v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS

[Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Romer and Maugham, L.JJ.), July 11, 1935]

[Reported [1936] 1 K.B. 351; 105 L.J.K.B. 676; 153 L.T. 409]

Stamp Duty—Agreement for sale of interest in property—Conveyance on sale—Acknowledgment of receipt of purchase price—Signed only by vendor—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict., c. 39), s. 54, s. 59 (1), Sched. I.

In 1896, under the will of A. H., Major F. became tenant for life of certain property, his son being tenant in tail. In 1923, by a deed of separation between Major F. and his wife, Major F. became liable to make certain payments to his wife. In 1932 Major F. purchased from his son the son's interest as tenant in tail. The transaction was effected by a disentailing deed entered into between the parties and an oral agreement between Major F. and the son under which the son agreed to sell to his father his reversion for £160,000. The son then executed a document acknowledging the receipt of £160,000, "being the purchase price agreed as part of a family arrangement for my absolute reversion under the will of A. H. dated Aug. 17, 1896, and a disentailing deed dated Dec. 14, 1932 . . . expectant on the life interest of" Major F. "under the said will in the investments and cash mentioned in the schedule hereto."

A Held: any memorandum of agreement which contained all the terms agreed between the parties was itself an agreement, and was not less so because it was signed only by the party against whom it could be used; the "acknowledgment" executed by the son was an agreement for the sale of an interest in property within s. 59 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891; and, therefore, it was chargeable with the same ad valorem duty as if it were an actual conveyance on sale of the son's interest.

B Per Maugham, L.J.—The "acknowledgment" was also a "conveyance on sale" within s. 54 of the Act and thus liable to ad valorem duty under Sched. I to the Act.

F Case Stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to s. 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

1. The opinion of the court is desired upon the stamp duty chargeable upon certain instruments in writing which have been presented to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to the provisions of s. 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for their opinion upon the amount of the said duty thereon. The instruments presented to the commissioners comprised the following twenty documents:
G

(a) (Exhibit 1.) A document (hereinafter called "the acknowledgment") signed by the appellant, Roger Fleetwood Fleetwood-Hesketh (who is hereinafter called "Mr. Roger" and is the eldest son of the other appellant), and dated Dec. 14, 1932, purporting to be an acknowledgment of receipt from the appellant, Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh (who is hereinafter called Major Fleetwood-Hesketh), of H £160,000, being the purchase price agreed as part of a family arrangement for Mr. Roger's absolute reversion under the will of Anna Maria Alice Hesketh deceased and a disentailing deed dated Dec. 14, 1932, and made between Major Fleetwood-Hesketh, of the first part, Mr. Roger, of the second part, and George Cockshott, of the third part, expectant on the life interest of Major Fleetwood-Hesketh under the said will in the investments and cash therein mentioned standing in the joint
I names of the trustees of the said will.

(b) (Exhibit 2.) A transfer in common form dated Dec. 23, 1932, by G. E. Gregson, Sir T. A. L. Brocklebank and W. M. Saunders (who are the trustees of the aforesaid will) to Mr. Roger of £9,975 three per cent. debenture stock of the London and North-Eastern Railway Company, being one of the investments standing in the names of the trustees of the said will.

(c) Thirteen further transfers, in form similar to the last-mentioned transfer (exhibit 2), and made the same date between the same parties, of the following investments also standing in the names of the trustees of the said will:

£8,550 four per cent. preference stock of the London Midland and Scottish Rail. Co.

£8,550 five per cent. preference stock of the Southern Rail. Co.

£3,135 five per cent. redeemable preference stock 1950, and £5,700 five per cent. consolidated preference stock of the Great Western Rail. Co.

£3,990 five per cent. debenture stock of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co.

£570 four-and-a-half per cent. debenture stock of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co.

385 participating preference shares of £7 10s. of the Northern Assurance Co., Ltd.

£7,125 five per cent. cumulative preferred stock of the Peninsula and Oriental Steam Navigation Co.

2,850 six per cent. cumulative preference shares of the North Metropolitan Electric Power Supply Co.

2,850 six per cent. cumulative preference shares of the Shropshire, Worcestershire and Staffordshire Electric Power Co.

£885 four per cent. perpetual debenture stock of the Tottenham and District Gas Co.

1,425 six per cent. cumulative preference shares of the Yorkshire Electric Power Co.

£2,850 five per cent. debenture stock of the Wandsworth, Wimbledon and Epsom District Gas Co.

£4,750 three per cent. consolidated debenture stock of the Gas Light and Coke Co.

(d) (Exhibit 3.) A transfer dated Dec. 23, 1932, by the same trustees to Mr. Roger of £7,125 five per cent. registered stock of the Government of Australia, which also formed part of the investments standing in the names of the transferors as such trustees. This stock is one of the colonial stocks to which the Colonial Stock Act, 1877, applies.

(e) (Exhibit 4.) A transfer dated Dec. 23, 1932, by the same trustees to Agnes S. Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton of £1,425 five per cent. redeemable stock of the Bristol Corporation standing in the names of the transferors as such trustees.

(f) Three further transfers, in form similar to the last-mentioned transfer (Exhibit 4) and made the same date and between the same parties, of the following investments also standing in the names of the said trustees:

£2,850 five per cent. redeemable stock of the Birmingham Corporation.

£3,420 five per cent. redeemable debenture stock of the Manchester Ship Canal Co.

£5,700 five per cent. redeemable debenture stock of the Gas Light and Coke Co.

2. Prior to, or contemporaneously with, the presenting to the commissioners of the instruments aforesaid there were also presented to the commissioners for their opinion upon the stamp duty thereon certain other deeds which explain the transaction or transactions between the parties. They comprise the following:

(Exhibit A.) A disentailing deed dated Dec. 14, 1932, made between Major Fleetwood-Hesketh of the first part, Mr. Roger of the second part and George Cockshott of the third part whereby (i) the real estate remaining unsold subject to the limitations of the will of Anna Maria Alice Hesketh deceased (the greater part thereof having been sold) was conveyed to George Cockshott in fee simple upon such trusts as Major Fleetwood-Hesketh and Mr. Roger should by deed jointly appoint and in default of and subject to such appointment upon the trusts immediately before the execution thereof subsisting namely to the use of Major Fleetwood-Hesketh for life with remainder to the use of Mr. Roger in tail male with remainders over, (ii) Mr. Roger with the consent of Major Fleetwood-Hesketh conveyed and disposed unto George Cockshott all the money and investments and other personal estate subject to the trusts of the said will to hold subject to the life interest of Major Fleetwood-Hesketh under the said will but discharged from the estate or interest in tail male of Mr. Roger under the said will in trust for Mr. Roger absolutely.

(Exhibit B.) A deed of appointment dated Dec. 14, 1932, made between Major Fleetwood-Hesketh of the first part, Mr. Roger of the second part and the trustees of the will of Anna Maria Alice Hesketh deceased of the third part whereby in exercise of the power conferred on them by the disentailing deed Major Fleetwood-Hesketh and Mr. Roger appointed that the trustees should stand possessed of the net purchase money receivable by them in respect of part of the settled land (which had been agreed to be sold by Major Fleetwood-Hesketh as tenant for life) in trust for Major Fleetwood-Hesketh and Mr. Roger in the proportions of forty-seven per cent. and fifty-three per cent.

(Exhibit C.) A deed of variation and release dated Dec. 14, 1932, made between Major Fleetwood-Hesketh of the first part, Mr. Roger of the second part, Anne Dorothea Fleetwood-Hesketh (wife of Major Fleetwood-Hesketh and mother of Mr. Roger) of the third part, and John James Cockshott and John Jasper Brocklebank as trustees of the fourth part. This deed is supplemental to a deed dated Jan. 4, 1923, and made between Major Fleetwood-Hesketh of the first part, Anne Dorothea Fleetwood-Hesketh of the second part and the trustees of the third part, and recites that Major Fleetwood-Hesketh and Mr. Roger had entered into a family arrangement for (among other things) the purchase by Major Fleetwood-Hesketh of the reversionary interest of Mr. Roger in certain investments of large value representing the proceeds of sale of parts of the family settled estates at a price considerably exceeding the actuarial value thereof and on the terms that Mr. Roger should enter into that deed and also a deed of covenant to be executed immediately afterwards and to be made between Mr. Roger of the first part, Anne Dorothea Fleetwood-Hesketh of the second part and Agnes Sylvia Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton of the third part. By this deed Mr. Roger undertook the liability of Major Fleetwood-Hesketh under the principal deed of Jan. 4, 1923, for all payments to be made thereunder to Anne Dorothea Fleetwood-Hesketh other than those mentioned in clause 10 of the principal deed and Major Fleetwood-Hesketh was released from liability in respect of such payments.

(Exhibit D.) A deed of covenant dated Dec. 14, 1932, made between Mr. Roger of the first part, Anne Dorothea Fleetwood-Hesketh (Mrs. Fleetwood-Hesketh) of the second part and Agnes Sylvia Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton (the trustees) of the third part. This is the deed referred to in the last-mentioned deed and executed immediately afterwards. By it Mr. Roger covenanted with Mrs. Fleetwood-Hesketh and with the trustees to pay for Mrs. Fleetwood-Hesketh's benefit certain annual payments (being the payments stipulated for by the last-mentioned deed) and declared that certain investments mentioned in the schedule thereto (which comprised, inter alia, the investments mentioned in para. 1 (e) and (f) of this case as having been transferred by the trustees of the will of Anna Maria Alice Hesketh to Agnes S. Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton) should be held by Agnes S. Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton as trustees upon trusts to secure such payments.

(Exhibit E.) A deed of release and indemnity dated Dec. 23, 1932, and made between Major Fleetwood-Hesketh of the first part, Mr. Roger of the second part and G. E. Gregson, Sir T. A. L. Brocklebank and W. M. Saunders (trustees of the will of Anna Maria Alice Hesketh) of the third part. This deed, after reciting (inter alia) the will of Anna Maria Alice Hesketh under which her residuary estate was devised to the use of her grandson Major Fleetwood-Hesketh for life with remainder to Mr. Roger in tail male with remainders over, the sale of the greater part of the residuary real estate and investments of the proceeds in the securities mentioned in the third schedule thereto (being the investments mentioned in the schedule to the acknowledgment), and the disentailing deed, contains recitals (27), (28) and (29) as follows:

> "(27) The said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh as part of a family arrangement has purchased at the price of £160,000 from the said Roger Fleetwood-Hesketh the absolute reversion of the said Roger Fleetwood-Hesketh under the > trusts and provisions of the said will of the testatrix and the said disentailing deed expectant on the death of the said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh the tenant for life under the said will in all and singular the investments and cash mentioned in the Fourth Schedule hereto and such purchase has been duly completed by payment of the said purchase price by the said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh to the said Roger Fleetwood-Hesketh as he hereby acknowledges.

> "(28) Since the completion of the last-mentioned purchase the said Roger Fleetwood-Hesketh has for the purpose of investing the said sum of £160,000 paid to him as aforesaid purchased from the said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh at the price of £160,000 the whole beneficial interest of the said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh in the investments and cash mentioned in Part I of the Fourth Schedule hereto and such purchase has been duly completed by payment of the said purchase price by the said Roger Fleetwood-Hesketh to the said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh as he hereby acknowledges.
> "(29) The life interest of the said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh in all the investments and cash mentioned in the Fourth Schedule hereto having (as he hereby declares) become merged and extinguished on the acquisition by him as aforesaid of the absolute reversion therein expectant on such life interest the said Roger Fleetwood-Hesketh being entitled as aforesaid to the whole beneficial interest in the investments and cash mentioned in Part I of the said Fourth Schedule has requested the trustees to transfer and pay the same to him and the said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh being entitled as aforesaid to the whole beneficial interest in the investments and cash mentioned in Part II of the same schedule has requested the trustees to transfer and pay the same to him."

The investments mentioned in the fourth schedule to the deed of release and indemnity (Exhibit E) are the same as those mentioned in the third schedule to the same deed. Those mentioned in Part I to the fourth schedule were transferred by the trustees of the will either to Mr. Roger or to Agnes Sylvia Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton (trustees under the deed of covenant dated Dec. 14, 1932, Exhibit D), and the transfers of these investments (except such transfers as are not liable to stamp duty) are the subject of this case. The investments mentioned in Part II to the fourth schedule were transferred by the trustees of the will to Major Fleetwood-Hesketh and the stamp duty on these transfers is not in question.

3. The commissioners were informed that there was no deed or agreement or assignment in existence relating to the acquisition by Major Fleetwood-Hesketh of Mr. Roger's reversion as recited in recital (27) of the last-mentioned deed (Exhibit E) other than those produced. The commissioners were further informed that the £160,000 paid to Mr. Roger for his reversion as recited represented fifty-seven per cent. of the total value of the fund, while the actuarial value of his reversion was fifty-two per cent. thereof, and accordingly that the part of the £160,000 which was in excess of the value of the reversion was five per cent. of the whole fund or about £14,000 which might be taken to be the apportioned consideration for the obligations in favour of his mother undertaken by Mr. Roger.

4. The commissioners were of opinion:

(1) That on the facts brought to their notice there had been two sales, one by Mr. Roger to Major Fleetwood-Hesketh of his reversion, and the other by Major Fleetwood-Hesketh to Mr. Roger of certain investments (namely the investments mentioned in Part I of the fourth schedule to the deed of release and indemnity (Exhibit E)).

(2) That the acknowledgment (Exhibit 1) was liable to ad valorem duty under the head of charge "Conveyance or transfer on sale" in Sched. I to the Stamp Act, 1891, as being either a conveyance on sale of Mr. Roger's reversion in the settled property therein mentioned, or an agreement for sale, liable to ad valorem duty as a conveyance on sale under s. 59 of the same Act, either of an equitable interest in property or of property not falling within any of the exceptions mentioned in sub-s. (1) of that section.

(3) That the apportioned consideration for such sale on which ad valorem duty was payable was £160,000 less £14,000 or £146,000.

(4) That the transfers by the trustees of the will to Mr. Roger or to Agnes Sylvia Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton on his behalf or by his direction were conveyances or transfers on sale and were liable to ad valorem duty accordingly.

5. The commissioners, accordingly, assessed the stamp duties as follows:

(i) On the "acknowledgment" (Exhibit 1) under the head of charge "conveyance or transfer on sale of any property" in Sched. I to the Stamp Act, 1891, and s. 73 of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, and other statutory provisions, namely, ad valorem duty at the rate of 10s. per £50 on the sum of £146,000......... £1,460.

(ii) On the transfers to Mr. Roger (Exhibit 2 and the transfers referred to in paragraph 1 (c))—

Stock Transferred.	Consideration.	Duty.
£9,975 three per cent. debenture stock of the London and North Eastern Rail. Co.	6,135	61 10 0
£8,550 four per cent. preference stock of the London, Midland and Scottish Rail. Co.	2,693	27 0 0
£8,550 five per cent. preference stock of Southern Rail. Co. ..	6,027	60 10 0
£3,135 redeemable preference stock and £5,700 five per cent. consolidated preference stock of Great Western Rail. Co. ..	6,901	69 10 0
£3,990 five per cent. debenture stock of Royal Mail Steam Packet Co.	598	6 0 0
£570 four-and-a-half per cent. debenture stock of Royal Mail Steam Packet Co.	430	4 10 0
385 participating preference shares of Northern Assurance Co., Ltd.	7,219	72 10 0
£7,125 five per cent. cumulative preferred stock of the Peninsula and Oriental Steam Navigation Co.	5,344	53 10 0
2,850 six per cent. cumulative preference shares of the North Metropolitan Electric Power Supply Co., Ltd.	4,132	41 10 0
2,850 cumulative preference shares of the Shropshire, Worcestershire and Staffordshire Electric Power Co.	3,776	38 0 0
£885 four per cent. perpetual debenture stock of the Tottenham and District Gas Co.	875	9 0 0
1,425 six per cent. cumulative preference shares of the Yorkshire Electric Power Co.	2,066	21 0 0
£2,850 five per cent. debenture stock of Wandsworth, Wimbledon and Epsom District Gas Co.	3,406	34 10 0
£4,750 Gas Light and Coke Co. three per cent. debenture stock ..	3,752	38 0 0

The apportioned consideration in the case of each of these transfers was the proportion of the £160,000 paid by Mr. Roger to Major Fleetwood-Hesketh for the investments which in the opinion of the commissioners were bought by the former.

(iii) On the transfer by the trustees of the will to Mr. Roger of the £7,125 five per cent. registered stock of the government of Australia (Exhibit 3) to which stock the Colonial Stock Act, 1877, applies, ad valorem duty at the rate of 5s. per £100 of the nominal amount of the stock transferred £7,125 under the head of charge "conveyance or transfer on sale or otherwise............................of any colonial stock to which the Colonial Stock Act, 1877, applies" in Sched. I to the Stamp Act, 1891, and s. 36 (2) of the Finance Act, 1920.....................................£18.

(iv) On the transfers to Agnes S. Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton (Exhibit 4 and the transfers referred to in para. 1 (f))—

Stock Transferred.	Consideration.	Duty.
£1,425 five per cent. redeemable stock of the Bristol Corporation	1,624	16 10 0
£2,850 five per cent. redeemable stock of the Birmingham Corporation	3,220	32 10 0
£3,420 five per cent. redeemable debenture stock of the Manchester Ship Canal Co.	3,437	34 10 0
£5,700 redeemable debenture stock of the Gas Light and Coke Co.	6,526	65 10 0

The apportioned consideration in the case of each of these transfers was the proportion of the £160,000 paid by Mr. Roger to Major Fleetwood-Hesketh for the investments which in the opinion of the commissioners were bought by the former.

6. It was contended by the appellants:

(1) that the "acknowledgment" was neither an agreement for sale, nor a conveyance on sale, nor liable to stamp duty as such, but was a receipt only, liable to stamp duty as such;

(2) that the transfers by the trustees of the will to Mr. Roger or to Agnes S. Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton were not transfers on sale and were liable each to the fixed duty of 10s. under the head of charge "conveyance or transfer of any kind not hereinbefore described in Sched. I to the Stamp Act, 1891," with the exception of the transfer of the £7,125 five per cent. registered stock of the government of Australia, which they contended was liable to the duty at the rate of 2s. 6d. per £100, not 5s. per £100, on £7,125 under Sched. I to the Stamp Act, 1891, as not being a transfer on sale and therefore not a transfer the duty whereon had been doubled by s. 36 (2) of the Finance Act, 1920.

and being dissatisfied with the assessments made and having paid the duty in accordance with the assessments of the commissioners the appellants required the commissioners to sign and state a case. The commissioners signed and stated this case accordingly.

7. The questions for the opinion of the court were—

(1) Whether the "acknowledgment" was liable to ad valorem duty as assessed by the commissioners.

(2) Whether the transfers by the trustees of the will of Anna Maria Alice Hesketh to Mr. Roger or to Agnes S. Brocklebank and Ralph Assheton were liable to duty as assessed by the commissioners.

(3) If not, to what duty was each of the said instruments liable.

Finlay, J., held that the acknowledgment (Exhibit 1) was a conveyance on sale within s. 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, as being an instrument whereby an interest in property upon the sale thereof was vested in a purchaser, and so, under Sched. I to the Act, was liable to ad valorem stamp duty. The appellant, Roger Fleetwood-Hesketh, appealed.

Gavin Simonds, K.C., and F. McMullan for the appellant.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and J. H. Stamp for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This case raises a difficult point. The facts on which it arises are these. The mother of Mr. Roger Fleetwood Fleetwood-Hesketh died in 1898, and under her will Major Charles became tenant for life of certain property, and he had a son, Roger, who was the tenant in tail. In 1923 a deed of separation was executed between Major Charles and his wife, under which Major Charles became bound to pay to his wife a certain sum year by year. In 1932 an agreement was made between the father, Major Charles, and the son, the tenant in tail, whereby the father purchased all the interest of his son, Roger, as tenant in tail, for a certain sum. The figure was £160,000, but that figure was reached because an undertaking was given by the son to pay the annuity which his father, Major Fleetwood-Hesketh, had undertaken to pay under the deed of separation in 1923. The result of this transaction, therefore, was that the tenant in tail had passed his interest as tenant in tail to his father, who thereupon became tenant in possession absolutely of the property, but meantime the son had undertaken to defray the liability of the father under the disentailing deed, and in respect of the loss of his tenancy in tail and his undertaking to pay the mother's annuity he was paid a sum of £160,000. It was carried out in this way. A disentailing deed was entered into and executed between the father and the son and the trustees on Dec. 14, 1932, a deed which was stamped, as we are told, with merely a 10s. stamp. In order to carry that transaction to completion there had to be paid to the son £160,000, and it was important that the father should be able to hold as a record the receipt signed by the son showing that he had been paid the £160,000. I need not complicate the story by saying that after that had been initially paid there was a purchase by the son of some of the securities which had previously belonged to the trust. It is sufficient for the purpose of this case to take note of the fact that the transaction was carried out by a payment to the son of the £160,000 in return for the interest he had as tenant in tail and the obligation he undertook under the deed of separation of 1923. It is now claimed by the revenue authorities that this receipt (which I will read) ought to be charged to stamp duty ad valorem. This is the document:

> "I, Roger Fleetwood Fleetwood-Hesketh of 1 Wyndham-place in the county of London barrister-at-law hereby acknowledge that I have this 14th day of December, 1932, received from Major Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh of Stocken Hall, Stretton, in the county of Rutland, the sum of £160,000, being the purchase price agreed as part of a family arrangement for my absolute reversion under the will of Anna Maria Alice Hesketh deceased dated the 17th day of August, 1896, and a disentailing deed dated the 14th day of December, 1932, and made between the said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh, of the first part, myself of the second part, and George Cockshott, of the third part, expectant on the life interest of the said Charles Hesketh Fleetwood-Hesketh under the said will in the investments and cash mentioned in the schedule hereto standing in the joint names of the trustees of the said will."

It is argued with great force by counsel for the appellant that that receipt has no effect whatever, because, he says, all that was done was under an agreement which was orally made between the father and the son and which, as to the disentailing deed, was put into writing, but as between father and son there was ultimately the transfer of a lot of securities, and this receipt, signed, as it was, by the son only, is in no sense an agreement. The revenue contend that it falls within s. 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, which provides: "For the purposes of this Act the expression 'conveyance on sale' includes every instrument, and every decree or order of any court or of any commissioners, whereby any property, or any estate or interest in any property, upon the sale thereof is transferred to or vested in a purchaser, or any other person on his behalf, or by his direction."

FINLAY, J., came to the conclusion, following two decisions, namely, Horsfall v. Hey (1) and Garnett v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (2), that this receipt was a conveyance on sale within the meaning of s. 54. I have some doubt and difficulty in following the reasoning on which that decision is based. I should like rather to withhold my opinion upon the effect of s. 54. In Garnett v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (2), CHANNELL, J., said (81 L.T. at p. 638):

> "On the whole I think there is not very much doubt about the matter, although it is, perhaps, a little difficult to give the very best possible reasons for the decision which I think must be right."

A If one cannot give reasons, if one cannot explain to oneself how you hold that the document is a conveyance on sale, I have some mistrust whether the document is a conveyance on sale within the meaning of s. 54. Paying all respect to what FINLAY, J., said, I still remain in doubt about it.

Then we turn to s. 59, to which our attention has been more specially directed by counsel for the commissioners. That contains the words:

> "Any contract or agreement made . . . for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever, or for the sale of any estate or interest in any property except lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, or property locally situate out of the United Kingdom, or goods, wares, or merchandise, or stock, or marketable securities, or any ship or vessel, or part interest, share, or property of or in any ship or vessel, shall be charged with the same ad valorem duty, to be paid by the purchaser, as if it were an actual conveyance on sale of the estate, interest, or property contracted or agreed to be sold." C

It will be observed that that section imposes liability to tax on something which is less effective than an actual conveyance; there may be a contract or agreement, and liable under s. 59 to pay tax, although it is not an actual conveyance on the sale of the estate. D Comment was made that the receipt in this case is signed by the recipient of the money only and not by the purchaser. To my mind, that is not a difficulty, and, indeed, is of slender, if any, importance. What is required is the signature of the person who is to be charged with the result of the transaction. At any time in the present case the father could add his signature as an unnecessary signature. Just as you have in the case of a lease of a certain kind a signature of the lease by the landlord only, E so here it was unnecessary to have more than one signature which was the effective signature. Is it, on that ground, any the less an agreement? What is meant by "agreement" in s. 59? It has been suggested that because there was an oral agreement antecedent to this, you may, so to speak, put the document in the fire, and you are no worse off. To my mind, that will not do, because I think the parties have, as a F part of their agreement, intended—and carried out their intention—that the agreement should be recorded; and when you say you have got an agreement you mean that you have got the record of two minds which have become united for the purpose of the terms contained in the agreement. It seems to me, therefore, that this document is a document which it was the intention of the parties to bring into being, which it was important —perhaps essential—for the father to hold as a record that the term of the disentailing G assurance had been fulfilled by him, and as connoting that the securities which are mentioned were received by the son. Although that did not amount to an actual conveyance, that document records something which is an agreement because it has reference to an interest in property and the sale of that interest. Having regard to the cases that have been referred to upon the Stamp Act, I have come to the conclusion that s. 59 does apply to this case. I am rather inclined to think that one might be misled H if one turned back to the decisions under the Bills of Sale Act. It is important to bear in mind the observations that were made in respect of this Act—that if you can prove the transaction wholly independent of any document in writing there is nothing required to be registered under the Bills of Sale Act, and if no registration is required you do not invalidate the transaction which stood proprio vigore without any document at all. So far as there is reasoning to be applied to this case, when we go deeper into the cases I I am inclined to think we take ourselves away from the proper consideration of the relevant matters in the present case.

I have come to the conclusion that this receipt is a record, a necessary record, an intended record, of an agreement made between the parties, not less an agreement because it is signed only by the party against whom it can be used, and that it is the record of an agreement which is within the words in s. 59, and, therefore, is liable to stamp duty. It will be noted that my observations are directed to a different section and to different considerations from those which were before FINLAY, J. Without saying any more about that decision I prefer to put my judgment upon the grounds upon which I have put it. The result will be that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—The first question argued upon this appeal and the question which was solely considered by FINLAY, J., in the court below, is whether the document with which we have had to deal is, within the meaning of the Stamp Act, a conveyance or transfer on sale or otherwise—it being provided by s. 54:

> "For the purposes of this Act the expression 'conveyance or sale' includes every instrument and every decree or order of any court or of any commissioners, whereby any property, or any estate or interest in any property, upon the sale thereof is transferred to or vested in a purchaser, or any other person on his behalf or by his direction."

It appears to me, therefore, that the question to be decided is whether this document, which is in form a receipt and purports to be nothing more than a receipt, did transfer or vest in the purchaser, the person who paid the purchase money, any interest whatsoever in the property for which the purchase money was paid.

The question whether a particular document does or does not transfer or convey an interest is not to be determined by considering what name the parties themselves have given to the document. A document may be called a receipt and yet it may appear that it is a document by which an interest in certain property has passed; or it may be called a conveyance on sale, a transfer on sale, or whatever the parties may have chosen to call it. Instances of such cases as that have been brought to our attention. The first is to be found in Horsfall v. Hey (1). In that case there was a document signed by both parties to the transaction which purported to record that "A. B. has sold to C. D. all the goods, stock in trade, and fixtures in a certain shop for £50"; and it was held, that notwithstanding the use of the past tense, that document, according to its true construction, meant: "A. B. hereby sells to C. D." In that case no property had passed from A. B. to C. D. before the document was signed, and if property had passed at all from A. B. to C. D. (and everybody admitted that it had) it passed by virtue of that document and nothing else. It was admitted that the right to sever the fixtures which were referred to had passed to C. D. How had the right to sever the fixtures passed to C. D.? By that document and nothing else. It was, accordingly, held that that was a transfer on sale.

To much the same effect was the next case to which our attention was called, Garnett v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (2). There the court were concerned with the dissolution of a partnership, and a document which in terms amounted to little more than a receipt and acknowledgment was held by the court to have been the document which effected the dissolution and caused the interest in the property mentioned in the deed to pass from one party to another.

Re Baum, Ex parte Cooper (3) was the third of these cases. There a receipt had been given, and it was held in the Court of Appeal that the document, although in form a receipt, was a complete assurance; it was the document which conferred the title upon the purchaser. That was pointed out by the Court of Appeal in Woodgate v. Godfrey (4). Commenting on Re Baum, Ex parte Cooper (3), SIR GEORGE JESSEL said (5 Ex.D. at p. 26):

> "We have had the benefit of some remarks made by THESIGER, L.J., as to that case, and those remarks show that the decision may be explained upon an intelligible principle. That principle is, that independently of the document there was no sale of the goods, that there was one transaction constituted by the inventory and the receipt thereto attached, and that if there had been no document there would have been no transaction."

The principle to be applied in these cases was stated by LORD ESHER in Ramsey v. Margrett (5) ([1894] 2 Q.B. at p. 23) thus:

> "If a document is intended by the parties to it to be a part of the bargain to pass the property in the goods, then, whatever the form of the document may be, even if it be only a simple receipt for the purchase money, it is, by s. 4, to be deemed to > be a bill of sale, though it is not so in fact. But, if the document is not intended to be part of the bargain to pass the property in the goods—if the bargain is complete without it, so that the property passes independently of it—then it is not to be deemed to be that which it is not in fact—a bill of sale."

The mere fact that the document in question was intended to be part of a complicated transaction between the parties is not sufficient; the document must be "intended to be a part of the bargain"—by which I understand he means, to be part of the machinery to pass the property from one to another. If it be that, then whatever the parties may choose to call it it is a conveyance or transfer on sale.

Applying those considerations to the present case, I would like to point out the almost unique character of the present transaction. The object of it was that Roger, the son, should have transferred to him a part of the securities representing capital trust moneys under the settlement in question. Accordingly, his father disentailed, turned his estate tail into an absolute interest. All that was necessary after that, to give complete effect to the transaction, was for the two of them to direct the trustees to transfer those securities to Roger. I have left out the initial bargain between the parties—that the son was to take upon himself the liability which the father up to then had been under to pay the wife of the father a certain sum, or sums. Apart from that, all that was necessary was to transfer these securities to the son. Had that been done, the father would have been entitled to have the transfer stamped with ad valorem duty, as I understand it, by virtue of s. 74 of the Finance Act, 1910, which provides that:

> "Any conveyance or transfer operating as a voluntary disposition inter vivos shall be chargeable with the like stamp duty as if it were a conveyance or transfer on sale, with the substitution in each case of the value of the property conveyed or transferred for the amount or value of the consideration for the sale."

Stamp duty would have been paid on £160,000, the value of the property. For some reason or another which has not been explained to me the parties chose to carry out that comparatively simple transaction in the following way. After the disentailing deed the father purported to buy from his son, and the son purported to sell to the father, by oral agreement, the whole of his reversion for £160,000, and then the son agreed to invest the £160,000 by purchasing from the trustees these securities that he wanted, leaving the other securities with the father. The result of that is that you get two contracts of sale: (i) an oral contract by the son to sell to his father the reversion for £160,000, and (ii) a contract by the son to buy from the trustees these investments which he wanted for £160,000 with the result that the Crown are now claiming double ad valorem duty—on the sale from the son to the father of the reversion and on the sale by the trustees to the son of the securities for £160,000. It does not matter what the reason of it was. It will be observed that it was wholly unnecessary for there to be any formal transfer to the father of the son's reversion. As a rule, when a person buys even an equitable interest in property he is not content to rest merely upon an oral contract, or even a receipt: it is nearly always followed by a formal conveyance or transfer of the equitable interest. What I am emphasising in the present case is that no one wanted a formal conveyance of this equitable interest; such a conveyance would have been wholly unnecessary. That, I think, is a relevant consideration when we are asked to hold that this receipt was intended by the parties to be a conveyance of the property. It was not. It was, in my opinion, intended to be what it is expressed to be, merely an acknowledgment by the son of the receipt of £160,000. The property had passed when the oral agreement was made, and this receipt, although, no doubt, part of the transaction between the parties, was not a part of the bargain to vest the property in the father. With all respect to FINLAY, J., I should be of opinion that this document is not a conveyance on sale.

Then comes the question whether it is not an agreement within the meaning of s. 59 of the Act. I will not read s. 59 again: it is sufficient to point out that it in effect provides that any contract or agreement for the sale of an equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever shall be stamped with ad valorem duty as though it were a conveyance on sale of the equitable property. It has been pointed out on more than

A one occasion that the Stamp Act does not require transactions to bear stamp duty; it is dealing only with documents. Where, therefore, there has been an oral agreement of sale no stamp duty is exigible, but if the parties choose to make a record of the fact that they have entered into an agreement there seems every reason why duty should be exigible. I cannot myself think that in s. 59 the legislature intended to draw any distinction between the case where by a document in writing the parties were recording B an agreement entered into at the time of signing the record and by means of an offer and acceptance contained in the written document, and where they are making a record of an oral offer and an oral acceptance, made, it may be, only a few days before. In my opinion, s. 59 does apply to a record made of an oral agreement arrived at between the parties, and I think no one can doubt that in this case in the document there is a record of an agreement come to between the parties, a record that shows all the terms of such C agreement. Therefore, in my opinion, this document is not chargeable with stamp duty as a conveyance, but is chargeable with ad valorem duty as an agreement or contract within the meaning of s. 59 of the Act.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion as my brethren, that the appeal should be dismissed; but I ought to say (although I am conscious, having regard D to what has fallen from my brethren, of some doubt about the matter) that I should be inclined to agree with the learned judge and to come to the conclusion that the so-called acknowledgment is liable to stamp duty under s. 54 of the Stamp Act. Inasmuch as I agree with my brethren on the point under s. 59, if the document is not liable to ad valorem stamp duty under s. 54, I can be brief on this point; and I only make the observations I do because, as I have said, I think the learned judge was right on that E point and because this case may conceivably go to another tribunal.

My view is founded upon the circumstance that the conveyance on sale, if there be a conveyance on sale within s. 54 here, is no more than an equitable assignment of property. I attribute considerable importance to the fact that an equitable assignment does not require any particular words to give it effect. I am not going to take up time by reading the very interesting speech of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Brandt's Sons & F Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Co. (6) ([1905] A.C. at p. 462); everybody, I expect, is aware of it. But I would like to add that even an endorsement in blank of company debentures has been held to be a good equitable assignment, and nobody I think has ever doubted that this is correct. I agree, however, that, although the form of words is wholly immaterial, it is necessary to come to the conclusion, based on the surrounding circumstances and the terms of the document itself, that the parties intended that the G property should pass in equity to the transferee. In approaching this matter I must state that, as I read the case, there is no justification for the view that there was a previous parol agreement for the transfer of the absolute reversion in question. I think the true view is that nothing was binding on any one until the twenty documents or instruments referred to in para. 1 of the Case were signed or exchanged—all of them dated Dec. 14, 1932, and, there being no antecedent transfer by parol, but for what my H brethren have said, I should be inclined to hold that the so-called acknowledgment was sufficient to establish the fact that the parties intended that the absolute reversion should pass in equity to Major Fleetwood-Hesketh, and was, therefore, a conveyance on sale.

But I am very glad to be able to proceed on the footing that I am wrong; and, on that footing I ask myself: What is the effect of s. 59? There does arise a rather curious I point of construction there, having regard to the way in which the Stamp Act is drawn. Section 1 of the Act proceeds to charge the stamp duties upon the several instruments specified in Sched. I to the Act, that is the charging section, and when we look at the Schedule we find that "agreement or any memorandum of an agreement" is chargeable with a certain duty, 6d., and we find another place in the Schedule where a conveyance on sale is made chargeable. If we look at s. 54 we see a statement of what the expression "conveyance on sale" includes; and in s. 59 a statement that "any contract or agreement for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property" is to be charged with the same ad valorem duty as if it were an actual conveyance on sale. It has been

A ingeniously argued that in s. 59 the phrase used is "any contract or agreement" and that it says nothing about "any memorandum," that when we look at the Schedule to find what is the duty in respect of an agreement it says: "agreement or any memorandum of an agreement," and contains in addition the words

> "whether the same be only evidence of a contract, or obligatory upon the parties from its being a written instrument."

B The argument is that s. 59 will apply only to a contract or agreement of a somewhat formal character. I do not accept that view. I should point out that s. 22 of the Act is strongly against that construction. By s. 22 it is provided:

> "The duty of sixpence upon an agreement [not mentioning a memorandum] may be denoted by an adhesive stamp, which is to be cancelled by the person by whom the agreement is first executed." C

I do not suppose counsel for the appellant would have been bold enough to suggest that during all the years since this Act has been in force the right course with regard to a memorandum of agreement was to pay the stamp duty under s. 22 by an impressed stamp. It is plain, as I think, from s. 22, that the word "agreement" includes a memorandum of agreement, but, whether that be so or not, I think it is reasonably clear that D any memorandum of agreement which contains all the terms of what has been or is being agreed between the parties is itself an agreement. It is true that only one party has signed the acknowledgment. It may be mentioned that the signature of such an acknowledgment is, of course, followed by the handing over of the receipt to the person who has paid the £160,000, which is expressed to be the purchase price agreed as part of the family agreement. But I do not rely upon that. To my mind, it is clear, E both on principle and on authority, that an agreement or a memorandum of agreement containing all the terms is certainly within s. 59 of the Act, even though one party only has signed it. It is the commonest possible thing for one party only to sign an agreement and to hand it over to the other party, being the person who is likely to want to enforce it. I may add that so far as regards an agreement under the Act, it was long ago settled that it is immaterial that only one party signed it. If any authority is F wanted for that it will be found in Knight v. Barber (7), where a note: "Bought of Nathan Knight 50 shares . . . at £10 per share," a note that was signed by Barber, was held to require a stamp.

However, my conclusion on s. 59 is that, for the reasons I have given in addition to the reasons given by my brethren, the document which is called here an acknowledgment, containing as it did all the material terms of the bargain between the parties, was G within the terms of s. 59 as being a contract or agreement for the sale of an equitable estate in the stocks, shares and securities in question, and was, therefore, stampable with the ad valorem stamp.

Appeal dismissed.

Shipping—Stowaway—Alien stowaway in British ship in foreign harbour—Arrest in England—Jurisdiction of magistrate to deal with offence—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 60), s. 237 (1), s. 686 (1).

By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 237: "(1) If a person secretes himself and goes to sea in a ship without the consent of either the owner . . . or of the person in charge of the ship, or of any other person entitled to give that consent, he shall be liable [to a penalty]."

By s. 686 (1) jurisdiction is given to a magistrate to deal with an alien "charged with having committed any offence on board a British ship on the high seas," if such person "is found within the jurisdiction of any court in Her Majesty's dominions, which would have had cognisance of the offence if it had been committed on board a British ship within the limits of its ordinary jurisdiction."

An alien secreted himself in a British ship which was lying moored to the quay of a foreign port and disclosed himself for the first time on the day after the ship had sailed. On the arrival of the ship at Millwall Docks, London, he was arrested and brought before a metropolitan magistrate on a charge under s. 237 (1). The magistrate held that, as the person charged was an alien, he had no jurisdiction to deal with the case.

Held: the offence of secreting and going to sea which was prohibited by the sub-section was a continuing offence, and, therefore, under s. 686 (1), the magistrate had jurisdiction to deal with it.

Notes. As to penalties on stowaways, see 30 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 645, and for Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, see 23 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 395.

Case Stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was preferred by the appellant, Robey, under s. 237 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, against the respondent, Vladinier, charging that the respondent, on Oct. 14, 1934, at Oran, unlawfully secreted himself and proceeded to sea on board the British steamship Rio Azul, without the consent of either the owners, master, or any other person entitled to give such consent.

On the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted:—On Oct. 14, 1934, the respondent, a national of Yugoslavia, boarded the ship when it was lying moored to the quay at Oran, Algeria, and there secreted himself without the consent of either the owners, master, or any other person entitled to give such consent. The ship left Oran and proceeded to sea on Oct. 14, 1934, on her voyage to London via Capetown. On the following day, the respondent disclosed himself for the first time and was afterwards treated as a member of the crew until the ship arrived at Millwall Docks, London, on Dec. 12, 1934. The respondent was there arrested pursuant to a warrant issued from the Thames Police Court.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the court had jurisdiction to determine the information; that the offence defined in s. 237 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, contained two necessary ingredients: (a) secreting; and (b) going to sea; that the respondent committed an act of secretion not only by concealing himself on board the ship at Oran, but also throughout the time when he remained concealed; that, in any event, as part of the offence consisted in going to sea, there was jurisdiction to determine the matter; that by reason of s. 686 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, there was jurisdiction in respect of offences committed on board a British ship on the high seas; that the port of Oran must be regarded for the present purpose as being situated on the high seas; and that s. 684 of the Act gave jurisdiction to the court.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that a court of summary jurisdiction had no jurisdiction to try offences committed by any person, not being a British subject, on board a British ship in a foreign port or harbour; that s. 237 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, did not make it an offence for an alien to secrete himself in a ship in a foreign port or harbour; that the offence under that section, if any, was completed within the port of Oran; that s. 684 dealt only with venue and pre-supposed an offence committed within the jurisdiction of an English court.

The magistrate accepted the contentions urged on the part of the respondent, and held that he had no jurisdiction in the matter. He, accordingly, dismissed the information. The appellant appealed to the Divisional Court.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, provides:

> Section 237 (1): "If a person secretes himself and goes to sea in a ship without the consent of either the owner, consignee, or master, or of a mate, or of the person in charge of the ship, or of any other person entitled to give that consent, he shall be liable [to a penalty]."
> Section 684: "For the purpose of giving jurisdiction under this Act, every offence shall be deemed to have been committed and every cause of complaint to have arisen either in the place in which the same actually was committed or arose, or in any place in which the offender or person complained against may be."
> Section 686 (1): "Where any person, being a British subject, is charged with having committed any offence on board any British ship on the high seas or in any foreign port or harbour or on board any foreign ship to which he does not belong, or, not being a British subject, is charged with having committed any offence on board any British ship on the high seas, and that person is found within the jurisdiction of any court in Her Majesty's dominions, which would have had cognizance of the offence if it had been committed on board a British ship within the limits of its ordinary jurisdiction, that court shall have jurisdiction to try the offence as if it had been so committed."

Lord Erleigh, K.C., and G. S. Harvie Watt for the appellant.
A. H. Armstrong for the respondent.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—I am clearly of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. The magistrate, in his very proper zeal for the interests of an alien, has allowed himself to be misled as to the true construction of the relevant sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. Those sections appear to be reasonably plain. [His Lordship read s. 237 (1), and continued:] The offence created by that section does not consist in secreting only, nor in going to sea only. The words "secretes himself and goes to sea" are a compound term, the two elements making one whole, and the offence consists in secreting and going to sea without the consent of any person entitled to give consent.

When one turns to the section relating to jurisdiction, s. 684 provides as follows: [His Lordship read the section, and continued:] The respondent came to Millwall Docks, London, and at the material time, namely, that of his arrest, he was, therefore, within the jurisdiction of the magistrate, but he was within that jurisdiction only for the purpose of being tried for an offence which the magistrate had jurisdiction to try. Had he jurisdiction to try the offence with which the respondent was charged? Section 686 is obviously divided into two parts, and as the respondent was not a British subject he could be tried for "any offence on board any British ship on the high seas."

I am of opinion that the offence with which the respondent was charged is plainly a continuing offence and that the contentions urged on behalf of the appellant were right. If the construction which the magistrate was induced to put on these sections were right, it seems to me that it would be difficult ever to say that the offence had been committed, because, on the one hand, at the inception of the matter, when the first step in the secreting took place, the answer of the person accused would be that he was not on the high seas, and later, when he was on the high seas, he would say that he was not secreting himself and that he had done that at the beginning. At no moment, therefore, would he be liable except, perhaps, if circumstances permitted, at a time when he both secreted himself and was on the high seas. On the interpretation of the relevant parts of the statute the contentions of the appellant were, in my opinion, clearly right and the magistrate had the jurisdiction which he declined.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add except that I think this was a very plain case.

SINGLETON, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Company—Winding-up—Voluntary winding-up—Duty of liquidator—Claim by landlords for rent—Duty to see that claim brought in—Companies Act, 1929 (19 & 20 Geo. 5, c. 23), s. 247, s. 261.

By leases dated Sept. 28, 1925, the plaintiffs demised premises to a company which entered into a personal covenant to pay the rent. In January, 1933, they granted the company a licence to assign, and the premises were assigned for the residue of the term of years granted by the lease. On April 1, 1933, the company went into voluntary liquidation and the defendant was appointed the liquidator. The liquidation was advertised in the "London Gazette" on April 4, 1933, but no other steps were taken to ascertain the creditors of the company, and on Aug. 31, 1933, the company was dissolved. At that time the known creditors had been paid and a return of the surplus assets made to the shareholders, and the rent had been paid, the company remaining solvent. Subsequently, the rent was not paid, and the plaintiffs found that the assignee was insolvent, and for the first time discovered that their lessees, the company, had gone into liquidation. On a claim by the plaintiffs that the defendant, in not having kept the assets of the company, had neglected his duty under s. 247 of the Companies Act, 1929, and was personally liable in damages,

Held: the company's liability for rent was a debt payable on a contingency within s. 261 of the Act of 1929 (for the assignee might have paid the rent) and capable of ascertainment, and, therefore, it was the duty of the defendant, as liquidator, to have seen that the plaintiffs' claim was brought in, and he, having failed in that duty, was liable to the plaintiffs in damages.

Hardy v. Fothergill (1) (1888), 13 App. Cas. 351, applied.

Notes. Sections 247 and 261 of the Companies Act, 1929, are reproduced in ss. 302 and 316 of the Companies Act, 1948, which repealed the Act of 1929.

Action for damages for breach of duty by the defendant under the Companies Act, 1929, s. 247.

BENNETT, J., held that the defendant was liable. The defendant appealed.

Harold Christie, K.C., and J. G. Strangman for the defendant.
Stable, K.C., and Montgomery White for the plaintiffs.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This appeal fails. The action was brought by Messrs. James Smith and Sons (Norwood), Ltd., against the defendant, Mr. Frank Ernest Goodman, in the circumstances which are set out in the careful judgment of BENNETT, J., and I do not intend to go through all the facts once more. Shortly put, the matter arises in this way. The plaintiffs made a demise of certain premises under two leases to a company called G. A. Brittain, Ltd., who were the lessees, and there was a personal covenant on the part of G. A. Brittain, Ltd., as tenants to pay the rent during the currency of the leases. The leases were for twenty-one years from Michaelmas, 1924, at considerable rents. In December, 1932, notice was given by the lessees to determine these leases, so that, in fact, they come to an end at Michaelmas, 1938, that being the closing of one of the periods of fourteen years at which a break was possible. In January, 1933, a licence to assign the premises was given and the premises were assigned. On April 1, 1933, a special resolution was passed for the voluntary liquidation of G. A. Brittain, Ltd., and the defendant was appointed liquidator. He had been appointed auditor of G. A. Brittain, Ltd., on Feb. 28, 1933, and when the voluntary liquidation was resolved upon he was appointed liquidator. He has been quite candid about it, and I do not want to obscure his candour, but it appears he had never acted as a liquidator before. To qualify himself in the discharge of his duties he purchased a textbook from which he hoped to derive sufficient information to enable him to discharge them properly. Unfortunately, that knowledge proved to be in the nature of a little knowledge being a dangerous thing. At any rate, the defendant was left under the impression, which he knows now to be wrong, that when an assignment takes place the liability of the tenant under the lease ceases. He had overlooked the continuing liability of the tenant under a demise, although there had been an assignment.

The liquidation of the company was swift. The learned judge says that the liquidation proceeded with the maximum speed and a minimum amount of publicity, and the only advertisement with regard to the liquidation of G. A. Brittain, Ltd., was an advertisement in the "London Gazette" of April 4, 1933. In no other paper was there any advertisement of the resolution, and no intimation was given to any creditor of the company that a resolution for voluntary liquidation had been passed.

As I say, I do not want to minimise the candour of the defendant, which one respects. He says he made a mistake. The company was dissolved on Aug. 31, 1933. What had been done at that time was the known creditors had been paid, and from the account which was put in before BENNETT, J., it appears that a return was made to the shareholders of G. A. Brittain, Ltd. In other words, the company remained solvent; it was able to meet, and did meet, its liabilities. At that time, in August, the rent had been fully paid, and there was no claim on the part of the plaintiffs for unpaid rent. Subsequently, at a later stage, there has been a default in the full payment of the rent. BENNETT, J., has come to the conclusion that there was a liability on the part of the defendant, who failed to do his duty as liquidator, and he holds it clearly proved before him that, if the liquidator had done his duty and had kept the assets, they would have been available to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim for rent under the lease, and he feels that he has no alternative but to hold that the defendant is liable to the plaintiffs for damages for breach of his statutory duty.

Here I will say a word as to what was the breach committed by the liquidator. I think that is clearly stated in a case which has now stood for over thirty-two years, the case before FARWELL, J., of Pulsford v. Devenish (2). There the headnote, following the judgment correctly, states:

> "It is the duty of a liquidator to find out from the books and papers of the company and the statement of affairs who are the creditors of the company, and if any creditor omits to put in his claim the liquidator should communicate with him."

FARWELL, J., holds that quite clearly. He says this ([1903] 2 Ch. at p. 631):

> "The defendant took no steps whatever to ascertain the claims of any creditors against the old company except by inserting advertisements in six London newspapers. He knew of the existence of this claim by the plaintiffs for the payments under the licence; but he says he did not know, and I accept his statement, of the existence of the claim for the lamps. If, however, he had performed that which I consider to be the duty of a liquidator, namely, not merely to advertise for creditors, but to write to the creditors of whose existence he knows, and who do not send in claims, and ask them if they have any claim, he would undoubtedly have received a claim, not merely for the instalments payable under the licence, but also for the purchase-money of the lamps."

It appears to me quite plain that the defendant misconceived his position, misconceived the effect of an assignment, failed to appreciate that there was this liability under the leases of which, of course, he knew, and he ought to have ascertained whether there was a claim which would be made by the plaintiffs.

In respect of such matters, s. 261 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, lays down:

> "In every winding-up (subject in the case of insolvent companies to the application in accordance with the provisions of this Act of the law of bankruptcy), all debts payable on a contingency, and all claims against the company, present or future, certain or contingent, ascertained or sounding only in damages, shall be admissible to proof against the company, a just estimate being made, so far as possible, of the value of such debts or claims as may be subject to any contingency or sound only in damages, or for some other reason do not bear a certain value."

In my opinion, this claim by the landlords against their tenant was clearly a liability in respect of which they could have brought in a proof. It was a contingent liability, for the assignee might have satisfied the liability for the rent, but it was a right which they had against the company who were their tenants under the demise, and who were liable to them under contract to pay the rent. That being so, if the liquidator had done his duty he would have seen that a claim was brought in.

What was the claim? It is suggested that it is impossible to ascertain, and that in those circumstances it was so contingent that it would not be possible to put a money value upon the claim. To my mind, the dicta in Hardy v. Fothergill (1) are directly contrary to any such suggestion. I need not refer to the various passages which were referred to in the course of the argument; but LORD SELBORNE, I think, makes it quite plain that there are cases where there are debts capable of valuation. He says (13 App. Cas. at p. 360) this:

> "There may be contracts, such, for example, as a promise to marry (not broken), or a covenant not to molest, or not to carry on a particular trade within certain limits, &c.; which, on a fair interpretation of these words, ought to be excluded as having a different object from the payment of money in any contingency; although if they were broken a jury might award damages for their breach. I must guard myself against being supposed to lay down any rule applicable to cases of that kind, or to any others in which an injunction or specific performance would be the most proper remedy. But the present is not a case of that kind. A contract to > indemnify against the non-performance of covenants in a lease, such as covenants to pay rent, or to keep the demised premises in repair, or to deliver them up in a proper state at the end of the term is, to all intents and purposes, 'an obligation or possibility of an obligation to pay money or money's worth' on the breach of any such covenant; it is 'an engagement to pay, or capable of resulting in the payment of, money or money's worth,' if the contingency against which the indemnity is provided should occur. Unless excluded (according to the view of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS) on the ground that the statute contemplates those liabilities only which are capable of being fairly valued, and that this particular liability is not capable of being fairly valued, it is, and must be included in those words."

It is true, as counsel for the defendant said, the court were considering words contained in a passage in the statute which does not find its place in the statute that we are considering at the present moment, but it is abundantly plain that LORD SELBORNE, in the words to which I have rather cursorily referred, intended to indicate that it was a liability which was a contingent liability, and one which was capable of being fairly valued. LORD MACNAGHTEN deals with the matter in more precise terms (13 App. Cas. at p. 369):

> "It was said that the trustee would have done a foolish thing if he had tried to estimate it, and that if he had put a value upon it, the court on appeal must have set the estimate aside. I cannot agree in this view. A covenant such as that which has given rise to the liability as between the lessor and the lessee is not uncommon. It is not an uncommon thing for leases to be assigned, and for the assignee to undertake the assignor's liability. I cannot think that a person of practical experience in dealing with leasehold property would have any great difficulty in making a fair estimate of the value of such a liability when he was once made acquainted with the circumstances of the particular case."

E

In those circumstances, it appears that here there was a liability under the demise which could have been and was proper for estimation, and since Hardy v. Fothergill (1), one must look at these contingent liabilities as provable in a liquidation or in a bankruptcy.

ROMER, L.J., in 1896, dealing with Re Panther Lead Co. (3), said this ([1896] 1 Ch. at p. 985):

> "Since the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill (1), the old cases as to proof by a lessor to a company in liquidation have to be reconsidered, as was pointed out by LINDLEY, L.J., in Re Midland Coal, Coke, and Iron Co., Craig's Claim (4) ([1895) 1 Ch. at p. 275), and certainly it will be the duty of the court to assist a lessor in proving in respect of the obligations of a company as lessee under its lease in all cases like the present where the lessor is desirous of proving at once for his loss on the footing of the lease being determined or treated as determined. It will be the duty of the court to assist a lessor in proving in respect of the obligations of a company as lessee under its lease in all cases like the present where the lessor is desirous of proving at once for his loss."

H

Of course, in some of the cases, as in Gooch v. London Banking Association (5), the liability which was said to rest upon the liquidator was that he ought to have set aside sufficient assets to provide for future rent and other liabilities under the lease. That may be so in proper cases, but it does not appear that that course is one which would be followed in all cases, and the liquidator would have the opportunity of going to the court if he was in difficulty as to what ought to be done.

I

Upon these facts and the findings of BENNETT, J., it appears to me that it is clear that there is a liability upon the defendant in respect of his breach of duty as liquidator.

His counsel argued that the plaintiffs had misconceived their remedies and that the only remedy which was open to them was one under which they could have proceeded under s. 294 of the Companies Act, 1929, that section giving power to the court to declare the dissolution of the company void. The only advantage of following that procedure, apparently, was to give the defendant some opportunity of raising points which, but for this, it would be difficult to raise at the present time. Why the plaintiffs should go and ask for a declaration that the dissolution of the company is void, I do not follow. The effect of that would be to restore the company into being, but with what result? There has been a distribution of the surplus assets back to the shareholders, and recalling that dissolution will not give animation to the company in the sense that it will once more restore to the coffers of the company the money that has been distributed to the shareholders. I do not find any authority for saying that that remedy is the only one. The cases that we have looked at are sufficient to show that if a creditor has been injured by the failure of the liquidator to take the steps that he ought to have taken, and has suffered damage, he can "succeed in the action on the case," as FARWELL, J., put it in Pulsford v. Devenish (2) in establishing a liability against the liquidator. That being so, it appears to me that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

BENNETT, J., made an order that there should be made an inquiry whether the plaintiffs have sustained any, and if so what, damage by reason of the defendant having acted wrongfully and in breach of his duty as such liquidator as aforesaid. Counsel for the defendant urged that this court should impose some directions which would be in the nature of limitations to that order for an inquiry. I think that would be unfortunate from the point of view of both the parties to the case. It occurs to me that in the course of the inquiry it would be open to the defendant to show that, if there had been a claim made by the plaintiffs for the rent it would have been contingent only and that at that time there was a good prospect of the liability being one remotely contingent only; on the other hand, it would be open to the plaintiffs to show that it was not a liability remotely contingent, but one which was a real liability, although contingent. The amount, therefore, that ought to have been allowed to proof by the plaintiffs ought not to have been merely a nominal sum, but something which would be based upon the real liability of G. A. Brittain, Ltd., to pay the rent under the demise. I think, therefore, the order made by BENNETT, J., is right and this inquiry must proceed, and it will be possible in that inquiry for both sides to discuss the question of what ought to be the quantification of the damages, as to which I do not desire to say anything more particular.

For these reasons the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—The plaintiffs are the lessors under two leases of September, 1925. The company were the lessees, and the rents payable are substantial in amount. The premises were at Brighton, and there was evidence given—and it appeared from the correspondence—that, like many other commercial premises in these hard times, they had ceased to be as valuable before the liquidation as they were at the date when they were granted. The directors of the company, who, it may be mentioned, included two solicitors who were acting for the company, were very desirous of getting rid of the leases, and negotiations shortly before the liquidation were entered into for that purpose. The landlords, the plaintiffs, declined to release the company from its obligations, and by a resolution dated April 1, 1933, the company, which was perfectly solvent, went into liquidation. The defendant was appointed the liquidator, the liquidation was conducted with extreme dispatch, the final meeting of the company was held on May 27, 1933, not much more than a month after the date of the resolution, and the company was finally dissolved on Aug. 31, 1933, the landlords of those large premises which had been in the possession of the company for a considerable period till shortly before the liquidation never having heard a word of the liquidation and not having had any communication made to them whatever in reference to the matter. At the date of the liquidation the lease had been assigned to one Kingsman. The assignment took place in January, 1933, some three months before the liquidation. Kingsman, however, subsequently assigned the premises, with the consent of the plaintiffs, to a company, Mann's Motors, Ltd. We have no evidence as to what their position was at the date of liquidation. We do, however, know that they were unable to pay any rent since Dec. 25 of that year, and that a large sum is now due to the plaintiffs in respect of rent, and when they sought to get their rent and found that Mann's Motors, Ltd., the tenants in occupation, were apparently insolvent, they made an application, or sought to make an application, against the company, G. A. Brittain, Ltd., and found out that it had been finally dissolved. Hence this action. A

I wish to add nothing further to what the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has said with regard to the negligence from which unfortunately the defendant cannot be absolved. The defendant misunderstood the position, and, apparently, abstained from making inquiries from the directors of the company, including the solicitors of the company, which would have resulted in showing that the plaintiff company had a claim in liquidation, and, therefore, there is, in my opinion, no doubt whatever that he was guilty of negligence in not making some provision for the liability of the company under the two leases in question. We have heard a long argument as to what the nature of the provision should have been. For my part I am satisfied that since the decision in Hardy v. Fothergill (1) it has been impossible to doubt but that a company in liquidation, and a fortiori a perfectly solvent company in liquidation, is bound to submit to the assessment under the Companies Act of its contingent liability to a landlord in such a case as the present, that is to say, in a case in which the company in liquidation is no longer interested in the lease. The lease having been assigned to third parties, the only question is whether the landlords are not entitled, under s. 261, to prove for the debt as one payable on a contingency or to prove as for a claim against the company, "present or future, certain or contingent, ascertained or sounding only in damages," arising by reason of the fact that the company has covenanted to pay the rent to the landlords during the continuance of the lease. I have said that in such a case as the present, in my opinion, there never was any doubt about the right of proof; but I am not forgetting that where the company is itself the tenant at the time of liquidation considerable difficulty may arise as to what the precise right may be. Two cases particularly may arise. The company may desire to surrender and the lessor may be unwilling to let him do so, and the liquidator may be unwilling to surrender, though the lessor may be willing to accept the surrender on terms as to proof or otherwise. Those circumstances do not exist here, and as a matter of fact since the Act of 1928 will seldom arise, for under s. 267 of the present Act there is what there was not, I think, before the Act, a right of disclaimer when a company was in liquidation. B C D E F

In my opinion, in the case which we have here, where the company is no longer interested in the lease, there is no serious difficulty in estimating the amount for which the lessor is entitled to prove and all the Lords in Hardy v. Fothergill (1) expressed, as I think, an opinion which would cover this comparatively simple case. I will mention that LORD SELBORNE (13 App. Cas. at p. 362) referred to a dictum of MELLISH, L.J., in Re Hoyle, Ex parte Waters (6), intimating a doubt as to the right of proof in respect of the liability of a lessee who had assigned his lease under the covenants in the lease, and LORD SELBORNE disagreed with the expression of opinion by MELLISH, L.J., if he meant to intimate an opinion that that liability could never be provable in bankruptcy, and said that he was not able to find sufficient ground for it in the words of the statute before him, which was the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. Other passages which have been referred to, in the speeches of LORD HALSBURY and LORD MACNAGHTEN, seem to me beyond all doubt to show that the liability here in question was capable of estimate, and I would add that all the textbooks, BUCKLEY, PALMER and STIEGEL, concur in thinking that since the case of Hardy v. Fothergill (1) that was a perfectly feasible course, at any rate, in such a case as the present. G H

Accordingly, in my opinion, we have not to consider here whether the course taken in Gooch v. London Banking Association (5), and, I may add, in other cases, of declining to allow the final winding-up of the company and the distribution of all its assets without making provision for a landlord's claim under his lease was the right one. I am content to agree with the view expressed by my brethren that here was a claim which could properly be proved under s. 261 of the present Act. The result is that the liquidator, acting no doubt in complete good faith, but still in breach of his duty, committed a breach of his statutory duty to pay the debts of the company, and the case is exactly within the decision of FARWELL, J., in Pulsford v. Devenish (2), with the result that the I defendant is liable in damages to the unpaid creditor of the company whom we have before us, namely, the plaintiff in the present action.

It has been argued that the fact that there is now a section under which the company can be restored to the register differentiates the present from the case of Pulsford v. Devenish (2). I do not take that view. I think that the decision of FARWELL, J., that it was an absolute statutory duty on the liquidator to pay the debts out of the assets of the company remains just as valid as when he pronounced it, and the mere fact that under certain circumstances there may be a setting aside of a dissolution and the restoration to the register under s. 294 does not qualify that in any way. The amount of the damages which will be recoverable must be left at the present moment in doubt. There are many circumstances which we have not before us, and I wish to express no opinion upon that matter. I am satisfied to say that the judgment of the learned judge can be supported on the grounds which we have mentioned. It is true that he did not actually decide that the debt was provable and was content with the statement that the statutory duty on a liquidator had not been complied with. We have to that extent clarified the matter, but that does not affect the correctness of the inquiry which he has directed. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SHEFFIELD BURGESSES v. MINISTER OF HEALTH

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Swift, J.), December 17, 1935]

Housing—Clearance area—Compulsory purchase of adjoining land—Purchase necessary for satisfactory development of clearance area in conjunction with other, neighbouring, clearance areas—Housing Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 29), s. 3.

A local authority made, and the Minister of Health confirmed, an order for the compulsory purchase of certain land adjoining a clearance area. The acquisition of that land was reasonably necessary for the carrying out of a scheme for the development of that clearance area in conjunction with other clearance areas in the neighbourhood, but would not have been necessary had it been proposed to develop the area as a separate unit.

Held: under s. 3 of the Housing Act, 1930, the local authority had power to make, and the Minister of Health had power to confirm, the compulsory purchase order.

Notes. Section 3 of the Housing Act, 1930, was replaced by s. 27 of the Housing Act, 1936, which in turn has been replaced by s. 43 of the Housing Act, 1957. The Minister concerned is now the Minister of Housing and Local Government.

As to clearance areas and purchase of land, see 26 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 533 et seq., and for cases, see 38 DIGEST 212 et seq. For Housing Act, 1936, see 11 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 444.

Application under s. 11 of the Housing Act, 1930, asking that a compulsory purchase order, made by Sheffield Corporation and confirmed by the Minister of Health, should be quashed, on the ground that it applied to land adjacent to, but not forming part of, a clearance area, and that it was not reasonably necessary for the development of that clearance area that the land in question should be purchased.

The question involved was the construction of s. 3 of the Act of 1930, which provided as follows:

> "Where as respects any area declared by them to be a clearance area a local authority determine to purchase any land comprised in the area, they may purchase also . . . any adjoining land the acquisition of which is reasonably necessary for the satisfactory development or user of the cleared area."

The corporation of Sheffield had made compulsory purchase orders in respect of four areas numbered 74B, 75, 76, and 77. No question arose in respect of the first three areas. In the case of area 77, part of that area (which was coloured pink on the corporation's map) had been declared by resolution to be a clearance area, and another part (coloured grey on the map) did not form part of any clearance area.

The Minister of Health had stated in a letter to the town clerk of Sheffield that the acquisition of the grey land in area 77 was necessary for the satisfactory development of all the land in areas 74B, 75, 76, and 77, but that its acquisition would not have been necessary for the development of area 77 alone. The Minister considered that that brought the case within s. 3, and he confirmed the order.

The applicants, who were the owners of the land coloured grey, contended that the section only authorised the purchase of that land if it were required for the development of the land coloured pink in area 77, and that the section gave no power to purchase it for the purpose of developing land which was not adjacent to it.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Donald Somervell, K.C.) and Valentine Holmes for the Minister of Health.

SWIFT, J.—By a resolution passed by the council of the city of Sheffield on July 4, 1934, the city council declared an area in Broad-lane and Wheeldon-street in the city to be a clearance area within the meaning of s. 1 (1) of the Housing Act, 1930, and they ultimately decided by a resolution of Nov. 9, 1934, for the purpose of giving effect to their object in securing the demolition of the houses in that area, that they should purchase the land comprised in the area under s. 1 (3) (ii), and themselves undertake the demolition of the buildings thereof.

When the land was cleared of buildings it became quite clear that for its development or advantageous user it would not have to be dealt with as a small piece of land which is coloured pink on the maps referred to in the resolutions, but would have to be dealt with, in order that the most satisfactory development of that small piece could be attained, as part of a larger scheme. If the corporation had merely secured the demolition of the houses on it, and had either left the land, as they might have done, in the possession of its owners, or if they had bought the land and taken the existing insanitary houses down, it would have been impossible to have developed or used that land in the most satisfactory manner when it stood in the midst of other dwellings and other land, and in order to use or develop it in the most satisfactory manner it was obvious to the corporation that it should be developed and used in conformity with, and along with, other lands in the neighbourhood which they were securing, and which they proposed to develop, together with the part coloured pink in No. 77. That was clearly, I think, their object. The question which is to be decided is: Had they any power to attain that object under the Housing Act, 1930? There may be some other Act of Parliament under which they might attain that object, or they might secure a private Act of Parliament of their own to enable them to do it, but the question which I have to decide is: Can they do it under the Act of 1930? The corporation say that they can do so under the provisions of s. 3 of the Act of 1930. That section provides:

> "Where as respects any area declared by them to be a clearance area a local authority determine to purchase any land comprised in the area, they may purchase also any land which is surrounded by the clearance area and the acquisition of which is reasonably necessary for the purpose of securing a cleared area of convenient shape and dimensions . . ."

It seems to me that the corporation clearly could not act under those words of that section. The land which they propose to purchase in this area is not land which is surrounded by the clearance area; it surrounds the clearance area. The section goes on to provide that the local authority may purchase "any adjoining land the acquisition of which is reasonably necessary for the satisfactory development or user of the cleared area." The part which is coloured grey on the map, and which this authority is seeking to purchase is clearly adjoining land. Counsel for the applicants disputed that proposition. It is said that the acquisition of that adjoining land is reasonably necessary for the satisfactory development and user of the cleared area—that is to say, in acquiring it the corporation have got to have in mind the development or user of the cleared area, they have to have in mind the satisfactory development and user of it, and then they have got to be satisfied and have got to satisfy the Minister that the land which they are seeking to purchase compulsorily is reasonably necessary for that satisfactory user. If they go to the Minister asking for powers to buy land compulsorily which is not reasonably necessary for the satisfactory development of the land in the cleared area, they will not get those powers; the Minister would simply say to them: "This is not reasonably necessary." Even if the Minister gave them power, if the applicants came to this court and satisfied the court that there was no material upon which it could be said that the land was reasonably required, or that it was reasonably necessary for the satisfactory development of the cleared area, the court would quash the order. It is for the corporation in the first place to say whether it is reasonably necessary or not; it is for the Minister in the second place to say whether it is reasonably necessary or not, and it is for this court, if the matter is brought before this court, to say whether there is any material upon which the Minister could have come to the conclusion that it was reasonably necessary. If this court comes to the conclusion that there is no such material, then this court will not hesitate to quash the Minister's order.

Looking at this matter in that way I have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to say that there was not ample material before the corporation, and before the Minister for saying that for the satisfactory development of that piece of land which is coloured pink in area No. 77, it was reasonably necessary to acquire the land which is coloured grey. When you are deciding how you will develop or how you will use your land, you cannot build a high brick wall around it and say: "I must look only at what is inside that wall, and I must not let my eyes wander beyond." When you are talking of developing land or when you are considering the most advantageous user of the land, you look around and see what can be done to the best advantage with your piece of land and see if you can get your neighbour to join with you in carrying out a common scheme for development, or, better still, see if you can purchase your neighbour's land and so develop the whole of it yourself.

Here the corporation of Sheffield had got parts of their city which were encumbered with a considerable number of insanitary dwelling-houses, and they divided them into areas, as I think they were bound to divide them, for the purpose of effecting the improvements for the safety of the people living there which is required by the legislature. When they come to consider what they are to do with the areas, I do not think it can be said that they are not, in considering what is best to be done in developing the area in No. 77, to look and see what it is possible to do with areas No. 76, No. 75, and No. 74B. It may be obvious to anybody experienced and expert in these matters that the proper course, the sensible course, and the business-like course of dealing with No. 77 for its reasonable and satisfactory development and user, is to treat it as part of a whole with Nos. 74B, 75, and 76. That is what it seems to me the corporation have done in this case, and what I venture to think the Minister very properly did, as evidenced by the letter which he wrote on August 23, 1935, where he said:

> "As regards the areas in compulsory purchase orders 74B, 75 and 76 he is satisfied that in each case the land proposed to be purchased under s. 3 is reasonably necessary for the satisfactory development of the areas quite apart from the proposed development of any of the adjoining areas. In the case of the land comprised in compulsory purchase order 77, the position is somewhat different. In that case the Minister would not have been prepared to regard the whole of the grey land as reasonably necessary for the satisfactory development of the cleared area in the absence of any knowledge of the proposed development of the adjoining areas. He > is advised, however, that in considering what is a satisfactory development of a cleared area it is right and necessary to have regard to the character and proposed development of the land in the immediate neighbourhood. It is, indeed, obvious that the probable development of this neighbouring land may profoundly affect the use to which the cleared area should be put, and the fact that, as in the present case, the neighbouring land will be developed by the local authorities themselves, does not make it any the less necessary to take such development into consideration. Thus, in the present instance, if for any reason compulsory purchase orders 74B, 75 and 76 had not been made and there had been no prospect of the development for housing purposes of the land included in those areas, the Minister would not have regarded the whole of the grey land included in compulsory purchase order 77 as necessary for the purpose of that order. In view, however, of the proposed user of the land in the first three orders as the site of blocks of flats forming, together with the proposed flats on the land in compulsory purchase order 77, a single and complete scheme of development, the Minister is satisfied that the whole of the grey land in the last-mentioned order is reasonably necessary for the satisfactory development of the cleared area comprised in order 77."

I cannot say that the Minister was wrong in coming to that conclusion. Whether I agree with him or not is immaterial, but incidentally I may say I do. The only question is whether there was material upon which he could come to the conclusion that this land was reasonably necessary for the satisfactory development of the land in the cleared area. I think there was such material, and this application must be dismissed.

Application dismissed.

Electricity—Supply—Delivery of energy—Consumer's terminals—Need to be within undertaker's area of supply.

On the true interpretation of the Electrical (Supply) Acts delivery of electrical energy must be made at the consumer's terminals, and those terminals must be placed upon some land or some building upon land for which electrical energy is required, and that land or building must be within the undertaker's area of supply.

Action

The plaintiffs, the Attorney-General (at the relation of the Kent Electric Power Co.) and the Kent Electric Power Co., claimed against the defendants, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Gravesend, an injunction to restrain them from supplying electrical energy to the premises of the Cellactite and British Uralite, Ltd., and of the Atlas Stone Co., Ltd., or from supplying otherwise electrical energy beyond the defendants' authorised area of supply.

The defendants were supplying electrical energy under the provisions of three statutory orders: (i) An Electric Lighting Order, confirmed by the Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 5) Act, 1898; (ii) the Gravesend Electricity Extension Special Order of 1928, made by the Electricity Commissioners under the Electricity (Supply) Acts and confirmed by the Minister of Transport under the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919; (iii) the Gravesend Electricity Extension Special Order, 1931, made by the same authority. There were incorporated into these orders the provisions in the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899. Clause 4 of that Schedule provides that

> "(1) the area of supply shall be the area named for that purpose in the special order; (2) the undertakers shall not at any time after the commencement of this special order supply energy or (except for the purposes of that order) erect or lay down any electric lines or works beyond the area of supply otherwise than under the authority of Parliament, or under a licence granted by the Board of Trade under the principal Act."

The plaintiffs, the Kent Electrical Power Co., were authorised to supply electrical energy in the county of Kent, except the Isle of Thanet. They alleged that the defendants were supplying electrical energy outside the area in which they were authorised to supply it by the above-mentioned orders, because they were supplying electrical energy to the premises of the Cellactite and British Uralite Co., and also to those of the Atlas Stone Co., and the premises of both those companies were outside the said area. Originally the defendants had been authorised to supply electrical energy to the two companies under the provisions of a fringe order made by the Electricity Commissioners on Jan. 25, 1929, under s. 6 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1909, which provides as follows:

> "Where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade that the occupier of any premises is desirous of obtaining a supply of electricity from any undertakers within whose area of supply those premises are not situate, the Board of Trade may, if the local authority, within whose district the premises are situate, and the undertakers (if any) authorised to supply electricity to such premises, consent, by order permit the first-mentioned undertakers to give a supply to those premises on such terms and subject to such conditions as the board think fit."

The fringe order of Jan. 25, 1929, was in these terms:

> "Whereas application has been made to the Electricity Commissioners under the provisions of the Electricity (Supply) Acts, 1882 to 1928, by the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the borough of Gravesend (hereinafter called 'the undertakers') being undertakers for the supply of electricity within the borough of Gravesend for an order under those Acts authorising the supply of electricity to the premises of Cellactite and British Uralite, Ltd., and Hodson's Concrete Units, Ltd., situate within the rural district of Strood and whereas the Electricity Commissioners have considered such application. Now therefore the Electricity Commissioners in pursuance of the powers exercisable by them on behalf of the Minister of Transport under the aforesaid Acts hereby order that as from the date hereof the undertakers may supply electricity to the said premises notwithstanding that the same are outside the area of supply of the undertakers subject to the same obligations but with the same rights in all respects as if the said premises were within that area and may break up such streets and roads and may lay down and place therein such electric lines and other works as may be necessary for that purpose under and in accordance with the provisions of the Electricity (Supply) Acts, 1882 to 1928, and of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, with respect to the breaking up of streets and the laying down and placing therein of electric lines and other works by undertakers who are not the local authority of the district. This order is subject to revocation whenever any undertakers in whose area of supply such premises may be situate are able and willing to give a supply to such premises on reasonable terms and to pay to the undertakers such portion of the expenditure > incurred by the undertakers in giving such supply as may be agreed or failing agreement as may be determined to be reasonable by an arbitrator to be appointed by the Minister of Transport."

Hodson's Concrete Units, Ltd., were the predecessors of the Atlas Stone Co. The fringe order having been made, the energy was brought from the defendants' generating station to the premises of the Cellactite Co., and the Atlas Stone Co. by an overhead cable suspended from poles placed on the towpath of a canal, which was the property of the Southern Railway Co., with the consent of that company.

In 1933 the plaintiff company applied to the Electricity Commissioners that the said fringe order by which the defendants were authorised to supply electrical energy to the two companies should be revoked, and on Oct. 6, 1933, the Electricity Commissioners revoked the fringe order, the order of revocation providing that: "The Electricity Commissioners are satisfied that the company" (i.e., the plaintiff company), "are able and willing to give a supply to such premises on reasonable terms."

In the meantime the defendants made an agreement on Sept. 27, 1933, with the Cellactite Co., which provided, by cl. (2):

> "The company shall take and the corporation shall give a supply of electricity at a point within the area of supply of the corporation being the point at which a meter or meters referred to in par. 4 hereof shall be placed."

Clauses (4) and (5) provided:

> "The corporation will provide all necessary service cables which shall terminate at or near the eastern boundary of the parish of Chalk in the rural district of Strood in the county of Kent being a point within the area of supply of the corporation where the corporation will also provide the necessary meter or meters. Clause (5): In consideration of this agreement the corporation hereby sell and the company hereby purchase all cables poles and other appliances and equipment at present belonging to the corporation to the east of the point where the said meter or meters shall be fixed which were originally provided by the corporation for the purpose of supplying electricity to the works of the company situate in the parish of Shorne in the rural district of Strood in the county of Kent."

On Sept. 29, 1933, an agreement was entered into between the Southern Railway Co. and the Cellactite Co. by which the Southern Railway Co. granted to the Cellactite Co. the right

> "to maintain and use in or upon through or over the company's property at or near the Gravesend and Higham Canal in the county of Kent the works more particularly described in the schedule."

The works more particularly described in the schedule were described as

> "eighteen wooden poles along the course of the towing path of the Gravesend and Higham Canal and a three-core electric cable . . . suspended at least 22 ft. above the surface of the said towing path on the said poles, and also passing under the said canal in one place, the route of such cable being indicated by a red line on the plan attached hereto."

At the same time another agreement was made between the Southern Railway Co. and the defendants whereby the defendants were given a licence to place a line of poles and to suspend from those poles a cable between their generating station and, approximately, the point at which the way-leave of the Cellactite Co. began in the west.

The pole upon which the defendants placed the meter referred to in cl. (4) of the agreement of Sept. 27, 1933, was numbered 39 on the agreed plan and was within the area in which the defendants were authorised to supply electrical energy. The cables running from that pole in an easterly direction to the works of the Cellactite Co. and the Atlas Stone Co. were outside the defendants' area.

The plaintiffs contended that upon the true construction of the Electric Lighting Acts the defendants were bound to deliver electrical energy at the consumers' terminals, and the delivery must be made entirely within the defendants' area of supply, but as a matter of fact the consumers' terminals were outside the defendants' area of supply and, therefore, the defendants were acting illegally. On the other hand the defendants contended that they were delivering electrical energy at the meter on the pole which was numbered 39, and that point was within their boundary, and that, moreover, the consumers had agreed to take delivery of the energy at that point, and therefore the defendants were not infringing any statutory prohibition against supplying electrical energy beyond the area of supply.

Tyldesley Jones, K.C., and A. Andrewes-Uthwatt for the plaintiffs.
Montgomery, K.C., and S. M. Noakes for the defendants.

BENNETT, J., stated the facts and continued: On those facts the defendants say: "We are delivering electrical energy within our area of supply. We are delivering our electrical energy at the meter on the pole which has been numbered 39, and that point is within our boundary," and they say: "So long as we are delivering energy within our boundary and so long as the consumer has agreed to take delivery of our energy within our boundary, we are not infringing the statutory prohibition against supplying beyond the area of supply."

The plaintiffs say that, upon the true construction of the Electric Lighting Acts and, in particular, the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, and the provisions in the Schedule to that Act which are incorporated into the defendants' orders, the defendants infringe the prohibition if they deliver electrical energy otherwise than at the consumer's terminals, and that the consumer's terminals must be found to be within the undertaker's area of supply. They say that in this case there are not to be found at pole 39 any consumer's terminals and that the provisions of the statute prohibit undertakers and consumers from making an arrangement or an agreement which will enable the undertakers to deliver electrical energy at any other place except the consumer's terminals. Their argument is that TOMLIN, J., and NEVILLE, J., have so decided.

The question depends to some extent upon the definition of three terms which are to be found in the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, which are incorporated in the defendants' orders. By the first clause of the Schedule "main" is defined as > "any electric line which may be laid down by the undertakers in any street or public place, and through which energy may be supplied or intended to be supplied by the undertakers for the purposes of general supply."

"'Service line' means any electric line through which energy may be supplied or intended to be supplied by the undertakers to a consumer either from any main or directly from the premises of the undertakers." "The expression 'consumer's terminals' means the ends of the electric lines situate upon any consumer's premises and belonging to him, at which the supply of energy is delivered from the service lines." The first argument of counsel for the defendants was that by the agreement of Sept. 27, 1933, the defendants and the Cellactite Co. had agreed that the defendants should supply the electricity to the Cellactite Co. within their area and that the Cellactite Co. had agreed to take delivery of supply within the defendants' area. I think by cl. 2 they have so agreed. His next point on the agreement was that by it all the cables outside the defendants' area, by which electricity was delivered to the Cellactite Co., had been made the property of the Cellactite Co., and I think that is the effect of cl. 5 of the agreement. Then he argued that the service line of the defendants ended at the point at which the defendants had erected a meter in accordance with the provisions of the agreement of Sept. 27, 1933, namely, at pole 39. Then he argued that the Cellactite Co.'s terminals were to be found at that point, his argument being that at that point there was something which could properly be described as the consumer's premises.

I am quite satisfied that, upon a proper construction of cl. 1 of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, the point at which the wires or lines of the Cellactite Co. meet the lines which are the property of the defendants is not the consumer's terminals as defined by the Schedule. Consumer's terminals must, in my judgment, be found upon some land or some building upon land for which electrical energy is required.

I cannot hold that upon a proper construction of cl. 1 of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, the terminals of the Cellactite Co. are at pole 39. If that be so, then, if TOMLIN, J., and NEVILLE, J., have decided that "supply" within the meaning of the Electric Lighting Acts means supply at the consumer's terminals, it seems to me that the defendants are infringing the prohibition of the order.

The question is whether TOMLIN, J., and NEVILLE, J., did so decide. After having read the judgment of TOMLIN, J., and after having had it discussed by counsel for both parties, and after having heard the judgment of NEVILLE, J., in A.-G. v. Leicester Coprn. (1) discussed, I come to the conclusion that they have decided that "supply," for the purposes of the Acts, means supply at the consumer's terminals, and once that conclusion is reached it becomes clear that if delivery is made to a consumer at some place other than his terminals, even if the place of delivery is within the area of the undertakers, the prohibition is infringed, if the supply so delivered is used outside the undertakers' area. On the true interpretation of the statute, delivery must be made at a consumer's terminals, and those terminals must be placed upon some land or some building upon land for which electrical energy is required, and that land or building must be within the undertakers' area of supply.

The result is that, in my judgment, the action succeeds and the plaintiffs are entitled to the injunction which they claim. There will be an order upon the defendants to pay the plaintiffs' costs.

Police—Execution of duty—Prevention of apprehended breach of peace—Public meeting sought to be held in same circumstances as previous meeting resulting in breach.

The appellant obstructed an inspector of police by attempting to address a street meeting, the holding of which at the particular place had been prohibited by the inspector. Neither the appellant nor any of the persons attending the meeting had either committed, incited, or provoked any breach of the peace, but a previous meeting addressed by the appellant at the same place had terminated in disorder, and the inspector reasonably apprehended that, if the meeting in question were held at the particular place, a breach of the peace would follow.

Held: it was the duty of the police to prevent an apprehended breach of the peace and it was reasonable to apprehend such a breach if it was sought to hold a public meeting in the same place as that in which a previous meeting, which had been addressed by the same speaker and had resulted in a breach of the peace, had been held; and, therefore, the inspector was right in prohibiting the holding of the meeting in question at the particular place, and the appellant was rightly convicted of obstructing him when in the execution of his duty.

Case Stated by County of London Quarter Sessions.

An information was preferred by William Jones, an inspector of the metropolitan police (the respondent), against Mrs. Katherine Duncan (the appellant), under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, s. 12, as amended by the Prevention of Crimes Amendment Act, 1885, s. 2, alleging that on July 30, 1934, the appellant did unlawfully and wilfully obstruct the respondent when in the execution of his duty. The appellant was convicted at Tower Bridge police court of the offence charged and was fined 40s. and five guineas for costs. From that conviction she appealed to the County of London Quarter Sessions.

On the hearing of the appeal to quarter sessions the following facts were proved or admitted:—At about 1 p.m. on July 30, 1934, about thirty people, including the appellant, collected with a view to holding a meeting in Nynehead-street, New Cross, S.E., near to the entrance to an unemployed training centre situated in that street. At the entrance to Nynehead-street the following notice was written across the roadway:—

"Sedition"

Meeting at the Test Centre
To-day (now), 1 p.m.

Speakers: R. Kidd (Council for Civil Liberties).
A. Bing (Barrister-at-Law).
E. Hanley (Amalgamated Engineers' Union).
K. Duncan (National Unemployed Workers' Movement).
Defend the Right of Free Speech and Public Meeting.

A box was placed in the roadway opposite the entrance to the training centre, on which the appellant was about to mount when the chief constable of the district, with whom was the inspector, told the appellant that a meeting could not be held in Nynehead-street, but that it could be held in Desmond-street, some 175 yds. distant. The appellant said: "I'm going to hold it," stepped on to the box, and began to address the people who were present, when the inspector immediately took her into custody to which she submitted without resistance. Nynehead-street was a cul-de-sac with houses on one side and the training centre on the other. It was not alleged on behalf of the inspector that there was any obstruction of the highway or of the access to the training centre save in the sense of the obstruction necessarily caused by the box, which was placed in the roadway, and by the presence of the people surrounding it. Neither the appellant nor any of the persons present at the meeting had either committed, incited, or provoked a breach of the peace. On May 25, 1933, however, a meeting had been held opposite the entrance to the training centre which the appellant addressed, and after that meeting a disturbance took place at the training centre. The superintendent of the training centre, who attributed the disturbance to the meeting, sent for the police to prevent a breach of the peace. Subsequently the appellant made one or more attempts to hold a meeting at the same spot, which attempts were frustrated by the police. Before July 30, 1934, the superintendent of the training centre, who feared a repetition of the previous disturbance, communicated with the police, and, by reason of that communication and of reports made by the police in the course of their duty, the chief constable of the district and the inspector apprehended that a breach of the peace would result if the meeting of July 30, 1934, were held.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the respondent was not acting in the execution of his duty, inasmuch as neither the appellant nor any of the persons present at the meeting provoked or incited a breach of the peace or gave the respondent cause to suspect that any of them was about to commit a breach of the peace. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the appellant had been rightly convicted. A

The justices of quarter sessions were of opinion that the appellant must have known of the probable consequences of her holding the meeting, namely, a disturbance, and possibly a breach of the peace, and was not unwilling that those consequences should ensue; that the respondent reasonably apprehended a breach of the peace, and it, therefore, became his duty to prevent the holding of the meeting; and that, by attempting to hold the meeting, the appellant obstructed him in the execution of his duty. They B accordingly dismissed the appeal. The appellant appealed to the Divisional Court.

Pritt, K.C., and Dingle Foot for the appellant.

Montgomery, K.C., and Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

LORD HEWART, C.J. [after stating the facts and the contentions of the parties, continued:] There have been moments during the argument in this case when it ap- C peared to be suggested that the court was being confronted with a grave case involving what is called the right of public meeting. I say "called" because English law does not recognise any special right of public meeting either for a political or any other purpose. The right of assembly, as PROFESSOR DICEY puts it (LAW OF THE CONSTITUTION (8th Edn.) p. 499), is nothing more than a view taken by the courts of individual liberty of the person and individual liberty of speech. If I thought that the present case raised the D question which has been held in suspense by more than one writer on constitutional law—namely, whether an assembly can properly be held to be unlawful merely because the holding of it is expected to give rise to a breach of the peace on the part of persons opposed to those who are holding the meeting—I should wish to hear much more argument before expressing an opinion. It seems to me that this case does not even touch that important question. E

Our attention has been directed to the somewhat unsatisfactory case of Beatty v. Gillbanks (1). The circumstances of that case and the charge must be remembered, as also must the important passage in the judgment of FIELD, J., in which CAVE, J., concurred. FIELD, J., said (9 Q.B.D. at p. 314):

> "I entirely concede that everyone must be taken to intend the natural consequences of his own acts, and it is clear to me that if this disturbance of the peace was the F natural consequence of acts of the appellants they would be liable, and the justices would have been right in binding them over. But the evidence set forth in the Case does not support this contention; on the contrary, it shows that the disturbances were caused by other people antagonistic to the appellants, and that no acts of violence were committed by them."

G

After referring to a well-known passage in HAWKINS'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN, Bk. I., c. 28, Part IV, s. 9, he continued:

> "In each [of the examples there given] the circumstances of terror exist in the assembly itself, either in its object, or mode of carrying it out, and there is the widest difference between such cases and the present."

H

Our attention has also been invited to other authorities, especially in Ireland, where the judgments in Beatty v. Gillbanks (1) have been referred to, but they do not carry the matter any further, although they more than once express a doubt about the exact meaning of the decision. In my view, Beatty v. Gillbanks (1) is far apart from the present case. No such question as that which arose there is even mooted here.

The present case reminds one rather of the observations of BRAMWELL, B., in R. v. I Prebble (2), where he said, in holding that a police constable had had no right to remove persons from a certain inn:

> "It would have been otherwise had there been a nuisance or disturbance of the public peace, or any danger of a breach of the peace."

The Case Stated which we have before us indicates clearly a causal connection between the meeting of May, 1933, and the disturbance which occurred after it—that the disturbance was not only post the meeting but was also propter the meeting. In my view, the deputy chairman was entitled to come to the conclusion to which he came on the facts which he has found and to hold that the conviction of the appellant for wilfully obstructing the respondent in the execution of his duty was right. I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I agree. I regard this as a plain case, raising no question of importance or novelty. It has nothing to do with the law of unlawful assembly. No charge of that sort was even suggested against the appellant. The sole question raised by the Case is whether the respondent, who was admittedly obstructed, was so obstructed when in the execution of his duty. It does not require authority to emphasise the statement that it is the duty of a police officer to prevent apprehended breaches of the peace. Here it is found as a fact that the respondent reasonably apprehended a breach of the peace. It then, as the Case rightly states, became his duty to prevent anything which in his view would cause that breach of the peace. While he was taking steps so to prevent a reasonably apprehended breach of the peace he was wilfully obstructed by the appellant. I can conceive no clearer case within the statute than that.

SINGLETON, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the facts stated in the Case I am satisfied that the respondent was acting in the execution of his duty at the material time. It also seems to me to be clear that at that time he was doing what it was his duty to do, and that, therefore, the obstruction of him by the appellant constituted obstruction of him when in the execution of his duty. Authorities in other branches of the law do not carry this matter any further.

Appeal dismissed.

Income Tax—Foreign trust—Power to revoke trusts and claim whole income—Income payable by foreign trustee to taxpayer at taxpayer's direction—Liability to tax of whole income—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), Sched. D, Case V, r. 1, r. 2—Finance Act, 1922 (12 & 13 Geo. 5, c. 17), s. 20 (1).

The appellant was a national of, and resident in, the United Kingdom. By a settlement dated Sept. 13, 1929, he transferred American stocks and shares to a trust company in New York. That company, as trustee of the settlement, was directed, after paying taxes and other expenses properly chargeable against income, to pay the balance to or for the use of the appellant during his life in such amounts and at such dates as he might from time to time direct, and on the death of the appellant to distribute the capital as the appellant should by will appoint, and in default of such appointment to transfer the capital to the issue of the appellant in equal shares per stirpes. Power was reserved to the appellant during his lifetime by instrument under seal to revoke, modify or change the settlement as he thought fit. It was agreed that the settlement was governed by A the law of New York State, and under that law the appellant had no proprietary interest, legal or equitable, either in the corpus of the trust or the specific dividends or interest, but the whole legal and equitable proprietary interest therein was vested in the trustee. The sole right which the appellant had was the right in equity to enforce performance of the trust against the trustee, and in particular to call upon him to pay over the balance of the income. Under the law of New York State, B the power of revocation of the settlement was valid, but, unless and until it was actually exercised, had no effect on the nature of the rights accruing under the settlement to the trustee and the appellant respectively. The power had not been exercised. The appellant was assessed to income tax under r. 1 of the Rules applicable to Case V in Sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, on the basis that the whole of the income arising from the trust fund must be deemed to be his under C the Finance Act, 1922, s. 20 (1) (a).

Held: the income of the trust fund was the income of the trustee, i.e. the income of a foreign person not resident in this country, and not within the ambit of the Income Tax Acts, and s. 20 (1) (a) of the Act of 1922 did not apply to it, since the application of that provision was limited to income chargeable to tax under the current British Finance Act; and, therefore, the appellant was chargeable to tax D under r. 2 of Case V of Sched. D, in respect of the amounts actually received by him in the United Kingdom.

Marchioness of Ormonde v. Brown (1) (1932), 17 Tax. Cas. 333, approved.

Notes. The Finance Act, 1922, s. 20 (1) (a), was repealed by the Finance Act, 1938, and superseded by s. 38 (1) (a) of that Act which in turn was repealed by the Income Tax Act, 1952, and was superseded by s. 404 (1) (a) of that Act. E

ASTOR v. PERRY (INSPECTOR OF TAXES)

Appeal by the taxpayer, the Hon. W. W. Astor, from the decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HANWORTH, M.R., SLESSER and ROMER, L.JJ.) on a Case Stated under I the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149, by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

The Case Stated was as follows:

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, held on March 13, 1933, for the purpose of hearing appeals, the Hon. W. W. Astor, hereinafter called the appellant, appealed against assessments to income tax in the sums of £23,809 for the year ending April 5, 1930; £23,809 for the year ending April 5, 1931; and £25,245 for the year ending April 5, 1932, made upon him by the Additional Commissioners of Income Tax for the Division of St. James under Case V of Sched. D of the Income Tax Acts in respect of income from possessions out of the United Kingdom.

2. The appellant is resident in the United Kingdom, and is a grandson of the first Lord Astor, and under a settlement made by the said Lord Astor dated May 25, 1916, became absolutely entitled, upon coming of age in August, 1928, to certain American stocks and shares.

3. By a settlement dated Sept. 13, 1929, the appellant transferred the said stocks and shares to the City Bank Farmers Trust Company, hereinafter called the trustee, to be held upon the trusts therein set out.

4. It was provided by the second and third clauses of the settlement that the trustee should collect the income arising from the trust estate, and, after paying the taxes and other incidental expenses and charges properly chargeable against income, should pay or apply the balance of said income to or for the use of the appellant during his life in such amounts and at such dates as he might from time to time direct, and that upon the death of the appellant the trustee should distribute the capital of the trust fund then in its possession to such persons and in such shares or amounts and on such terms and limitations as the appellant should by will or codicil appoint, and in default of such appointment to the issue of the appellant then surviving in equal shares per stirpes, and should he leave no issue to the descendants of his father living at his death in equal shares per stirpes. By the ninth clause power was reserved to the appellant at any time or times during his life by instrument under his hand and seal to revoke the settlement and the trust thereby created concerning all or any part or parts of the trust fund, whether capital or income, or to change or modify the same in any way or to any effect which the appellant might think fit or proper.

5. It was agreed for purposes of the present appeal:

(a) That the trust settlement was governed by the law of New York State.

(b) That upon a proper construction of the trust settlement under such law the appellant had no proprietary interest, legal or equitable, in either the specific assets comprising the corpus of the trust or the specific dividends or interest collected by the trustee; that the whole legal and equitable proprietary interest therein was vested in the trustee, and that the sole right in the appellant was the right in equity to enforce performance of the trust against the trustee, and in particular to call upon him to pay over (at such times as the appellant might direct) the balance of income in the trustee's hands after deducting outgoing from the dividends and interest so collected.

(c) That under such law the provision in the trust settlement reserving to the appellant a power of revocation was valid, but (unless and until such power was exercised) had no effect at all on the nature of the rights accruing under the settlement to the trustee and appellant respectively as explained in (b) above.

6. The appellant had not during the material years exercised the power of revocation reserved to him by the ninth clause of the settlement or made any appointment affecting the trust fund or any part thereof.

7. The assessments under appeal had been made under r. 1 of Case V of Sched. D on the basis that the whole of the income arising from the stocks and shares comprising the trust fund must be deemed for the purposes of income tax to be the income of the appellant under s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1922, on the ground that he could without the consent of any other person have obtained for himself the beneficial enjoyment thereof.

8. It was contended on behalf of the appellant:

(a) That the income of the trust fund was income of the trustee, who was resident abroad, and was derived from sources out of the United Kingdom, and was therefore not within the ambit of the Income Tax Acts, and s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1922, had no application to it. Reference was made to the decision in the case of the Marchioness of Ormonde v. Brown (1).

(b) That the appellant was not, or at least might not, have been able to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment of the income without the consent of the trustee.

(c) That s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1922, could not be applicable to the case, as the appellant was already in beneficial enjoyment of the income under the settlement without exercising any powers of revocation or other powers thereunder, whereas the subsection contemplates only persons who are not in beneficial enjoyment of the income for the time being and can only become so by exercising such a power of revocation or other power.

(d) That as from the date of the settlement the appellant was chargeable to income tax under r. 2 of Case V of Sched. D on the amounts received in the United Kingdom, and the assessments ought to be amended accordingly.

9. It was contended on behalf of the Crown:

(a) The income of which the appellant had the beneficial enjoyment under the settlement was not the income arising from the specific stocks and shares comprising the trust fund, but was income from a possession other than stocks and shares.

(b) That the appellant was able, without the consent of any other person, by means of the exercise of the power of revocation reserved by the settlement, to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment of the whole of the income arising from the specific stocks and shares comprising the trust fund.

(c) That such income was within the ambit of the Income Tax Acts, and under s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1922, must be deemed for the purposes of income tax to be his income.

(d) That the assessments had rightly been made under r. 1 of Case V of Sched. D, and ought to be confirmed.

10. The commissioners who heard the appeal, held that the matter was concluded by the decision in the case of the Marchioness of Ormonde v. Brown (1), and that s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1922, could not be applied so as to charge the appellant with income tax on foreign income which, under the provisions of the settlement, was income of the American trustee. They accordingly amended the assessments by substituting amounts computed under r. 2 of Case V for those computed under r. 1 as from the date of the settlement.

11. The respondent immediately after the determination of the appeal declared his dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and in due course required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149.

The Court of Appeal held, reversing the decision of Finlay, J., that the power of revocation, though not in fact at present exercised, operated to bring this case out of r. 2, and to bring it within r. 1, so that the income would be income arising from stocks and shares, in which case the full amount was exigible to taxation whether received in the United Kingdom or not. The appellant having the power of revocation, the income must be deemed to be his income under the provisions of s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1922, and consequently an income arising from stocks and shares and taxable accordingly under r. 1, and was no longer income from foreign possessions, the legal and equitable interest therein, without the power of revocation, having been in the trustee under New York law.

Latter, K.C., and Cyril Asquith for the appellant.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Donald Somervell, K.C.), J. H. Stamp, and Reginald Hills for the respondent.

Duncan and others v. Adamson (Inspector of Taxes)

Appeal by the taxpayers, the executors of W. A. Duncan, deceased, from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Slesser and Romer, L.JJ.), dated July 10, 1934, affirming an order of the King's Bench Division (Finlay, J.) dated June 29, 1934, upon a Case Stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

There was no dispute as to the facts or figures, and the question in issue, shortly stated, was whether the income of a beneficiary (resident in the United Kingdom) under a foreign settlement which, as a result of the law applicable to that settlement, was "income arising from possessions out of the United Kingdom, other than stocks, shares or rents" within r. 2 of the rules applicable to Sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, ceased to be such and became "income arising from stocks, shares or rents in any place out of the United Kingdom" within r. 1 of the same rules by reason of s. 20 of the Finance Act, 1922, the settlement in question having reserved to the beneficiary an absolute power of revocation which had not been exercised.

The particular assessments in question were assessments to income tax in the sums of £1,297 5s. and £2,426 for the years ending April 5, 1932, and April 5, 1933, and were based on the application to the income arising under the settlement of r. 1 of Case V of Sched. D.

The Case Stated was as follows:

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on Oct. 31, 1933, for the purpose of hearing appeals, the executors of W. A. Duncan (deceased) (hereinafter called the appellants) appealed against assessments to income tax under Case V of Sched. D for the years ending April 5, 1932, and April 5, 1933, respectively, in respect of income from possessions out of the United Kingdom made upon the appellants by the Commissioners for the Division of the City of London.

2. The appellants are the executors of the will of the late Walter Atholl Duncan (hereinafter called the deceased), who died on Aug. 13, 1932, and who for some years prior to his death resided in the United Kingdom.

3. By a settlement dated May 20, 1926, and executed by the deceased in Paris the deceased transferred certain shares in Duncan Brothers and Co., Ltd., a company registered and carrying on business in Calcutta, to trustees to pay the income therefrom to himself during his life and after his death to his widow for her life, and subject thereto on certain trusts for his children. By cl. 14 of the settlement the deceased reserved to himself an absolute power to vary or revoke any of the trusts declared by the settlement.

4. By a declaration of trust dated March 1, 1928, the deceased transferred certain further shares in Duncan Brothers and Co., Ltd., of Calcutta, to the trustees upon the trusts of the settlement.

5. The trustees of the settlement were at all material times resident in British India, where the trust fund was situate. Stamp duty was paid on the settlement in India.

6. Until January, 1929, the income of the settled shares was remitted to the deceased in this country through Messrs. Walter Duncan and Co., of London, who accounted to the Crown, for the British income tax in respect thereof. During the two years under appeal no income was remitted by the trustees to the deceased in this country.

7. It was agreed for the purposes of the present appeal that the trust settlement was governed by the law of British India, and that upon a proper construction of the trust settlement under such law the deceased had no proprietary interest, legal or equitable, in the specific assets comprising the corpus of the trust, or in the specific dividends collected by the trustees, and that the sole interest of the deceased therein was his right to call upon the trustees, and, if necessary, to compel them to administer the trust so as to give him the income according to the terms thereof.

8. It was contended on behalf of the appellants:

(a) That s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1922, was not applicable in the circumstances of this case.

(b) That as from the date of the settlement the deceased was chargeable under r. 2 of Case V of Sched. D, on the basis of the sums remitted.

(c) That as in the two years under appeal there had been no remittances the assessments under appeal should be discharged.

9. On behalf of the Crown it was contended:

(a) That the deceased was able without the consent of any other person by means of the exercise of the power of revocation reserved by the settlement to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment of the whole of the income arising from the specific stocks and shares comprising the trust fund;

(b) That such income was within the ambit of the Income Tax Acts, and under s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1922, must be deemed for the purpose of income tax to be income of the deceased;

(c) That the assessments were correct in principle.

10. The commissioners who heard the appeal, held that s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance

Act, 1922, did not apply to thei ncome in question, and they accordingly discharged the assessments.

Finlay, J., dismissed the appeal by the appellants on the ground that the question at issue was governed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Perry (Inspector of Taxes) v. Astor (see supra), and the judgment of the learned judge was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Wilfrid Greene, K.C., A. Andrewes-Uthwatt, and Arthur T. Macmillan for the appellants.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Donald Somervell, K.C.), J. H. Stamp, and Reginald Hills for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

March 15. The following opinions were delivered:

LORD ATKIN.—In these two cases I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion which is about to be pronounced by my noble and learned friend, Lord Macmillan. I entirely agree with it, and find it unnecessary to add anything to it. I am requested by my noble and learned friend, Lord Tomlin, who, unfortunately, is unable to be here to-day to say that he also agrees with it.

LORD RUSSELL.—I, too, have had an opportunity of reading and considering the opinion about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, Lord Macmillan, but, unfortunately, I find myself in disagreement with him and the others of your Lordships concerning these appeals. I cannot justify to myself the departure which you are prepared to make from the language used in s. 20 (1) of the Finance Act, 1922.

The words relevant to the present case are crystal clear.

> "Any income of which any person is able . . . without the consent of any other person by means of the exercise of any . . . power of revocation . . . by virtue of . . . a disposition made . . . by himself, to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment . . . shall . . . be deemed for the purpose of the enactments relating to income tax (including super tax) to be the income of the person who is . . . able to obtain the beneficial enjoyment thereof . . . and not to be for those purposes the income of any other person."

There must, of course, be the necessary limitation which is inherent in all our income tax legislation, namely, that what is taxed under or by virtue of this provision can only be either (i) income which is here, or (ii) income of a person resident here. So far I believe there is no difference of opinion among us; nor is it I think in dispute that, if no further limitation is placed on the words of the section, the case of Mr. Astor (for I will deal with his case in the first instance) falls precisely under those words. The income received by the trustees in the United States is income of which he is able, without the consent of any other person by means of the exercise of the power of revocation contained in the settlement made by himself, to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment; with the result, if the section applies, that such income is to be deemed for the purposes stated, to be his income and no one else's.

Your Lordships, however, are of opinion that the section does not apply to the case of Mr. Astor, because, in your view the section should be subjected to another and further limitation in that the income there mentioned should be confined to income already charged to tax, and that all that the section accomplishes is to shift the burden, and to substitute one person for another as the person liable to be charged in respect of income already chargeable.

The justification for so departing from the language employed is, as I understand it, of this nature: A variety of instances are given to show that if read without the further limitation the section may result in no tax being payable in respect of income which is in fact being received by a person resident here. These are said to be anomalies, and to be in conflict with the provisions of Sched. D; and because of this it is said that upon the authority of Colquhoun v. Brooks (2) we are entitled to give to the words of s. 20 (1) a meaning different from their ordinary meaning. Other parts of the section are also pointed to, as raising difficulties in their application to cases where the person in fact entitled to the income is resident abroad.

To say that the natural meaning of the words is in conflict with the provisions of Sched. D is not, in my opinion, an accurate statement. The income escapes taxation in the cases put only because the artificial facts which the legislature has created take it out of the annual profits or gains covered by Sched. D. The two enactments are not inconsistent; there is no conflict, except the conflict of facts which necessarily arises when the legislature enacts that what is not the fact is to be deemed to be the fact. In Colquhoun v. Brooks (2) the sole question was whether profits of a trade carried on exclusively abroad fell within Case I or Case V of Sched. D of the Act of 1842. As Lord Macnaghten pointed out, the wording of both cases was apt for the purpose of including the profits in question; but a consideration of various other provisions of the Act established, from the language which the legislature had used, that while profits from a trade carried on here, or partly here and partly abroad, fell under Case I, profits from a trade carried on exclusively outside Great Britain fell under Case V. Both Lord Herschell and Lord Macnaghten point out, as I read their speeches, that startling results are not of themselves sufficient to warrant a departure from the ordinary meaning of the words of a statute. Colquhoun v. Brooks (2) is not, in my opinion, an authority in point here. My noble and learned friend, Lord Macmillan, also prays Lord Loreburn in aid, and cites from his speech in Drummond v. Collins (3) an extract in which he refers to Colquhoun v. Brooks (2). I could have wished that the choice had fallen upon a passage from the same speech which exactly expresses my views in regard to the present case, and in which Lord Loreburn uses the following words ([1915] App. Cas. at p. 1018):

> "Lord Cairns long ago said that 'if the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law, he must be taxed.' And though there have been cases in which the letter of the law has been disregarded in view of other statutory language, I think it can be done only in case of necessity. It must be a necessary interpretation."

I can find no necessary interpretation here. The plain words of the Act may in some cases lead to results, which to some may appear strange. That does not concern us, or justify us in altering the meaning of the plain words, in order to produce what we may consider more sensible or less anomalous results. That course is only open to us if we find it necessitated by the language employed in other parts of the statute.

One argument needs perhaps to be specifically considered. It was said that one result of reading the section as I read it would be this: That Mr. Astor would be liable to pay tax in respect of the income received by the trustees in the United States as income deemed to be his, and also liable to pay tax on the income which the trustees were bound to pay over, the latter being (within the decision in the second Archer-Shee Case (4)) the income springing from a foreign possession, namely, his right of action against the trustees. In my opinion no such double taxation could occur and for the reason given by Romer, L.J. Once the income which is the property of the trustees is to be deemed the income of Mr. Astor (i.e., is to be treated for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts in all respects as if it was the property of Mr. Astor), it automatically becomes impossible for the purposes of those Acts to say that he receives anything which springs from a right of action against the trustees, in respect of their income.

In view of the fact that your Lordships take a different view, I will not occupy time in dealing with the other points argued on behalf of the appellants. Suffice it to say that on consideration I can find nothing in the various provisions of the section in question, or in the consequences said to flow therefrom if construed without the suggested qualification, to induce, much less to compel, me to depart from the ordinary meaning of the language which the legislature has used.

My noble and learned friend Lord Macmillan in his opinion most properly proclaims our disability to amend the law. For myself I feel unable by reason of that very disability to allow Mr. Astor's appeal.

I agree with the decision of the Court of Appeal and would dismiss the appeal accordingly.

The same result should follow in the appeal of Duncan and others v. Adamson (Inspector of Taxes) (see supra), as it was conceded that the two appeals must necessarily share the same fate.

LORD MACMILLAN.—The appellant Mr. Astor is, within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts, a "person residing in the United Kingdom." In 1928 he became the owner of certain stocks and shares in the United States of America. By a settlement dated Sept. 13, 1929, he transferred these stocks and shares to a trustee resident in the United States of America. Under the trust so constituted the duty of the trustee is to collect the income arising from the trust estate, and, after paying the taxes and other incidental expenses and charges properly chargeable against income, to pay or apply the balance of the income to or for the use of the appellant during his life as he may direct. Power is reserved to the appellant to revoke the settlement and the trust thereby created in whole or in part at any time during his life.

It is agreed that the trust is governed by the law of the State of New York and that by the law of that State the appellant has no proprietary interest, legal or equitable, either in the specific stocks and shares forming the capital assets of the trust or in the specific dividends or interest collected by the trustee. The sole right of the appellant is to enforce performance of the trust, and in particular to call upon the trustee to pay over to him, as he may direct, the balance of income in the trustee's hands after deducting outgoings. It is further agreed that, according to the law of the State of New York, the power of revocation reserved to the appellant is valid, but that, unless and until exercised, it has no effect on the nature of the appellant's rights under the settlement as above described. The appellant has not exercised his power of revocation.

Had the settlement contained no power of revocation the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to the appellant from his equitable interest under the trust would have been chargeable to income tax under r. 2 applicable to Case V of Sched. D, as being income arising from a possession out of the United Kingdom other than stocks, shares or rents. Under that rule the tax would have been computed

> "on the full amount of the actual sums annually received in the United Kingdom from remittances payable in the United Kingdom . . . on an average of the three preceding years. . . ."

That is the effect of the decision of your Lordships' House in Archer-Shee v. Garland (4), as applied to the facts of the present case, apart from the question of the effect of the revocation clause.

But the existence of the reserved power of revocation in the settlement is said by the Crown to alter the position. The point arises in this way. Formerly under Case V tax on income from all foreign possessions was without distinction charged only on the actual sums annually received in the United Kingdom on a three years' average. The Finance Act, 1914, however, by s. 5, introduced a distinction between income arising from securities, stocks, shares or rents in any place out of the United Kingdom and income arising from other possessions out of the United Kingdom, and provided that the former should be computed

> "on the full amount of the income whether the income has been or will be received in the United Kingdom or not."

This provision is reproduced in the present Income Tax Act, 1918, as regards securities, in r. 1 applicable to Case IV of Sched. D, and as regards stocks, shares or rents, in r. 1 applicable to Case V of Sched. D.

Then in 1922 there was enacted by the Finance Act of that year a new provision which has given rise to the question now at issue. It is contained in s. 20, which it is necessary to quote at considerable length in order to appreciate the nature of the enactment. The material parts of the section read as follows:

> "(1) Any income (a) of which any person is able . . . without the consent of any other person by means of the exercise of any power of appointment, power of revocation or otherwise howsoever by virtue or in consequence of a disposition made directly or indirectly by himself, to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment; or (b) which by virtue or in consequence of any disposition made, directly or indirectly, by any person . . . (other than a disposition made for valuable and sufficient consideration) is payable to or applicable for the benefit of any other person for a period which cannot exceed six years; . . . shall, subject to the provisions of this section . . . be deemed for the purposes of the enactments relating to income tax (including super tax) to be the income of the person who is . . . able to obtain the beneficial enjoyment thereof, or of the person, if living, by whom the disposition was made, as the case may be, and not to be for those purposes the income of any other person. . . . (2) Where by virtue of paragraph (b) . . . of subsection (1) of this section any income tax or super tax becomes chargeable on and is paid by the person by whom the disposition was made, that person shall be entitled to recover from any trustee or other person to whom the income is payable by virtue or in consequence of the disposition the amount of the tax so paid, and for that purpose to require the commissioners concerned to furnish to him a certificate specifying the amount of the income in respect of which he has so paid tax and the amount of the tax so paid, and any certificate so furnished shall be conclusive evidence of the facts appearing thereby. (3) Where any person obtains in respect of any allowance or relief a repayment of income tax in excess of the amount of the repayment to which he would but for the provisions of paragraph (b) . . . of subsection (1) of this section have been entitled, an amount equal to the excess shall be paid by him to the trustee or other person to whom the income is payable or in consequence of the disposition, or where there are two or more such persons shall be apportioned among those persons as the case may require. If any question arises as to the amount of any payment or as to any apportionment to be made under this subsection, that question shall be decided by the General Commissioners whose decision thereon shall be final. . . ."

In reliance upon the combined effect of this section and r. 1 applicable to Case V of Sched. D, assessments to income tax were made upon the appellant for each of the three years 1929–30, 1930–31, and 1931–32, in respect of the whole income received in those years by the trustee in the United States in the shape of dividends and interests on the stocks and shares in the United States of which the trust estate consists. The question is whether these assessments are justified or whether, as the appellant contends, he ought to be assessed under r. 2 only on the full amount of the actual sums annually received by him in the United Kingdom from the American trustee.

The Special Commissioners held that the matter was concluded by the decision of FINLAY, J., in the case of Marchioness of Ormonde v. Brown (1), and that s. 20 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1922, could not be applied so as to charge the appellant with income tax on foreign income which under the provisions of the settlement was income of the American trustee. They accordingly amended the assessments by substituting amounts computed under r. 2 of Case V for those computed under r. 1.

The Crown appealed to the King's Bench Division, and, on the case coming before FINLAY, J., admitted that it was entirely covered by his decision in the case of the Marchioness of Ormonde v. Brown (1). The decision of the Special Commissioners was accordingly affirmed without argument. On a further appeal by the Crown the Court of Appeal unanimously reversed the decision of FINLAY, J., and upheld the original assessments.

The argument for the Crown has at first sight an attractive simplicity. Is the appellant able, by means of the exercise of a power of revocation contained in a disposition, made directly by himself, to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment of the income which under that disposition his American trustee collects? The answer must plainly be in the affirmative. And does that income arise from stocks and shares in a place out of the United Kingdom? The answer must again be in the affirmative. The words of s. 20 and r. 1 of Case V fit the facts precisely, and that, contends the Crown, must end the matter.

This appearance of simplicity is delusive, for if, as the Crown submits, the critical words "any income" with which s. 20 opens, are read without any qualification, territorial or other, the most startling anomalies result. Thus if the section is to be read as applicable to any income anywhere of which any person anywhere can by the exercise of a power of revocation obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment it covers the case of a revocable disposition to an American trustee of American stocks and shares by a person resident in America under which the income is payable to a person resident in this country. In the case put, the American settlor is able by exercising his power of revocation to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment of the income of the stocks and shares which he has settled. That income, therefore, is to be deemed for British income tax purposes to be his income and not to be the income for those purposes of the person resident in this country who is entitled to it. Incidentally one asks how a British Income Tax Act can impute to an American citizen an income of which the American citizen has by the law of his own country effectually divested himself. Or suppose a resident in America makes a disposition there under which the income of American stocks and shares is payable to a resident in the United Kingdom for a period of five years. The section, read literally, as the Crown would have your Lordships read it, would have the effect, under para. (b), of deeming the income to be the income of the American resident who made the disposition and not the income of the beneficiary in this country. In both the cases supposed the person resident in this country would under s. 20 be entirely exempt from tax in respect of the income, however large, to which he was entitled under the American disposition, even although the whole of it were remitted to him in this country.

Perhaps the most anomalous because the simplest case that could be put is that of a person resident in this country who makes a revocable settlement of assets abroad under which another person also resident in this country is the beneficiary of the income. The settlor then goes abroad and ceases to be resident in this country. Under s. 20 the income is still, according to the Crown, to be deemed to be his income and not that of the beneficiary; the result is that neither the settlor nor the beneficiary pays any tax, although the whole of the income may be received and enjoyed by the beneficiary in this country.

But under Sched. D the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere are chargeable to tax. Under this, which is a cardinal provision of our income tax legislation, the income, in the three cases I have put, would be chargeable to tax while under s. 20 of the 1922 Act (which by s. 49 thereof is to be construed together with the Act of 1918 of which Sched. D is a part) the same income would be exempted from tax.

The learned Solicitor-General did not flinch from these remarkable results of his unqualified reading of the words "any income" in the Act of 1922, but to your Lordships they may well suggest a doubt as to whether these words should not be read in a sense which would avoid such a conflict.

But there are further difficulties. The section applies not only to cases where a person by the exercise of a power of revocation can obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment of income; it applies also to cases where a person can do so by the exercise of a power of appointment. Suppose that an American resident by an American settlement of American stocks and shares conferred on a resident in this country a power of appointment of the income, which the donee of the power could exercise in his own favour. The income which he could appoint to himself would be deemed to be his income, although he had not exercised the power, but in that case his income would not be income arising from specific stocks or shares in America, but from his equitable right to the American trust income and would be taxed under r. 2 of Case V on the amount actually received by him in this country, and not under r. 1 on the whole income received by the American trustee.

Then sub-s. (2) also raises difficulties. If the Crown is right then if a person resident in this country makes a disposition of the income of American stocks and shares in favour of a resident in America for a period of five years and under s. 20 (1) (b) is charged with tax on that income he is under sub-s. (2) given a right to recover the tax so paid from the American beneficiary. A reading of our income tax legislation which leads to the remarkable result of imposing a liability of recoupment on an American citizen is not lightly to be accepted. Sub-s. (3) carries the matter still further, for it would in the case just figured require the person resident in this country in certain contingencies to pay to his American beneficiary sums in addition to the income which he had settled on him, which would be fair enough if under sub-s. (2) he could succeed in recovering from him the tax paid in this country, but would otherwise be quite unreasonable.

I venture to think that the conflict and the anomalies to which I have drawn attention arise, in the words of my noble and learned friend LORD TOMLIN,

> "from the fact that the amendments from time to time made to the Income Tax Acts, directed as they are to stopping an exit through the net of taxation freshly disclosed, are too often framed without sufficient regard to the basic scheme upon which the Acts originally rested" (Neumann v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (5) ([1934] A.C. at p. 222). The enactment contained in s. 20 is intelligible and practicable where all the parties concerned are within the United Kingdom, and doubtless that was the case which the legislature had in contemplation. The possible extra-territorial effects of the section were obviously not thought out and the task which the legislature has omitted to perform is imposed upon your Lordships of reconciling the resulting conflict. But your Lordships in your judicial capacity are under a disability from which the legislature is free, for you have no power to amend the law. However anomalous an enactment may be, it must be applied by the courts according to its terms, unless these terms are susceptible, according to the accepted canons of construction, of an interpretation which avoids the anomalies.

Fortunately your Lordships are not without authoritative guidance as to the principles upon which the language of taxing statutes may legitimately be construed. In the leading case of Colquhoun v. Brooks (2) the Crown were able as here to contend that the statutory language precisely covered their case. "I think," says LORD HERSCHELL (14 App. Cas. at p. 503),

> "that giving to the language of the enactment its natural meaning the facts stated do apparently bring this case within it."

But he went on to point out that where, as here again, the words of a statute according to their natural meaning lead to "strangely anomalous" results it is legitimate to examine their statutory context in order to see whether they ought to be construed as they would be if read alone. LORD LOREBURN, L.C., says in Drummond v. Collins (3) ([1915] A.C. at p. 1017):

> "Courts of law have cut down or even contradicted the language of the legislature when on a full view of the Act, considering its scheme and its machinery and the manifest purpose of it, they have thought that a particular case or class of cases was not intended to fall within the taxing clause relied upon by the Crown. A notable instance is the case of Colquhoun v. Brooks (2) decided nearly thirty years ago and always followed."

So far as the intention of an enactment may be gathered from its own terms it is permissible to have regard to that intention in interpreting it, and if more than one interpretation is possible that interpretation should be adopted which is most consonant with and is best calculated to give effect to the intention of the enactment as so ascertained. More especially, where two sections forming part of a single statutory code are found, when read literally, to conflict, a court of construction may properly so read their terms as, if possible, to effect their reconciliation.

I now propose to examine rather more closely the actual language and structure of s. 20 as a whole in order to see whether any aid is thus afforded in ascertaining the intention of the legislature and so in interpreting the words "any income" with which the section opens. It has to be observed at the outset that the section does not provide that the power of appointment or the power of revocation is to be deemed to have been exercised. On the contrary, it assumes that the power has not been exercised and that the income will continue in fact to be applied as the disposition directs. The section does not declare that the dispositions with which it deals are to be treated as non-existent in a question between the maker of the disposition and the Inland Revenue. The scheme of the section is that the income which the settlor by his disposition has diverted from himself and conferred on another shall be notionally restored to him while in fact continuing to be applied as he has directed. Income which in fact is the income of B is to be deemed for income tax purposes to be the income of A.

The purpose is notionally to transfer B's income to A, so that A may be charged to tax on the aggregate of his own and B's income. The person to whom the income is payable under the disposition and the person who has made the disposition are to be treated notionally as a single taxpayer. The incomes of the two persons are to be amalgamated. The contention of the Crown goes much further; it proposes not to amalgamate the actual incomes of A and B, but to amalgamate with A's income, not the income which he has conferred on B, but the income which A would have had if he had never made any disposition in favour of B, and it further proposes in the process of amalgamation to change the taxable character of B's income so as to render it chargeable under a different head.

In the present case the income of the trustee is the income of a resident in America derived under an American disposition from American assets. Primâ facie the income tax authorities have no concern with it. But they have concern with the income of residents in the United Kingdom and our legislature can, of course, competently "determine the measure of taxation to be applied in the case of a person so resident" by any standard it pleases (Colquhoun v. Brooks (2) (14 App. Cas. at p. 504). If a resident in this country has possessions out of the United Kingdom the legislature has provided how he shall be taxed in respect of such possessions; if they are securities, stocks, shares, rents, he pays on the full amount of the income therefrom whether brought home or not; if they are not of this character he pays on the amount actually brought home. It is with this existing scheme that s. 20, which is to be read along with it, has to be reconciled. I have shown how on the Crown's reading these enactments come into conflict. The reconciliation is, I suggest, to be effected by reading s. 20 as designed to effect a notional amalgamation of two existing incomes both charged to income tax by the existing law. If the words "any income" are construed, as they reasonably may be, to mean any income chargeable with tax under the British Finance Act of the year, the difficulties of the Crown's interpretation to a large extent disappear. For the income of the American trustee, being the income of a foreign non-resident, is not brought into charge, while the income so far as received by the resident in this country is, consistently with the scheme of the Income Tax Acts, brought into charge under its appropriate head, in the present instance r. 2, and is by force of s. 20 amalgamated with the resident's income derived from sources within the United Kingdom.

In reaching this conclusion I have not been much moved by the argument that s. 20 rightly regarded is not a charging section and so ought not to be read as imposing a charge which is not elsewhere created. It seems to me that to say that a particular item of income which belongs to B is for income tax purposes to be deemed to belong to A is quite an effectual way of charging A with tax on the transferred income. In Kirke's Trustees v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (6) this house had before it the following words in r. 4 applicable to Cases I and II of Sched. D:

> "Where any person has received repayment of any amounts previously paid by him by way of excess profits duty the amount repaid shall be treated as profit for the year in which the repayment is received."

LORD SUMNER in construing this provision expressed the view that the word "treated" was "an apt word to impose a charge." "Deemed," in my view, is a synonym of equal efficacy. Indeed, on the reading of s. 20 which I propose to your Lordships, the section is a charging section in the sense that it charges with tax on certain income a person who would not otherwise be chargeable with tax on that income. But it is not a charging section, as the Crown would make it out to be, in the sense of charging with tax income which according to the existing law could not be charged at all except so far as received in this country. As LORD WRENBURY pointed out in Williams v. Singer (7) ([1921] 1 A.C. at p. 75):

"The two things are quite distinct; the property chargeable is one thing, the person liable to be charged is another."

The result of the process of "deeming" which the section directs is, in my opinion, not to bring into tax income not previously chargeable but to substitute one person for another as the person liable to be charged in respect of income already chargeable. To justify reading the section as on the one hand imposing a charge on income not at present subject to charge, and on the other hand as exempting from charge altogether income which is at present chargeable—for that is the result of the Crown's contention—would, in my view, require much more express and precise language than the section contains.

Some confusion is created in the present case by the circumstance that the appellant is at one and the same time the maker of the disposition in question and the person entitled to the income arising under it. I have disregarded this specially, for it is obviously merely accidental and irrelevant to the argument; but it may be pointed out that the section certainly does not in any event very well fit the case, for it would be odd that the income of the funds covered by the disposition should be "deemed" to be the income of the person whose income it is in fact. It is, however, on much more fundamental grounds that I have reached the conclusion that the Crown's contentions must fail.

The result on the whole matter is that, in my opinion, the case of the Marchioness of Ormonde v. Brown (1) and this Case were rightly decided by Finlay, J., and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the present case should be reversed with costs, and the judgment of Finlay, J., restored.

The appeal in the case of Duncan and others v. Adamson, also set down for consideration by your Lordships to-day, raises, as was agreed at the Bar, precisely the same question of law as that with which I have just dealt. In this instance, however, the decision of Finlay, J., was in favour of the Crown, following the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Perry (Inspector of Taxes) v. Astor, and I propose, accordingly, that your Lordships should reverse, with costs, the judgments of Finlay, J., and the Court of Appeal, and restore the determination of the Special Commissioners.

LORD WRIGHT.—I have had the opportunity of considering in print the opinion which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend, Lord Macmillan. I am so fully in accord with the reasoning and the conclusions of that opinion, that I have nothing to add.

Appeals allowed.

Company—Shares—Transfer—Registration—Refusal to register—Liability of directors to state on what grounds they act—Right to decline given by articles.

Discovery—Interrogatory—Agreement between parties that one should not be compellable to disclose information sought by interrogatory.

The first plaintiff, B., was the holder of one ordinary share in the defendant company. He transferred this share to the second plaintiff, S. Subsequently B. and S. severally requested the defendant company to register the transfer. Registration was refused. Article 16 of the defendant company's articles of association authorised the directors to decline to register any transfer of shares on four separate grounds and continued "and the directors shall not be bound to specify the grounds upon which registration of any transfer is declined under this article." The plaintiffs brought this action claiming a declaration that the company was not entitled to decline to register the transfer and rectification of the company's register accordingly, and they sought to administer to the defendant company interrogatories directed to ascertain on which of the four grounds specified in the articles the refusal to register the transfer was based.

Held: that on the true construction of art. 16 the directors were excused from naming which were the particular ground or grounds on which they had acted; the article was binding, not only on B., who was a member of the company, but also on S., who was applying to be registered; the mere fact that an action was brought and an application made to deliver interrogatories did not oust an agreement constituted by the articles between the parties and preclude the parties from relying on it; and, therefore, the company would not be bound to answer the interrogatories if they were allowed.

Procedure Summons.

The Tottenham Hotspur Football and Athletic Company, Ltd. (hereinafter called "the company") was incorporated in 1898, and art. 16 of the company's articles of association provided that:

> "The directors may decline to register any transfer of shares made by a member who is indebted to the company or in case the transferee shall be a person of whom the directors do not approve or shall be considered by them objectionable, or the transfer shall be considered as having been made for purposes not conducive to the interests of the company, and the directors shall not be bound to specify the grounds upon which the registration of any transfer is declined under this article. . . ."

The first plaintiff, Hubert Berry, was the registered holder of (inter alia) one ordinary share of £1 in the company's capital and he transferred this share to the second plaintiff, James Arthur Stewart. On March 23, 1935, both plaintiffs wrote to the company asking the company to register the transfer. By two letters dated April 3, 1935, the company refused to register the transfer. The plaintiffs by the writ in this action claimed a declaration that the company was not entitled to decline to register the transfer, and an order that the register be rectified by the deletion of the plaintiff Berry's name as holder of the share and by the insertion in lieu thereof of the plaintiff Stewart's name.

The plaintiffs sought to administer to the company the following among other interrogatories:

"2. Did the directors refuse to register the said transfer as one made by a member indebted to the company?

"3. Did the directors in fact disapprove of the plaintiff Stewart as a transferee of the said share?

"4. Did the directors in fact consider the plaintiff Stewart objectionable as a transferee of the said share?

"5. Did the directors in fact consider the transfer of the said share as having been made for purposes not conducive to the interests of the company?"

The Master, on the matter coming before him, refused leave to administer these interrogatories, and by this summons the plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to administer them.

The plaintiffs' interrogatories had been modelled on certain interrogatories allowed by Tomlin, J., in Sutherland (Duke) v. British Dominions Land Settlement Corpn., Ltd. (1) The relevant article in that case provided as follows:

> "The directors may, without assigning any reason, decline to register any transfer of shares not fully paid up made to any person not approved by them or made by any member jointly or alone indebted or under any liability to the company."

In that case the learned judge held that the company was not entitled to refuse to state which of the grounds mentioned in the articles the directors had acted under, although it might refuse to say what reasons influenced the directors in exercising their discretion upon that ground.

R. E. Manningham-Buller, for the plaintiffs, contended that in art. 16 "grounds" meant the same thing as "reasons." The question was one of importance, for if it was possible to put into the articles of a company some provision which would prevent a person who wished to become a shareholder from obtaining discovery in accordance with the rules of court, that was making it possible for a company's articles to override rules of court. [He referred to Buckley On the Companies Act (11th ed.), p. 139.]

J. B. Lindon, for the company, referred to The Gresham Life Assurance Society (2), Gateshead Assessment Committee v. Redheugh Colliery, Ltd. (3), and Whiffen v. Hartwright (4).

R. E. Manningham-Buller in reply.—The right of discovery of a non-member of a company may be higher than that of a member, as he may not have entered into any agreement waiving his rights. [He referred to Re Bede Steam Shipping Co. (5).]

CROSSMAN, J. [after stating the facts:]—The first point made for the plaintiffs is that art. 16 of the company's articles of association does not prevent the questions in these interrogatories from being asked. For the purpose of deciding that point it has been agreed between the parties that the question which I shall determine is whether, if the interrogatories were allowed (assuming that they are proper to be allowed), the company would be bound to answer them, and I am not to allow the interrogatories if I am of opinion that the company would not be bound to answer them if they were allowed. The question, then, is whether the company would be bound to answer these interrogatories or whether it is excused from answering them by art. 16 of the articles of association. The plaintiffs rely upon a decision of TOMLIN, J., in Sutherland (Duke) v. British Dominions Land Settlement Corpn., Ltd. (1), in which the learned judge had to consider somewhat similar circumstances. [His Lordship read the relevant article in that case and continued:] TOMLIN, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled to interrogate the defendants as to whether the transfer was to a person of whom the directors did not approve, and whether the plaintiff was in fact a person jointly or alone indebted to the company. In the course of his judgment he distinguished between the two points on which inquiry might be made, namely, the reasons upon which or for which the directors acted in declining to register, and the grounds of their objection to registration, which he regarded as two distinct things, and he shows clearly that he distinguishes between the reason for exercising the power and the grounds which give rise to its exercise. In the case before him the only thing which the directors were excused from doing was assigning a reason. The directors would never be bound in those circumstances to assign any reason, but the learned judge held that that did not excuse them from specifying under which particular branch of the article excusing them they were acting. He held that it was their duty to say under which branch they were acting, and that that would be done by answering the interrogatories which were delivered in that case.

In the present case the words in the article are not, as they were in Sutherland (Duke) v. British Dominions Land Settlement Corpn., Ltd. (1), "without assigning any reason." They are "shall not be bound to specify the grounds." I cannot, as a matter of construction, come to the conclusion that "specify the grounds" means the same as "assign the reasons," having regard to the statement of TOMLIN, J. I think they are two different things, and that what the directors are excused or saved from doing in the case before me is naming the species of ground under which they have acted—that is to say, the interrogatories which it is sought to administer here ask them to do the very thing which, in my judgment, on the construction of this article, it is provided that they are not bound to do. In my view, on construction of the article, that seems to me to dispose of the matter so far as regards the plaintiff, Berry, who is a member of the company; but it is contended by counsel for the plaintiffs that here I must draw a distinction between a plaintiff who is a member of the company and a plaintiff who is not, that art. 16 binds only members of the company, and that a person who is not yet a member of the company can become a member of the company under the articles, but disregard the prohibitions of art. 16. In my judgment, that is not the case. In my view, art. 16 applies to a person who is applying to be registered, because it specifies the conditions upon which he is to be registered; the directors are to register on those terms, but if the directors decline to register, then he comes in and asks to be registered under the article, and as the articles provide that they are not bound to specify the grounds, it seems, that the directors are just as much entitled to rely upon the article in the case of the plaintiff Stewart as they are in the case of the plaintiff Berry, who is a member.

That leaves one further point with which I must deal. It is suggested before me that the fact that by agreement—either by the articles or by any other agreement—persons are prevented from making any particular inquiry, does not prevent them, if they bring an action in connection with the matter on that agreement or by virtue of that agreement, from making that inquiry. It has been suggested that interrogatories are a matter arising out of rules of court and that the right to administer interrogatories is not affected by an agreement between the parties. I think Turney v. Bayley (6) is an authority to the contrary, because I think it shows that the existence of an agreement may be ground for refusing a certain sort of discovery. I do not see any reason why that should not be applied to interrogatories as it was applied there to the production of a document. It seems to me that when I have a provision that a party shall

A not be bound to produce a certain document in connection with a particular matter, the mere fact that an action is brought and an application made to deliver interrogatories, does not entirely oust that agreement and preclude the person who had the benefit from relying on it. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that in the circumstances the company would not be bound to answer these interrogatories if they were allowed, and accordingly in view of the agreement between the parties I do not allow them.

Insurance—Motor insurance—Death from accident—Insurers not liable if vehicle driven in unsafe condition—Need to prove knowledge by assured of condition of vehicle—Running warranty by assured of roadworthiness.

Under a policy of motor insurance dated Feb. 19, 1930, an assured was insured against loss through death by accident sustained in connection with a vehicle
F described in the schedule to the policy. On Nov. 17, 1930, while the assured was driving a car covered by the policy, he collided with another car and was killed. At the time of the collision the lights of the assured's car were not on, and to a claim under the policy the insurers pleaded that the case fell within an exception of their liability contained in the policy in that at the time of the accident the car was "being driven in an unsafe condition."

G Held: the terms of the exception were unambiguous and plain; to escape liability under it the insurers need not show that the assured was aware of the unsafe condition of the car; the law affecting the exception could not be assimilated to the maritime law of seaworthiness so that the exception would apply only where the car was in an unsafe condition at the beginning of its journey; and, therefore, the insurers were not liable under the policy.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand.

The appellant, Mrs. Marjorie L'Estrange Trickett, claimed, as assignee of the rights from the personal representative of her father, Alfred John Ernest Wiggs £1,000 from the respondent company under a policy of motor insurance, dated Feb. 19, 1930, in respect of the death of her father, who was killed when driving a motor car which collided with another car on Nov. 17, 1930. By an order of the Supreme Court the Public Trustee of New Zealand, who was appointed executor of the will of the insured, and J. S. E. Wiggs, who was co-beneficiary with the appellant under the will, were added as defendants to the action. The respondent company pleaded by way of defence that at the time of the collision Mr. Wiggs's car was being driven without lights, and so was in an unsafe condition, so that they were exonerated from liability under a clause in the policy which provided that:

> "No liability shall attach to the company under this policy in respect of any loss . . . or any personal accident to the insured occurring: (i) while any motor vehicle in connection with which indemnity is granted under this policy is: (e) Being driven in a damaged or unsafe condition."

The Court of Appeal of New Zealand held, affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court of New Zealand, that at and about the time of the collision the lights of Mr. Wiggs's car were not shining, and that the appellant's action therefore failed. The appellant appealed on the grounds (i) that in order to escape liability the respondent company must show that the driver was aware of the fact that the car was being driven in a damaged or unsafe condition, and (ii) that the law affecting the proviso above referred to could be assimilated to the maritime law of seaworthiness and that proviso (1) (e) applied only where the car was in a damaged or unsafe condition at the commencement of its journey.

Dec. 9. LORD ALNESS.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand, dated Nov. 25, 1932, affirming, by a majority, a judgment of the Supreme Court of New Zealand, whereby judgment was entered for the respondent company.

The issues in the case lie within a narrow compass. The appellant, who was plaintiff in the action, and whose title is not in dispute, is a daughter of a retired civil servant named Alfred John Ernest Wiggs. Wiggs was killed in a motor accident on the night of Nov. 17, 1930. At the time of his death he was insured with the respondent company under a policy of motor insurance; and the claim made by the appellant in the action was for a sum of £1,000, payable, as she maintained, under the said policy, in respect of the death of her father.

The question in the appeal is whether in the circumstances in which Wiggs was killed, the respondent company is exempted from liability by reason of one of the exceptions in the policy of insurance.

The policy is dated Feb. 19, 1930. The clause under which the claim is made by the plaintiff is in these terms:

> "If the insured, whilst between the ages of sixteen and sixty-five, shall be injured by an accident sustained in connection with any motor vehicle described in the schedule hereto . . . the company shall pay to the insured or his legal personal representative compensation under the following scale: (a) If the accident shall within three calendar months of the occurrence thereof be the direct and immediate cause of the death of the insured, the sum of £1,000. . . ."

The exception, under which the respondent company successfully resisted liability in the courts below, is in these terms:

> "No liability shall attach to the company under this policy in respect of any loss, damage or liability occurring or any personal accident to the insured occurring: (i) While any motor vehicle in connection with which indemnity is granted under this policy is—(e) being driven in a damaged or unsafe condition."

The circumstances under which the appellant's claim arises are as follows. About midnight on Nov. 17, 1930, a motor car was being driven by the deceased, Wiggs, in a northerly direction, on the Hutt-road, from Petone to Wellington. His car collided with another car, which was being driven in the opposite direction—that is, in a southerly direction on the Hutt-road—by a Dr. Findlater. As a result of the collision Wiggs was killed. The respondent company maintained that Wiggs's car was, at the time of the collision, being driven without lights; that it was, therefore, in an unsafe condition, and that, accordingly, under the proviso already quoted, they were relieved from liability under the policy. All the judges in the courts below held that, at and about the time of the collision, the lights of Wiggs's car were not shining. In particular, the dissentient judge in the Court of Appeal, HERDMAN, J., in the course of his judgment said:

> "The learned Chief Justice, in the court below, found that before the collision took place the condition of the car, so far as its lights were concerned, was unsafe, and that this unsatisfactory state of affairs had existed for some time, at any rate before the actual impact. The evidence justifies this finding of fact."

This finding was not challenged in argument by the appellant's counsel. Indeed, he was constrained to admit that it was correct, and justified by the evidence. Counsel, however, for the appellant, maintained these contentions: (i) That, in order that the respondent company should escape liability under the policy, it must show, not only that the car was being driven in a damaged or unsafe condition, but also that the driver was aware of that fact. (ii) That it was not established in evidence by the respondent company that the driver of the car was aware of its damaged or unsafe condition. (iii) That the law affecting the proviso referred to can be assimilated to the maritime law of seaworthiness, and that, on that analogy, proviso (1) (e) applies only where the car was in a damaged or unsafe condition at the beginning of its journey, or that, in other words, there is no running warranty by the driver of the roadworthiness of the car.

Their Lordships proceed to examine these contentions in their order, bearing in mind that the onus is on the respondent company to show that the case falls within an exception to the policy of insurance issued by them. This was recognised in the court of first instance, where the respondent company led in the proof. On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that the function of an exception to a policy is to limit the liability under it, and to destroy a right which, apart from the exception, would survive.

(i) Is knowledge on the part of the driver of a car of its damaged or unsafe condition an essential ingredient of proviso (1) (e) of the general exceptions to the policy? The appellant maintained that it is, inasmuch as the proviso is ambiguous in its terms, and is, therefore, open to the conclusion contended for by the appellant. The proviso being, as the appellant's counsel maintained, ambiguous in its terms, he compared it with exception (d) in the policy, under the heading of "Loss or damage to motor vehicle," and contended that, only on the view that his argument upon proviso (4) (1) (e) was sound, could the provisions of the two clauses reasonably be reconciled. It must be remembered that, in the present case, the defect was not a latent one, which was potentially dangerous. As to the case of a latent defect their Lordships offer no opinion. The car in the case under consideration was actually and de presenti unsafe to drive, because a necessary appliance was not functioning. It was driven after that state of affairs had developed. Unless their Lordships can assume—which they cannot—that in every case which could occur under proviso (d) under "loss or damage to car" the general proviso (4) (1) (e) would also apply and displace it, the suggested repugnancy does not arise. Their Lordships are unable to take the first step which is essential to the success of the appellant's argument, and to hold that proviso (4) (1) (e) is couched in ambiguous terms. On the contrary, in the judgment of their Lordships, the terms of the proviso are unambiguous and plain—indeed intractable. Their Lordships cannot find any justification for supplementing the terms of the proviso by adding to it the words "to the knowledge of the driver," as they are invited to do by the appellant, for reforming the contract into which he entered. It is not immaterial to observe in this connection that, in certain of the other provisos which are adjacent to that with which the board are concerned, the knowledge of the assured is set out eo nomine, where it is intended that that knowledge should form a condition of the contract between the parties. Their Lordships have in these circumstances no hesitation in rejecting the first contention of the appellant, and in refusing to read into the policy words which are not there.

(ii) If the views above expressed are sound, the second argument propounded by the appellant, which relates to the proved knowledge by the driver of the damaged or unsafe condition of the car, does not arise. Their Lordships, however, cannot refrain from adding that, on the evidence, they would have great difficulty in holding that the deceased was ignorant of the unlit condition of his car.

(iii) The third point argued by counsel for the appellant is quite independent of the previous two points. His contention depends for its validity on certain dicta of GODDARD, J., in Barrett v. London General Insurance Co., Ltd. (1). All that their Lordships find it necessary to say regarding that judgment is that, while not questioning the conclusion reached by the learned judge on the facts of the case, they find great difficulty in agreeing with the reasons upon which that conclusion was based. They are not able to assimilate, as did the learned judge, the position of a ship at sea with that of a motor car on land, and to apply rigidly the same code of law to both cases. For reasons which are too obvious to be stressed in detail, their Lordships think the analogue imperfect, and, indeed, misleading. They are of opinion that the argument based by the appellant on the identity of the conditions which govern the seaworthiness of a ship at sea and the roadworthiness of a car on land is unsound.

In the result, therefore, their Lordships are of opinion that the three contentions advanced on behalf of the appellant fail, that the majority judgment of the Court of Appeal falls to be affirmed, and that the present appeal should be refused. They will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Law—Committal—Committal to more convenient assizes—"Next assizes" unlikely to be held within a month—Criminal Justice Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 86), s. 14 (1).

By s. 14 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925: "The justices before whom any person is charged with an indictable offence, may, instead of committing him to be tried at the assizes . . . for a place to which but for this section he might have been committed, commit him to be tried at the assizes for some other place . . . if it appears to them, having regard to the time when and the place where the last-mentioned assizes . . . are to be held, to be more convenient to commit the accused person to those assizes . . . with a view either to expediting his trial or saving expense: Provided that the power given by this subsection shall not be exercised—(a) unless the examining justices are satisfied at the date of the committal that the next assizes . . . to which, but for this section, he might have been committed, will not be held within one month from that date. . . ."

"Next assizes" in the proviso to the above subsection means next assizes after the date of committal, and cannot refer to assizes which have already begun at that date.

The appellant was committed for trial to Northamptonshire autumn assizes, which began on Oct. 15, 1935, by justices sitting in the county of Bedford. The day on which committal took place was Oct. 11, 1935, which was the commission day for the Bedfordshire autumn assizes.

Held: the "next assizes" for the purposes of the above proviso were in this case the Bedfordshire winter assizes, which would be held in January, 1936, and, therefore, the proviso to s. 14 (1) did not apply, and the justices were entitled to commit the appellant to the Northamptonshire autumn assizes, as being more convenient.

Notes. Section 14 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, is now replaced by s. 10 (1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952.

Appeal against conviction.

The appellant was convicted at Northamptonshire assizes of indecent assault on a woman, and was sentenced by DU PARCQ, J., to seven months' imprisonment with hard labour.

The appellant was committed for trial by justices sitting in the county of Bedford on Oct. 11, 1935, which was commission day for the Bedfordshire autumn assizes. At the trial, before the appellant pleaded to the indictment, a motion was made on his behalf to quash the indictment. It was contended that the justices had no power to commit to Northamptonshire assizes, as the proviso to s. 14 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, applied, and that, as there was power to prefer an indictment at the Bedfordshire autumn assizes after their commencement by leave of the judge, those assizes were "the next assizes . . . to which, but for [the] section [the appellant] might have been committed," and would take place within one month of the date of committal.

DU PARCQ, J., held that the motion failed, and gave judgment in the following terms: In this case counsel has taken a point on behalf of the defendant which, I think, fails, and that the answer made by counsel for the Crown completely disposes of it. But undoubtedly it is a point well worthy of consideration.

The defendant, who has not yet pleaded to the indictment against him, was committed for trial at these assizes by magistrates in the county of Bedford. In the ordinary way, he would have been committed to be tried at the assizes for the county of Bedford, but magistrates in these days have power, in certain circumstances, to commit to assizes other than those to which they would have committed before certain legislation. [His Lordship read s. 14 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, and continued:] In the present case the justices committed the accused man to these assizes on what is usually called the commission day of the Bedfordshire Assizes—so-called, as I understand, because it is the day upon which the judge may—and in former days habitually did—attend at the court in order that the commission might be opened and the work of the assizes begun. It was not, I think, usual ever to do much on that first day, except to open the commission, though I think that at some time it was customary to charge the grand jury upon that day, and I am told by the learned clerk of assize, who has great experience in these matters, that it is within his own recollection that as recently as 1895 the commission was opened by the judge of assize on what we now call commission day. It has become customary, for reasons of convenience, and in order to save the time of judges and others, to wait until what is commonly called the first working day of the assizes to open the commission, but I think there is no doubt that the first day of the assizes is commission day. Everybody knows that sentences are reckoned from the first day of the assizes, and that means commission day, and it may be taken as a general rule that for most purposes, at any rate, commission day is the first day of the assizes.

The question is: Were the magistrates right in thinking that the next assizes to which, but for s. 14 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, the accused might have been committed would not be held within one month? Counsel for the accused says that they were wrong. He says that the next assizes were the assizes which had then not begun except in the sense that Oct. 11 was their commission day. He says that the work had not begun, and that there was no reason why the magistrates should not commit to the assizes on commission day. I think that the assizes had begun, and, unless one is to read "the next assizes . . . to which . . . he might have been committed" as including assizes which have already begun, counsel's contention on that point must be wrong. He says that the assizes which had begun were assizes to which the magistrates might have committed the accused person, and he prays in aid a rule made by the Lord Chancellor under powers conferred upon him by s. 2 (6) of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933. [His Lordship read the rule and continued:] Counsel says that, in the view, at any rate, of the Lord Chancellor who made that rule, there was nothing to prevent a committal to assizes, not only after the commission day, but after the first working day, provided that the judge gives the necessary leave for the indictment to be preferred.

In order to see what force there is in that contention, it is necessary to look a little more closely at the law, and to bear in mind the history of these matters. Counsel for the Crown has referred me to a provision of an Act of Parliament, which I think is of very great importance in this case. It was provided by s. 27 of the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, that "at any time after all the examinations aforesaid"—that is to say, the taking of evidence before the justices—

> "shall have been completed, and before the first day of the assizes or sessions or other first sitting of the court at which any person so committed to prison or admitted to bail as aforesaid is to be tried, such person may require and shall be entitled to have, of and from the officer or person having the custody of the same, copies of the depositions on which he shall have been committed or bailed."

That seems to me to make it clear that justices cannot properly commit a man for trial except at such a time as will give him that opportunity which the legislature has said he must have of procuring copies of the depositions, upon which he has been committed to be tried, and, if justices were to commit him after the assizes had begun, it would be quite impossible for the provisions of that section to be carried out. That section seems to me to throw light upon the intention of the legislature when they use the words "the next assizes" in s. 14 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, because I must assume that the legislature in 1925 were not forgetful of what had been provided by the legislature in 1848. I must, therefore, read "the next assizes" as meaning assizes which have not yet begun, and which will begin at some time subsequent to the committal. If that is so, the justices seem to me to have been right in thinking that the next assizes would not be held within one month from the date of the committal, and that "the next assizes" in this case meant those assizes which will take place at Bedford at the beginning of 1936.

I ought to say something about that rule made by the Lord Chancellor, to which I have been referred. The Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, was an Act which, among other things, abolished grand juries, and so made a very sweeping alteration in the law. Until 1933 it was for the grand jury to decide whether a man should be put upon his trial before the petty jury, and one has to remember that it was not essential that a man should have been committed by magistrates. Of course, by far the greater number of those who come before a court of assizes or quarter sessions have been committed for trial by magistrates; but it has always been, within certain limits defined by Acts of Parliament, the right of any of His Majesty's subjects to prefer a bill of indictment at assizes, and it used to be for the grand jury to say whether a man should be put upon his trial upon that indictment. There have been cases within the recollection of some of us where magistrates have refused to commit, and yet a grand jury have found the bill of indictment to be a true bill, and a man has been put upon his trial. I remember one fairly recent instance at the Central Criminal Court. The Act of 1933 had to make provision for cases of that kind, and did so. There are still cases in which magistrates have not committed a man for trial, and yet he may be put upon his trial before a jury. Section 2 (6) of the Act provided that the Lord Chancellor might make rules for carrying that section into effect, and in particular for making provision (a) for the manner in which and the time at which bills of indictment were to be preferred before any court, and (b) the manner in which application was to be made for the consent of a judge of the High Court or of a commissioner of assize for the preferment of a bill of indictment. It is plain, I think, that what the legislature had especially in mind were those cases where magistrates had not committed for trial, but where the new machinery provided by the Act was to be put into force in order that permission might be obtained for a bill of indictment to be preferred. There is no reason to feel any difficulty with regard to the rule made by the Lord Chancellor. The rule is in the following terms:

> "Except with the leave of the judge or chairman, no bill of indictment shall be preferred at any assizes or quarter sessions after the first working day of those assizes or sessions."

I am satisfied, having heard the arguments addressed to me to-day, that what was in contemplation when the Lord Chancellor made the rule was only the case of those indictments which have not been preceded by a hearing before magistrates and a committal by magistrates.

I will say quite frankly that on other circuits I have granted applications made to me during the pendency of an assize for leave to prefer a bill of indictment based upon a committal by justices. I am not sure whether that was a right course to take, but I am satisfied that justices ought not to commit to any assizes which have already begun, for the reason that, if they do so, they are depriving the accused person of his rights under the Act of 1848. In those circumstances, I think that the committal in this case is right. I think that the justices took the proper course, and that the preliminary objection fails.

The appellant then pleaded Not Guilty, and was tried upon the indictment, and convicted and sentenced as above stated.

By s. 14 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925:

> "The justices before whom any person is charged with an indictable offence, may, instead of committing him to be tried at the assizes or quarter sessions for a place to which but for this section he might have been committed, commit him to be tried at the assizes for some other place or (if the offence is within the jurisdiction of a court of quarter sessions) at the quarter sessions for some other place, if it appears to them, having regard to the time when and the place where the last-mentioned assizes or quarter sessions are to be held, to be more convenient to commit the accused person to those assizes or quarter sessions with a view either to expediting his trial or saving expense: Provided that the power given by this subsection shall not be exercised—(a) unless the examining justices are satisfied at the date of the committal that the next assizes or quarter sessions to which, but for this section he might have been committed will not be held within one month from that date. . . ."

By r. 2 of the Indictments (Procedure) Rules, 1933:

> "Except with the leave of the judge or chairman, no bill of indictment shall be preferred at any assizes or quarter sessions after the first working day of those assizes or sessions."

S. Granville-Smith for the appellant.

C. L. Henderson, for the Crown, was not called on to argue.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

MACNAGHTEN, J.—Oct. 11, 1935, was commission day for the autumn assizes for the county of Bedford. On that day justices of the peace sitting in the county of Bedford decided that the appellant should be committed to take his trial for an indictable offence, and the question arose in what county the trial should take place. [His Lordship read s. 14 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, and continued:] It appeared to the justices that in view of the fact that Oct. 11 was commission day for the Bedfordshire assizes, it would be more convenient to commit the accused man for trial at the assizes for the county of Northampton, which were to take place within a week. At the Northamptonshire assizes on Oct. 17 the objection was taken before the judge on behalf of the appellant that the Bedfordshire justices had no jurisdiction to commit him to those assizes by reason of the proviso to s. 14 of the Act of 1925. It was said that the next assizes to which, but for the provisions of the section, he must have been committed were not the Bedfordshire winter assizes in January, 1936, but the autumn assizes for that county. The judge overruled the objection. This court has had the advantage of hearing an exhaustive argument on behalf of the appellant, but the point can be dealt with by saying that in the proviso to s. 14 the word "next" plainly means "next after the date of committal." Applying that construction in the present case, the next assizes for the county of Bedford were the assizes commencing next after Oct. 11, 1935, that is to say, the winter assizes which would be held in January, 1936. The justices were, therefore, entitled to commit the accused person to Northamptonshire assizes, it being plainly more convenient that the trial should take place there than at Bedford in January, 1936. The appeal must be dismissed. A B C

Trust—Administration—Administration by court—Order empowering trustees to advance capital—Effect of forfeiture clause in trust instrument—Trustee Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 19), s. 57 (1).

Under the will of her father the plaintiff became entitled to be paid a one-third share of the income of a trust fund "during her life and until some event shall have happened or shall happen whereby if the same income belonged absolutely to her she would be deprived of the personal enjoyment thereof." The plaintiff, having incurred pressing debts, sought an order of the court under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57 (1), conferring on the trustees of the will power to advance to her a portion of the capital moneys, to carry out which arrangement the trustees had prepared a scheme. She then took out a summons asking, inter alia, whether, owing to the forfeiture clause in the will, a forfeiture of her life interest would take place if the court made the order. G H

Held: where an order was made by the court under s. 57 (1) the effect was as though the power which was being put into operation had been inserted in the trust instrument as an overriding power; if, in the present case, the trustees had been given an overriding power to raise capital sums for the benefit of the plaintiff the exercise of that power would not have brought into operation the forfeiture clause which would only operate on so much of the income as remained after the capital sum advanced had been taken out of the fund; and, therefore, the plaintiff would not forfeit her life estate in the fund if the court made the order. I

Per FARWELL, J.: If a scheme sanctioned by the court involves an agreement by the tenant for life to make payments with a proviso that, if they are not duly paid, the trustees are to pay them out of income, the failure to pay by the tenant for life will create a forfeiture, since it will be his act or omission which creates the forfeiture and not the exercise by the court of its overriding power.

Adjourned Summons

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of FARWELL, J.:

The testator gave his residuary estate to his trustees

> "upon trust that my trustees or trustee shall pay one-third part of the income of the said trust premises unto each of them my wife Emma Collinson Mair and my daughter Mary Cassandra French the wife of the Honourable Robert French (but as to the said Mary Cassandra French subject to the payments or retainer thereout hereinafter mentioned) during her life and until some event shall have happened or shall happen whereby if the same income belonged absolutely to her she would be deprived of the personal enjoyment thereof, or of any part thereof."

In that event the income is held upon a discretionary trust (in the events which have happened) for the two ladies and their husbands, and subject thereto the two ladies together are absolutely entitled to the fund. The scheme which is being put forward is primarily for the purpose of enabling one of the ladies to pay certain pressing liabilities. Whether or not the scheme be one which I ought to approve is a matter which I am not for the moment considering. It is enough to say that it involves payment out of capital of a very considerable sum to the former of the two ladies, the plaintiff, and the other lady, as a term of consenting to the arrangement, desires to have paid out to herself a capital sum equal to the amount raised to pay the debts. It is quite plain that this is a scheme which, even if I approve it, could not be carried out at all except under s. 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925. That section has been inserted in the Act for the purpose of enabling and permitting the court to sanction what would otherwise be breaches of trust. The question I have to determine is this. Assuming that the court thinks it right to permit something to be done which is not within the terms of the trust document, will that, if it involves payment out of a capital sum, bring into operation the forfeiture clause in the will.

The Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, provides:

> "(1) Where in the management or administration of any property vested in trustees, any sale, lease, mortgage, surrender, release, or other disposition, or any purchase, investment, acquisition, expenditure, or other transaction, is in the opinion of the court expedient, but the same cannot be effected by reason of the absence of any power for that purpose vested in the trustees by the trust instrument, if any, or by law, the court may by order confer upon the trustees, either generally or in any particular instance, the necessary power for the purpose, on such terms, and subject to such provisions and conditions, if any, as the court may think fit and may direct in what manner any money authorised to be expended, and the costs of any transaction, are to be paid or borne as between capital and income. (2) The court may, from time to time, rescind or vary any order made under this section, or may make any new or further order. (3) An application to the court under this section may be made by the trustees, or by any of them, or by any person beneficially interested under the trust. (4) This section does not apply to trustees of a settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925."

FARWELL, J., stated the facts and continued: In my judgment, the answer to the question I have to determine must be in the negative. If and when the court sanctions an arrangement or transaction under s. 57, the effect is as though the power

A which is being put into operation had been inserted in the trust instrument as an overriding power. One may take this case. If here the trustees had been given an overriding power to raise capital sums out of the residuary estate for the benefit of either of these two ladies, it could not be suggested that the exercise of that power would have brought this clause into operation. The true effect of the two clauses combined would have been that the forfeiture clause would only have operated on so much of the income B as was from time to time payable to the ladies under the trust, and the exercise of the power, although it would have resulted in reducing the income, would not have had the effect of bringing into operation the forfeiture clause, but would have left the forfeiture clause to operate on so much of the income as was still payable.

If that be the true view, the effect of the court permitting the exercise by trustees of some power which is not in the trust document itself, and, therefore, something which C the trustees could not do except by the direction of the court, is the same as though that power had been inserted as an overriding power in the trust document, and if the court comes to the conclusion that it is proper to permit trustees to take out of capital a sum of money for a particular purpose, a forfeiture clause of this sort will only operate upon so much of the income as remains after taking out of that capital sum, and the direction of the court will not operate as an event whereby, if the income belonged D absolutely to the tenant for life, he or she would be deprived of the personal enjoyment of it. In other words such a clause operates on the income from time to time payable to the life tenant. If there is a proper exercise of an overriding power, whether it be in the instrument itself or by virtue of s. 57, the exercise of that power does not bring into operation the forfeiture clause. The forfeiture clause remains attached to the income which is payable to the tenant for life from time to time. If this be the true E view it must follow that it matters not whether the application to the court is made by or with the consent of the tenant for life.

It must, however, be remembered that if a scheme sanctioned by the court involves, as in Re Salting (1) an agreement or covenant by the tenant for life to pay premiums on policies or other like payments with a proviso that, if they are not duly paid, the trustees are to pay them out of income, the failure to pay by the tenant for life will create a F forfeiture, since it will be the act or omission of the tenant for life that creates the forfeiture and not the exercise by the court of its overriding power.

WATKINS v. HEREFORDSHIRE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE

[King's Bench Division (Lord Hewart, C.J., Goddard and Singleton, JJ.), December 16, 1935]

Rates—Agricultural land—Land covered with water—Adjoining land occupied by farmer as agricultural land—Verbal letting of right to fish in water—Local Government Act, 1929 (19 Geo. 5, c. 17), s. 67 (1).

Adjoining certain agricultural land owned and occupied by a farmer were a river and brook. The farmer owned the whole bed of the river for about a furlong, its bed ad medium filum for a further furlong, and the bed of the brook for about three-quarters of a mile. The adjoining portion of land was of the same alluvial substance as the beds of the river and brook. The fishing in the above portion of the river and brook was verbally let by the farmer to another person, but the farmer himself used the river and brook for sheep-washing, and the shingle and gravel extracted therefrom for repairs to farm buildings, roads, and river banks. The assessment committee confirmed a proposal by the rating authority for the inclusion in the valuation list of a new hereditament described as "land covered with water with fishing rights," but quarter sessions reversed the assessment committee's order. On appeal by the assessment committee to the Divisional Court, Held: the bed of the portions of the river and stream in question formed part of the land adjoining the river and stream; the adjoining land was agricultural land; and, therefore, there was material on which quarter sessions could find that the land covered by the water of the river and stream was also agricultural land, and, as such, entitled to exemption from rating under s. 67 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1929.

Notes. As to rating of sporting rights and agricultural land, see 27 Halsbury's Laws (2nd Edn.) 430, 431, 466, and for cases, see 38 Digest 458, 500. For Local Government Act, 1929, see 20 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 190.

Case Stated by Herefordshire Quarter Sessions.

On May 19, 1934, the rating authority for the rural district of Dore and Bredwardine, Herefordshire, served upon Mr. Charles Watkins a requisition for a return under the provisions of ss. 40 and 41 of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, in respect of fishing rights in the parish of Longtown occupied, owned, or leased by him. On May 24, 1934, Mr. Watkins made a return accordingly, stating that he was the owner of fishing rights situate at the Groves Farm, Longtown, and let to Mr. Moxon without written agreement at £14 for the season of 1934, and stating the annual value of such fishing rights to be £10.

On July 27, 1934, the rating authority, being aggrieved by the omission from the list of the hereditament hereinafter described, made a proposal to the assessment committee, in accordance with s. 37 of the Act, that the undermentioned hereditament be brought into assessment, that is to say:

Name of Occupier.	Name of Owner.	Description of Property.	Name of Situation.	Rateable Value.
Charles Watkins.	Self.	Land covered with water, with fishing rights.	Groves Farm.	£10.

Mr. Watkins gave notice of objection to the proposal, and the proposal and objection were heard by the assessment committee on Jan. 25, 1935.

At the hearing it was agreed that the question of value should be left in abeyance, A and, if necessary, referred back to the assessment committee for decision after the question of liability had been finally determined. The assessment committee overruled the objection, confirmed the proposal, and ordered that particulars of the hereditament be inserted in the valuation list.

Mr. Watkins appealed to Herefordshire Quarter Sessions against the decision. At the hearing before quarter sessions it was proved or admitted that Mr. Watkins was the B owner and occupier of Groves Farm, Longtown, and included in the property owned and occupied by him was the whole bed of the River Monnow for about one furlong in length and the bed, ad medium filum, of the River Monnow for a further furlong, and of the Ecsley Brook for about three-quarters of a mile. The fishing in the above portion of the river and brook was verbally let by Mr. Watkins to a Mr. Moxon for the season 1934 at a rent of £14. The Groves Farm comprised 106 acres of arable, pasture and C woodland, of which about eighty-four acres were meadow, pasture and water, and the livestock maintained thereon numbered about three horses, sixty cattle, and forty-five sheep, with their lambs. This stock was dependent upon the above portion of the river and brook for its supply of water, there being a number of drinking places therein, and slopes leading thereto. The above portion of the river and brook was used by Mr. Watkins in May of each year for the washing of sheep. The annual value of the farm D (apart from any question of loss of fishing) would be £60 per annum less if the river and brook did not exist. The beds of the above portion of the river and brook consisted chiefly of shingle and gravel which accumulate in beds and was removed in the summer when required for repairs to the farm buildings and roads and the banks of the river and brook. There were 1,376 sq. yds. of land adjoining the above portion of the river and brook and comprised in the farm, which were of the same alluvial substance as the beds E of the above portion of the river and brook. There was also a piece of land 60 sq. yds. in area which, until recently, formed part of the river bed, the river having altered its course. The area of land covered by water was subject to seasonal variation.

On behalf of Mr. Watkins it was contended (i) that the proposal on which the assessment was based was bad in law, because no grounds were specified on which the proposed amendment was supported; (ii) that the hereditament in question was agricultural land F and therefore exempt from rateability; (iii) that the hereditament was not kept or preserved mainly or exclusively for purposes of sport or recreation; (iv) that, since there was no severance of the fishing rights from the occupation of the land, the provisions of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1874, had no application to the case; (v) that the hereditament was not rateable in law.

On behalf of the assessment committee it was contended (i) that "land covered with G water" had been recognised as a separate rateable hereditament by Parliament in the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, Sched. II; (ii) that the "land covered with water" must be treated as a separate hereditament; (iii) that the hereditament was not "agricultural land" as defined by s. 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and was not, therefore, exempt from rates under the Local Government Act, 1929; (iv) that the user of the hereditament in conjunction H with the farm for agricultural purposes was immaterial if the hereditament was not "agricultural land" within the Rating and Valuation Acts; (v) that the value of the hereditament was enhanced by the value of the right of fishing therein if not severed; (vi) alternatively, that under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1874, the right of fishing was severed and the value of the hereditament was rightly assessed as enhanced by the value of the fishing rights under s. 6 of the Act of 1874; (vii) that "severance" within I the meaning of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1874, may be effected without a deed.

The justices found as a fact that the predominant user of the beds of the river and brook was agricultural. They were of opinion that the hereditament was agricultural land and should be subject to derating. They, therefore, ordered the assessment to be discharged and allowed the appeal. The assessment committee appealed to the Divisional Court.

By s. 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, agricultural land

A is defined as "any land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only." The Local Government Act, 1929, s. 67 (1), provides:

> "No person shall, in respect of any period beginning on or after the appointed day [April 1, 1929], be liable to pay rates in respect of any agricultural land . . ."

LORD HEWART, C.J.—This is a Case Stated by the court of quarter sessions for the county of Hereford, and the point contained in it may be very shortly put. There was a proposal by the rating authority of a rural district that particulars of a certain hereditament should be added to the valuation list for that district. An C objection to that proposal was made to the assessment committee for the county, and that objection was disallowed. Thereupon the owner and occupier of the land referred to appealed to quarter sessions, and the court of quarter sessions, subject to this Case Stated, allowed the appeal and ordered that the assessment be discharged. The notice which was served by the rating authority upon the owner and occupier in May, 1934, required him to make a return under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, in respect of D fishing rights in the parish of Longtown, occupied, owned, or leased by him, and he made a return accordingly, stating that he was the owner of fishing rights at the Groves Farm, Longtown, let to a Mr. Moxon without written agreement at £14 for the season of 1934, and he stated that the annual value of those fishing rights was £10. Accordingly, the proposal was made that the hereditament be brought into assessment in this form:

> "Name of occupier—Charles Watkins: Name of owner—self: Description of E property—land covered with water with fishing rights: Name or situation—Groves Farm: Rateable Value £10."

It was proved at quarter sessions that included in the property owned and occupied by Mr. Watkins was the whole bed of the River Monnow for about one furlong in length and the bed ad medium filum of the said river for a further furlong, and of a brook for about three-quarters of a mile, and that the fishing in that part of the river and brook F was by oral agreement let by Mr. Watkins to Mr. Moxon for the season 1934 at a rent of £14.

The main contention on the part of Mr. Watkins was that the hereditament in question, that is to say, the hereditament which was sought by the proposal to be brought into assessment, was agricultural land, and, therefore, exempt from rateability. There was a minor point whereby it was alleged that the proposal was insufficient, inasmuch G as no grounds were specified upon which the proposed amendment of the valuation list was to be supported. There is nothing, I think, in that point. As counsel for the assessment committee has said, the hereditament was not included. The proposal sought that it should be included on the ground that it was rateable. The real question was, and is, whether it was true to say that the hereditament in question was agricultural land, and, therefore, exempt from rateability. The justices of quarter sessions came H to the conclusion, and found as a fact, that the predominant user of the beds of the river and brook was agricultural. Being of opinion that the hereditament was agricultural land, they held that it was not to be included in the list.

There was a time in the course of this argument when I was impressed by the clear and forcible contention of counsel for the assessment committee, but the conclusion to which I have finally come is that we ought not to disturb the finding and the opinion of quarter I sessions. Under the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, the expression "agricultural hereditament" is defined, and that definition applies notwithstanding the more comprehensive provisions of the Act of 1929. "Agricultural hereditament," by s. 2 of the Act of 1928, means "any hereditament being agricultural land or agricultural buildings"; and by sub-s. (2) it was provided as follows: "'Agricultural land' means any land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only," &c. Is it true to say that this land, being what it was and used as it was, came within the expression "land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only"? At first blush, as is obvious, there are difficulties in contending that land covered with water is agricultural land. It is difficult to say that it is used as arable meadow or pasture ground only. Nevertheless, these justices have evidently come to the conclusion that this land was part and parcel of the farm, part and parcel of the agricultural land, and that the use for fishing to which it was put was something so entirely subsidiary and ancillary to the use of the land as agricultural land that the part was to be taken as comprised in the whole and that it could not properly be separated therefrom.

The question was suggested in argument: What would have been the true conclusion if, instead of letting to another person the right of catching fish in this water, the owner-occupier had himself fished that water? Could it then have been said that he was doing something which took that part of his premises out of the description of "agricultural land"? I do not think that that proposition could have been put forward, except for the purpose of controversy, and it seems to me to make no real difference that, instead of fishing this water himself, he let the right of fishing, by word of mouth, to another person in consideration of an annual payment. I think that the justices were entitled to come to the conclusion that, upon a fair view of the whole matter, this water being where it was and the land of the farmer being land upon both sides of the stream, the fishing in that water was a minor and subsidiary thing which did not take away from the whole hereditament the character of agricultural land. I am not prepared, on these materials, to hold that the justices were wrong, and I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

GODDARD, J.—I agree. I think the case is really an ingenious, although, no doubt, quite legitimate, attempt to get round the established doctrine that incorporeal hereditaments cannot be rated, unless there has been a severance by deed. There has been no such severance in this case. This is really an attempt to rate the fishing rights. At first I was rather pressed with the difficulty that, in order to escape rateability, this land had to be shown to be agricultural land, and that "agricultural land" is defined in the Act of 1928 as "land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only." On reflection, I think the difficulty is more apparent than real. The land forming the bed of the stream belongs to the owners of the land forming the banks. The banks are for a certain distance owned by one person, who for that distance owns the whole of the bed of the stream. Beyond that point the respective owners of the banks own the bed up to the middle of the stream as part of their land. Therefore, it seems to me that the bed of the stream is part of the field which adjoins the stream. If the field which adjoins the stream is either arable, meadow or pasture land, then I think the bed forms part of that field. I do not think the fact that water runs over it makes any difference, because it is hardly arguable that if one has a pond in a field that pond is not part of the field. The pond may be formed artificially as a new pond, or it may be a pond which is formed merely by a depression in the land in which water collects and which may dry up in time. Such a pond would, I think, be part of the field upon which the pond is situate. So here I think that the bed of the stream is part of the field which borders it, and that, as that field was undoubtedly agricultural land, there was evidence upon which the justices could find that the hereditament in question is agricultural land, and, therefore, de-rateable. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

SINGLETON, J.—I am of the same opinion. Until the year 1934 Mr. Charles Watkins, as owner of the Groves Farm, was exempt from rating in respect of the farm which he occupied. That was because of s. 67 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1929, which is in these terms:

> "For the purpose of valuation lists in force at the appointed day agricultural land and agricultural buildings shall be deemed to have no rateable value, and, notwithstanding anything contained in the enactments hereinbefore in this section mentioned, no particulars with respect to such land or buildings shall be included in any subsequent valuation list."

Included in the property owned and occupied by Mr. Watkins was the whole bed of the River Monnow for about one furlong in length (during which length it ran through his land on both sides) and the bed ad medium filum of the River Monnow for another furlong and of the Ecsley Brook for about three-quarters of a mile. Those portions of the river were treated originally as part of the farm which he occupied and as part of an agricultural hereditament, just as any pond in any field or on any farm is normally treated. In May, 1934, the rating authority served upon him a request for a return under the provisions of ss. 40 and 41 of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, and they desired to know what the fishing rights in the river were and what he did with them. He returned a statement, in accordance with the facts, that he was the owner of fishing rights situate at the Groves Farm, Longtown, and let to Mr. Moxon without written agreement at £14 for the year 1934, himself giving the value of those fishing rights as £10. Thereupon, in July, 1934, the rating authority served a proposal to amend the valuation list by inserting a new hereditament, and that new hereditament, which was said to be occupied and owned by Mr. Watkins, was placed under the description of "Land covered with water with fishing rights." It is quite clear that what the rating authority was trying to do was to get some rateable value in respect of those fishing rights. The matter was considered by the assessment committee, who agreed with the contention of the rating authority, and in the result there was an appeal to quarter sessions.

With regard to the facts of the case, it is important to notice that included in the property owned and occupied by Mr. Watkins is the whole bed of the River Monnow for some part and half for another part: that was owned and occupied by him as part of the agricultural hereditament. Further, the annual value of the farm would (apart from any question of loss of fishing) be £60 per annum less if the said river and brook did not exist, and it is stated that "The area of land covered by water is subject to seasonal variation." It seems to me that quarter sessions, who allowed the appeal against the decision of the assessment committee, must be taken as finding that there was no separate hereditament created at all, in other words, that the river bed is occupied by the farmer as part of his farm.

Counsel for the assessment committee, in the course of his argument, relied on the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and, in particular, on the definition of "agricultural hereditament" and of "agricultural land" contained in s. 2 of that Act. The commencing words of sub-s. (2) are: "'Agricultural land' means any land used as arable meadow or pasture ground only." I am bound to say that, for myself, I think that, if a farmer has a small area of land which happens to have water upon it but which is used as a drinking place by beasts upon that farm, that is part of the pasture ground. The animal that eats also needs to drink. The finding of the justices means, I think, that they were satisfied that the portions of the river with which they were dealing were occupied by the farmer as part of the lands used by his beasts and formed a very considerable part of the agricultural land.

Counsel also sought to put the case forward as one of a separate occupation or a separate hereditament being created by reason of there being an enhancement on account of the fishing rights. He agreed that his argument was in no way dependent upon the fact that the farmer received £14 a year because he had agreed to let someone else fish in the river, and he said that the position would be just the same if the farmer kept the fishing rights in his own hands. I think that quarter sessions were in this case justified in finding that the real value of the farm was agricultural. If there is created or there can be said to be a separate hereditament which is land covered with water with fishing rights, I see no reason at all why the value of that hereditament should be confined to the value of the fishing rights. If that argument is right, a very considerable portion of the rights of any occupier of agricultural land would disappear. I think that the argument of counsel for the assessment committee fails, and that quarter sessions must be taken to have decided that there is no separate hereditament in the circumstances of this case.

Appeal dismissed.

Re DEBTOR (No. 24 of 1935)

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Wright, M.R., Romer and Greene, L.JJ.), December 17, 18, 1935]

Bankruptcy—Partnership—Notice—Service on only one partner.

Petitioning creditors presented against the debtor a bankruptcy petition which was founded on an unsatisfied bankruptcy notice addressed to a firm in which the debtor was a partner. The notice was served on the debtor, but not on the other partner in the firm.

Held: the notice must be taken to have been addressed to each individual member of the firm; the debtor was jointly and severally responsible for all the firm's debts, each of which could be enforced against him individually; and, therefore, the notice was not bad by reason of the fact that it had not been served on both partners.

Notes. As to non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice, see 2 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 272 et seq., and for cases, see 4 DIGEST 86 et seq. For Bankruptcy Act, 1914, see 2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 321.

Appeal by the debtor from an order of a Divisional Court in Bankruptcy (CLAUSON and LUXMOORE, JJ.).

The facts appear from the headnote and the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

B. M. Cloutman for the debtor.

J. B. Blagden for the petitioning creditors.

LORD WRIGHT, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order of the Divisional Court, who reversed an order of the registrar made in certain bankruptcy proceedings. The registrar had refused to make an order on the creditors' petition under s. 5 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which says that the court may dismiss a petition if for sufficient cause no order ought to be made. The question is whether the discretion vested in the registrar was correctly exercised. The Divisional Court has held that it was not correctly exercised, and that the petition ought not to have been dismissed, and this court has now to decide whether the Divisional Court was or was not right. The position has become very complicated in the process of time and in its progress through different courts, but certain questions have emerged, and they are the only questions which I intend to deal with in this judgment. It is because of the view I have formed on these matters that I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and that it should be affirmed.

The first question which I have to consider has reference to the form of the bankruptcy notice considered along with the other relevant proceedings in the case. Having come to a conclusion on that, I shall deal with the second question—or, perhaps, the second and third questions are really one—and that is whether there was sufficient cause for dismissing the petition in the conduct of the petitioning creditors in connection with their antecedent dealings with the debtor—whether there has been any misconduct or extortion in regard to the debt in question.

The debtor, George Frederick Wyatt, before any bankruptcy proceedings were commenced, was trading in partnership as Robert Jackson and Co. I do not know who the other partners were. The firm got into financial difficulties. They were seeking to develop a sort of mail order tea business. They had accepted a great many orders from customers; they had bought a lot of tea from the petitioning creditors, and they were unable to pay for the tea which had been supplied to them. This all happened about the latter part of 1932. In November, 1933, they entered into an agreement about which no question arises here. It was an agreement under which, in order to work off the debt, they were to act as canvassers and agents for the petitioning creditors in connection with what I may call the business that they had established. They were to be employed in the capacity of tea salesmen for a minimum period of one year, and there should be deducted from the commission that they were earning the balance of the debt. In November, 1933, a judgment had been signed against the firm, some days before the agreement that I have mentioned, and that judgment remained entirely unsatisfied. A petition was presented by the petitioning creditors on June 11, 1934. The proceedings in that petition seem to have gone on until October, 1934. An agreement was entered into which is embodied a consent order of the court. It is dated Oct. 15, 1934, and in effect it provided for adjournments at the cost of the petitioning creditors for a certain period, and it provided, on the petitioners consenting, that the debtor should deliver up within twenty-four hours the books of the business with the list of customers, and if the debtor should pay the amount owing to the petitioners within three weeks together with the costs, by agreement or to be taxed, the petitioning creditors then undertook, in effect, not to interfere with the goodwill of the debtors' business, not to solicit orders from their customers, and to forward to the debtors orders received from such customers. It appears that, in pursuance of the conditions of the order that the costs were to be agreed, or taxed in default of agreement, the parties agreed that the costs should be taken at the sum of £150, and that £150 is a figure which must be borne in mind because it becomes important when we come to the next document in the case. That is an agreement of Feb. 5, 1935, which provides:

> "In consideration of your having agreed to the dismissal of the petition herein upon payment of the sum of £150, the agreed costs of the bankruptcy notice and petition, of which amount you have received £135, I hereby agree and undertake to pay to you the balance of £15 apart from the judgment debt and costs."

Thereupon that petition was dismissed. The next petition was presented on May 25, 1935, the debtor having failed to carry out the terms of that letter of Feb. 5, 1935. It is said that the proceedings up to and including the letter of Feb. 5, 1935, constituted extortion and misconduct which would justify the court in dismissing the petition now in question. That is a matter which I shall deal with anon.

Let me now consider the form of the documents relating to the petition now in question, and I must refer to certain authorities in that connection. Judgment, as I have already said, was obtained against the firm. A bankruptcy notice based on that judgment dated April 4, 1935, was issued. It followed the terms of the judgment, was addressed to Robert Jackson & Co. (a firm), it was served on the debtor, and it said:

> "Take notice that within seven days after service of this notice on you . . . you must pay to [the petitioning creditors or their agents] the sum of £459 10s. 11d. . . . as being the amount due on a final judgment obtained by them against you in the High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division, dated Nov. 21, 1933, whereon execution has not been stayed or you must secure or compound for the said sum to their satisfaction or to the satisfaction of their said agent or to the satisfaction of this court."

That notice was served on the debtor, Wyatt. It was not complied with, and it was followed by the petition dated May 29, 1935, addressed to Wyatt, formerly trading in partnership as Robert Jackson & Co. and lately carrying on business at an address in Southwark. It recites that the debtor, George Frederick Wyatt,

> "failed to comply before Wednesday, the 1st day of May, 1935, with the requirements of a bankruptcy notice duly served upon him on Tuesday, the 23rd day of April, 1935."

The petition was served upon Wyatt personally.

The question which has been raised is this. It is said that the notice was invalid because it ought to have been served upon both partners, whereas it was only served upon one partner, namely, the debtor. Certain authorities have been referred to, but before I deal with them I should like just to refer to the terms of the Act, which define what constitutes an act of bankruptcy. Section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, says this:

> "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases:—(g) If a creditor has obtained a final judgment or final order against him for any amount, and, execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England . . . a bankruptcy notice . . . and he does not, within seven days after service of the notice, in case the service is effected in England . . . either comply with the requirements of the notice or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim . . ."

Those are the conditions which constitute an act of bankruptcy. If we regard those conditions, and apply them to the circumstances of this case, we find that there has been a final judgment or order against the debtor. It is perfectly true that in form the judgment was against a firm of Robert Jackson & Co., of whom the debtor was a partner, but none the less it is a judgment against the debtor in his several capacity as a partner. He is jointly and severally responsible for all the debts of the firm; each debt including this judgment debt may be enforced against him individually; and, therefore, there is a final judgment against him, even though it is also a judgment against the firm. Execution has not been stayed. There has been served upon that debtor a bankruptcy notice, and he has not, within seven days after service of the notice, complied with its terms in any way. It seems, therefore, on that analysis of the position that the matter was complete and in order. Section 2 of the Act provides:

> "A bankruptcy notice under this Act shall be in the prescribed form [which this notice was] and shall require the debtor to pay the judgment debt or sum ordered to be paid in accordance with the terms of the judgment or order, or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor or the court, and shall state the consequences of non-compliance with the notice, and shall be served in the prescribed manner."

The form in this case, beyond question, is as prescribed. It is said, however, that it is not in order because, the judgment being against joint debtors, that is, against the firm, the bankruptcy notice ought to be served on each of those debtors individually. No authority has been produced for that proposition, and, as I have already indicated, there does not seem to be any foundation for it in the terms of the Bankruptcy Act.

So far as authority goes I find in Re Low, Ex Parte Gibson (1), an authority which, though not dealing with partnership but dealing with joint-debtors, seems to me to point to the directly opposite conclusion. In that case there was an application to set aside a bankruptcy notice. It appeared that an action had been brought against the debtor and five other persons and judgment recovered against the debtor and three of his co-defendants, so that there was judgment against four debtors. A bankruptcy notice served on the debtor stated that the judgment had been recovered against the debtor and all the five co-defendants. That was an irregularity which could be cured, and I cast that aside. But there was a further point. It was held there that > "where judgment has been recovered against several persons jointly, a bankruptcy notice may be issued against one of the joint-judgment debtors without including the others."

LORD ESHER, Master of the Rolls, said this ([1895] 1 Q.B. at p. 736):

> "The other point raised is not one on which the notice should be set aside. It is said that where the judgment is a joint one against several defendants, a bankruptcy notice cannot be effective except it is drawn up against all the defendants, although it need only be served on the one whom it is desired to make bankrupt. I fail to see what good it can do that one to have the names of the others put in the notice when there is absolutely no necessity for serving it on them. This is a technicality to which we ought not to listen."

A RIGBY, L.J. ([1895] 1 Q.B. at p. 737), said:

> "I do not see that any substantial injustice has been done to the person served with the notice, or that he can be in any way deceived by it. If so, it ought to be amended."

That is the other point which I am not concerned with. "As to the other point raised" B —that is the point which is material here—

> "I cannot understand why it should be obligatory on a judgment creditor to add to the bankruptcy notice the names of all the persons against whom the judgment was recovered, when it is not his intention to follow it up against any of those persons except the one whom he proposes to serve."

That obviously is not quite in point here because the names of all the debtors were set C out in the bankruptcy notice, but it was only served upon the debtor against whom it was the creditors' intention to follow it up. It follows eventually that the Court of Appeal there are taking the view that all that is material is that the person against whom it is intended to proceed in bankruptcy should have the bankruptcy notice served upon him, and that was done in this case.

The other case which has also been relied upon is Re Wenham, Ex parte Battams (2). D There there were two persons who had been carrying on business in partnership. A writ had been issued and served against each of those partners, and the bankruptcy notice, following the judgment, was addressed to Wenham Brothers. It was served personally on each of the partners. Then a question was raised which is dealt with by WRIGHT, J., in this way ([1900] 2 Q.B. at p. 701):

> E "Was it possible to issue a good bankruptcy notice against the firm, the partnership having been dissolved? The bankruptcy notice followed the judgment, being addressed to the firm by the firm name. In the bankruptcy rules there is no express provision dealing with the case, nor is there any decision since R.S.C., Ord. 48A was passed. The point would be one of some difficulty, but for two circumstances: first, the bankruptcy notice followed the form of the judgment; and F secondly, it was served upon John Wenham [the debtor] personally. Looking at the substance of the matter, I think we ought to hold that enough has been done here—that in such a case as the present a bankruptcy notice which follows the form of the judgment is good if it has been served upon the person sought to be affected by it. If the bankruptcy notice be good, there is no reason why a bankruptcy petition should not be presented against either of the brothers Wenham."

G The learned judge there is in express terms, though it was not necessary for his judgment, treating the service upon the debtor whom it was sought to make bankrupt as being all that was necessary; and that agrees, in my judgment, with the view which is expressed, or if not expressed, is certainly implied, in the passages which I have read from Re Low (1).

It is perfectly true that if the law is so, as I think it is, the form which is used is not H altogether apt. It is a little difficult to construe the petition precisely, but I do not think that these difficulties affect the substance of the matter. I rely on the law as stated in Re Low (1) as applying to the facts of a joint debt as embodied in the sections of the Act which I have read, and I think that that view of the law is in consonance with the authorities which I have referred to, and it certainly is in consonance on the ground of business efficacy. Certainly it can be pointed out that the terms of the I petition are a little difficult to apply, and indeed so are the terms of the bankruptcy notice. The bankruptcy notice is addressed to two people—Robert Jackson & Co.—and says: "Take notice that within seven days after service of this notice on you." It was not served on the firm because at the material date it seems it did not exist, and, anyhow, had no principal place of business. It could be only served on one or other of the debtors, or both of the debtors, if they could be caught together at the same time.

> "Take notice that within seven days after service of this notice on you, excluding the day of such service, you must pay" the amount. It may perfectly well be said, what is the position if the debtor who is not served actually pays the debt within seven days? That, I think, is a simple case, because then there would be no debt and the notice would have become abortive. A more difficult position, however, would arise if the other debtor on whom the petition was not served had secured the sum to the creditors' satisfaction, or to the satisfaction of the court. That difficulty, I think, could be only met by saying that in that case the debtor on whom the notice was served would be entitled to rely on what had been done by his co-debtor. Each is a debtor, and each is separately and severally liable for the debt: but each is entitled to rely on what his co-debtor has done. There are, perhaps, some other difficulties, but there are many other difficulties in dealing with the matter on any other footing, and I think that the bankruptcy notice here, and the petition founded upon it, were in order, and that no objection can be raised on that ground.

[His Lordship also considered the question whether the Divisional Court in bankruptcy were right in holding that the discretion of the registrar under s. 5 (3), to dismiss a petition for other sufficient cause had been wrongly exercised as there, in fact, had been no misconduct or extortion on the part of the petitioning creditors in regard to the debt, and held that the Divisional Court were right.]

ROMER, L.J.—I agree entirely and I only desire to add this. In Re Low, Ex parte Gibson (1), where a judgment had been obtained by the petitioning creditor against several joint debtors, the bankruptcy notice was addressed to one only of those joint debtors. The debtor, on the petition coming on, took the objection that the bankruptcy notice ought to have been addressed to all the joint debtors. Mr. Muir Mackenzie, who was a great authority on bankruptcy law, in the course of his argument on behalf of the debtor, said this:

> "The notice should be directed to the debtor and all the other joint judgment debtors, although it need not be served on those against whom it is not intended to proceed"; and LORD ESHER, as I read the passage in his judgment, which has been already read by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS and which I need not repeat, in my opinion affirmed the accuracy of that argument on the part of Mr. Muir Mackenzie to this extent, that if all the joint debtors had been mentioned in the notice, and the notice was directed to them all, it was only necessary to serve the one against whom it was intended to proceed. Apart from that altogether it appears to me in the present case that every single condition that is mentioned in sub-s. (1) (g) of s. 1 and in s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Acts as essential to the establishment of an act of bankruptcy under that sub-s. (g) have been fulfilled. So far as regards the allegation of extortion or improper conduct on the part of the petitioning creditor when he withdrew or allowed to be dismissed his earlier petition, I only want to say this: It does not appear to me that it was a term of the withdrawal of that petition that the judgment debtor should discontinue his action against the petitioning creditor in the King's Bench Division. Had that been a term of the withdrawal of that petition, speaking entirely for myself, I think I should like to have taken further time to consider the matter. As it is, I agree that this appeal fails.

GREENE, L.J.—I agree, and, although at one stage in the argument I felt some little doubt on the question of the bankruptcy notice, on careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that that doubt is without foundation. It appears to me that the bankruptcy notice, when properly construed, must be taken as a notice addressed to each individual member of the firm, and it is, I think, completely accurate to say that the individual on whom it was in fact served has failed to comply with the requirements of the notice, in so far as it related to his own actions which under it he was required to perform. If, in point of fact, his partner, not having been served, had nevertheless paid the debt, it appears to me that even then that would have been a compliance by the debtor, who was in fact served, and the result of that would have been that the allegation that he, namely, the debtor, against whom the petition was presented, had failed to comply with the notice could not have been made, because payment by the other partner would have been a payment by the debtor in question. For these reasons the doubts which I at one time felt appear to me to disappear and I agree entirely with the judgment which has been delivered.

Appeal dismissed.

Re LOVEGROVE. Ex Parte APPLESTONE AND ANOTHER v. THE TRUSTEES

Bankruptcy—Assignment of future book debts—Bill of sale—Assurance of personal chattels by way of security—Sale of goods to company—Payment by company to manufacturer of part of purchase price—Re-sale to manufacturer's customers—Payment by customers of full price to company—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict., c. 31), s. 4—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 43 (1).

By an agreement in writing it was provided that L., who was in need of ready money in his business, should sell all his products to a sales company which would forthwith pay him ninety per cent. of the purchase price and then re-sell the goods to L.'s customers, receiving from those customers the full purchase price and retaining it. The agreement provided that, if the customers failed to pay any part of the purchase price, L. would pay to the company the amount of the deficit, and that, if the company made a net profit under the agreement in excess of £2,500 during the twelve months after the date of the agreement, the company would pay to L. the amount of that excess. On Feb. 5, 1934, a receiving order was made against L., and on Feb. 19 he was adjudicated bankrupt. On a motion by the trustees in the bankruptcy for a declaration that the agreement was void against them and that all debts due from customers at the beginning of the bankruptcy formed part of L.'s estate,

Held: the transaction evidenced by the agreement was an honest transaction representing the true intention of the parties and the sales by L. to the company and by the company to L.'s customers were real sales and not fictitious transactions concealing loans made by the company to L. of ninety per cent. of the purchase prices secured on L.'s book debts; the agreement was not an assurance of personal chattels within s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, nor was it an assignment of future book debts within s. 43 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914; and, therefore, the agreement was not void as against the trustees under that section or as an unregistered bill of sale.

Appeal by Alfred Applestone and G. Lovegrove & Co. (Sales), Ltd., from an order of Farwell, J., dated Nov. 26, 1934, in which his Lordship had declared that an agreement dated Sept. 1, 1933, made between the appellant company and the bankrupt, George Lovegrove, was void as being an unregistered bill of sale.

Lovegrove carried on business at High Wycombe as a manufacturer of furniture under the name of George Lovegrove & Co. Shortly before Sept. 1, 1933, being short of liquid capital, he approached the appellant Applestone, who agreed to assist him in two ways, namely (i) by advancing £5,094 on the security of existing book debts, and (ii) by forming a sales company which should purchase from Lovegrove at a discount of ten per cent. of the invoiced price all goods which from time to time he contracted to sell to his customers, the sales company then re-selling the goods to the customers and receiving payment from them at the due date.

To carry out that scheme G. Lovegrove & Co. (Sales), Ltd. (hereinafter called the sales company), were incorporated on Sept. 1, 1933, with a capital of 100 £1 shares. Ninety-eight of those shares were allotted to Applestone, one to Applestone's clerk, and one to Lovegrove. On the same day Lovegrove mortgaged to the sales company existing book debts specified in a schedule to the mortgage to secure a loan of £5,094 then made by the sales company to him. Applestone put the sales company in funds to make that loan. All the debts comprised in that mortgage were in due course collected by the sales company before the beginning of Lovegrove's bankruptcy, and that agreement was not challenged by the trustees.

A second agreement, made on the same day, provided, by cl. 2:

> "The company shall purchase from the manufacturer and the manufacturer shall sell to the company from time to time all such goods manufactured by the manufacturer as the company may require for its business, and the following provisions shall have effect with regard to the price and delivery thereof and payment therefore; (i) the price to be paid for any goods purchased from the company by customers on the list shall be the price as hereinafter defined less ten per cent. thereof and for any other goods purchased from the company the price as hereinafter defined; (ii) . . . 'the price' shall mean the price at which goods are invoiced to any customer; . . . (4) payments for any goods so purchased shall be in the case of goods purchased from the company by customers on the list as soon as conveniently possible upon the company agreeing to sell the same and in the case of customers other than customers on the list as and when the company shall receive from them the final instalment of the purchase price thereof. . . . Provided that if and so long as the total of the purchase prices owing from time to time to the company by customers on the list shall exceed £5,000 all sales by the company to customers on the list in excess of £5,000 shall at the option of the company be deemed to be sales to customers other than customers on the list unless the manufacturer shall on or before Sept. 30, 1933, have given notice in writing to the company that he desires the said limit of £5,000 to be increased to an amount up to but not exceeding £7,000, in which case this clause shall be altered accordingly and such increased amount shall be substituted therein in place of the said sum of £5,000."

By cl. 3 it was provided that, if a customer failed to pay any part of the price of goods bought by him, the manufacturer should repay to the company the amount of such deficit. By cl. 5 the manufacturer undertook to provide all accommodation and clerical and other services required by the company for the carrying on of its business. By cl. 7 the manufacturer covenanted not to sell furniture to any one other than the company. By cl. 13:

> "If the company shall during the twelve months following the date of this agreement make a net profit under this agreement in excess of £2,500 then the company shall pay to the manufacturer a sum equal to the amount of such excess."

On the same day, Sept. 1, 1933, a circular was sent to all the existing customers of Lovegrove informing them that, in future, goods ordered by them would be invoiced to them by the sales company. B Thereafter the course of business was that when goods were ready for delivery they were invoiced to the purchasers in the name of the sales company, and when a sufficient number of such invoices had been sent a list of them would be forwarded to Applestone, in his capacity of secretary of the sales company, and that company would send to Lovegrove a cheque for ninety per cent. of the total appearing on the list. When the accounts were due for payment the customers paid the full amount, less cash discount, to the sales company.

On Feb. 5, 1934, a receiving order was made against Lovegrove, and on Feb. 19 he was adjudicated a bankrupt. At the beginning of the bankruptcy considerable sums were due from customers for goods supplied, and those sums, totalling about £7,000, were partly collected by the sales company and partly by the trustees in bankruptcy, and partly were by arrangement paid into a joint account.

D The trustees moved before FARWELL, J., for a declaration that the second agreement was void against them as being, inter alia, an unregistered bill of sale, and that all debts due from customers at the beginning of the bankruptcy formed part of Lovegrove's estate. FARWELL, J., held that the agreement was a bill of sale, and made the declaration asked. The sales company and Applestone appealed.

By the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 3:

> "This Act shall apply to every bill of sale . . . (whether the same be absolute, or subject or not subject to any trust) whereby the holder or grantee has power, either with or without notice, and either immediately or at any future time, to seize or take possession of any personal chattels comprised in or made subject to such bill of sale."

By s. 4:

F

> "In this Act . . . the expression 'bill of sale' shall include bills of sale, assignments, transfers . . . and other assurances of personal chattels."

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 43 (1):

> "Where a person engaged in any trade or business makes an assignment to any other person of his existing or future book debts or any class thereof, and is subsequently adjudicated bankrupt, G the assignment shall be void against the trustee as regards any book debts which have not been paid at the commencement of the bankruptcy, unless the assignment has been registered as if the assignment were a bill of sale given otherwise than by way of security for the payment of a sum of money. . . .
> "Provided that nothing in this section shall have effect so as to render void any H assignment of book debts due at the date of the assignment from specified debtors, or of debts growing due under specified contracts. . . ."

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—The point to be considered is whether or not a deed of I Sept. 1, 1933, is valid and effective as against the trustees in bankruptcy of George Lovegrove, who is now a bankrupt. The appeal is put down in relation to two motions, the one anticipating the other, the first being a motion by Alfred Applestone and G. Lovegrove & Co. (Sales), Ltd., for a declaration that the deed in question is valid. In the other the useful but exceptional course was taken of ordering that there should be pleadings, and thus we have in those motions points of claim and points of defence telling the story and raising the question which has to be decided.

For the purpose of this judgment the matter can be put quite shortly by recounting a very few dates. On Jan. 27, 1934, an act of bankruptcy was committed by Lovegrove, who gave notice of the suspension of his ability to pay his debts. A petition was presented on Jan. 30, and on Feb. 5 a receiving order was made against him, and subsequently he was adjudicated a bankrupt. On Sept. 1, 1933, certain agreements had been entered into. Lovegrove was engaged in business in High Wycombe as a manufacturer of furniture, and his business was a high-class one. It is just and fair that I should recall the words used in respect of him by the learned judge, who said:

> "He was carrying on business as a manufacturer and wholesale dealer in furniture, and had apparently been a person of considerable ability in his own business, because he started quite a small business with a capital of some £1,000 in or near London, he transferred his business to High Wycombe, and in 1933 the business had grown to very considerable dimensions, the turnover in that year being somewhere in the neighbourhood of £100,000. The business, therefore, was a highly successful one. One of the witnesses in the witness-box said it was one of the best businesses of its kind in the country, a first-class and a high-class business, and obviously Mr. Lovegrove was a person of integrity and ability."

At a time previous to Sept. 1, 1933, Lovegrove was being pressed by one substantial creditor and he was in difficulties how to meet the situation which had occurred. He went to Applestone, a friend who was prepared to assist him on business lines, and Applestone did so by entering into the agreement which is now in question, namely, the second agreement of Sept. 1, 1933. A company called G. Lovegrove & Co. (Sales), Ltd., was formed and registered on the same day. It was a company with a very small capital, and it was, no doubt, a device to have a separate entity apart from the business of G. Lovegrove as carried on at High Wycombe. The agreement entered into must be carefully examined. It is an agreement made between Lovegrove, who is called "the manufacturer," and G. Lovegrove & Co. (Sales), Ltd. The sales company had been formed by Applestone, who held substantially all the shares, so that the sales company represents Applestone. The agreement entered into was that Lovegrove was to continue to manufacture the furniture and to go on with his business in the ordinary way. He covenanted that he would not sell any furniture manufactured by him otherwise than to the sales company, nor was he to cease manufacturing furniture as an independent person. The company covenanted that it would not, during the existence of the agreement, purchase any article of furniture except from the manufacturer. We have thus got the nexus between the manufacturer and the company under this agreement, which was to last for twelve months certain and thereafter continue unless determined by three months' notice in writing given at any time after May 1, 1934.

The procedure after the manufacturer had made the furniture and had sold it to the sales company was as follows. By cl. 2 of the agreement:

> "The company shall purchase from the manufacturer and the manufacturer shall sell to the company from time to time all such goods manufactured by the manufacturer as the company may require for its business."

Those words, "as the company may require for its business," seem to leave an act of volition on the part of the sales company to say whether it will take every piece of furniture manufactured by the manufacturer. Those words could easily have been left out, and if they had been left out there could be no question but that every piece of furniture manufactured would be sold to and taken over by the sales company, but when those words are added there is a limit beyond which the company is not bound to go. Two lists were to be made: lists of the customers of Lovegrove, and the business was to go on, with the result that there would be, in the ordinary course, a demand made by the customers for the furniture which they required, and the usual course of Lovegrove's business would be followed.

But Lovegrove was in the position that he could not wait for any considerable time for payment from these customers, and so the following system was established under the agreement. When the customer asked for goods, or when Lovegrove found a customer for particular goods, there was to be a sale which was to be carried out by an invoice, which was undoubtedly an invoice bearing the name of the sales company, and the sales company sold the goods to the customer, and after that Lovegrove dropped out. He had, as an agent for the company, secured the customer. He had brought the sales company, who was selling, into touch with the customer, and he dropped out. The sales company sold to the customer and the customer was to pay the sales company, but, that Lovegrove might not be held up by delay in payment by the customer, the sales company was immediately to pay to Lovegrove ninety per cent. of the value of the invoice of the goods. The effect of that was that Lovegrove got immediate payment from the sales company. The sales company, who had possibly to wait some time for its money, obtained an advantage in that it secured the balance, the ten per cent., for its profit. Otherwise, the business went on as before, with this definite alteration, that the seller to all the customers was no longer to be Lovegrove but the sales company. It is no use saying: "Oh, the sales company was Applestone, so that one must treat the company as merely being a device or stratagem." The sales company was a definite entity, and it is in law entitled to be respected as such. Equally, Lovegrove, having regard to the testimonial given him by the learned judge, is entitled to say that he is an honest manufacturer with a good business, but at the moment—he hoped only temporarily—in financial difficulties.

That being the system, the sales company effects the sales to the customer, but the company then has, as any other seller has, to pay the source from which it has obtained the goods with which to fill the contract made between it and the customer, and so the company pays Lovegrove. The company does not get or hold the goods, it does not deal with the goods until the contract has been made on its behalf by the agent, Lovegrove, and it is then that the invoice records the true nexus between the seller and the customer, and the sales company has to pay for the goods which it requires. There is, therefore, no time at which the sales company is holding the furniture as security. It does not want the goods until it has the contract to fulfil, but it then requires the goods and has to pay for the goods that are so taken.

Our attention was drawn to a document which appeared in the correspondence. It was a circular sent out by the sales company, and signed by the sales company, to the customers announcing to them that > "a new company has been formed under the name of G. Lovegrove & Co. (Sales), Ltd., and in future all sales will be made through this company and all payments should be made to it."

That is signed by the sales company, and it contains this sentence:

> "By forming an entirely separate sales unit we hope to be able to improve upon our service to you."

It is quite true that that document may be ineffective for what is implicit in it, namely, that the sales company in future are to represent Lovegrove & Co.—because it is not signed by Lovegrove & Co., but, taken at its face value, it seems to be a clear indication by the sales company that in future the sales are to be made through that company and that they are to receive the value of the invoice.

Other documents to which we have been referred are the invoice, which is undoubtedly from the sales company, and two documents, a delivery note and a signature note, which do not contain the sales company's name. They are subsidiary documents to the invoice; the primary document, which contains the contract, is the invoice. It might have been wiser, or it might have been better, that the sales company's name should have appeared on the delivery note and the signature note, but that matter is easily overcome by the fact that Lovegrove was acting in this matter as agent for the sales company. What is the objection to that method of doing business? This is not a case in which some document is put forward to mask a device or stratagem for deceiving persons; it really is an agreement entered into for the purpose of enabling Lovegrove to have money more quickly and more certainly on the sale of his goods, and one ought not to look at such a document with a sinister eye.

Farwell, J., found great difficulty in the case, and I share those difficulties; but I have come to a different view from that which he took, because, after the advantage which we have had of the discussion on both sides, it appears to me that the definition in the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, which we have to consider, does not cover this document.

The definition which is said most nearly to cover it is that in s. 4 of the Act of 1878, A which contains the interpretation to be given to the expression "bill of sale." But it is important to remember s. 3 of the Act of 1878, which is as follows:

> "This Act shall apply to every bill of sale executed on or after the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine (whether the same be absolute, or subject or not subject to any trust) whereby the holder or grantee has power, either with or without notice, and either immediately or at any future time, to seize or take possession of any personal chattels comprised in or made subject to such a bill of sale." B

That section stands, even after the amending Act of 1882 had been passed. We have, therefore, to bear in mind that the real purpose of requiring bills of sale to be made subject to a strict Act of Parliament was the danger that there should be some secret C document whereby there could be a power in some person unknown to seize or take possession of personal chattels which were claimed under a bill of sale. The words which are said to cover the present case are "assurance of personal chattels" (in s. 4 of the Act of 1878). The words are to be found in

> "inventories of goods with receipt thereto attached, or receipts for purchase moneys of goods, and other assurances of personal chattels." D

Is the document in question an assurance of personal chattels? Where is the assurance given of personal chattels? It does provide a code by which the sales in the future of the manufactured articles of Lovegrove are to be carried out, but there is, in fact, no assurance given to the sales company on the actual goods themselves. On the question of what is an assurance see North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (1). E BOWEN, L.J., dealing there with some of the various cases whether the transaction was defeated if the bill of sale was avoided, said this (35 Ch. Div. at p. 212):

> "In my opinion, they [the Court of Appeal in Woodgate v. Godfrey (2)] reverted to the older view, and I think the sounder view, and again unmistakably laid down, as it seems to me, the true doctrine, that a document was really not a bill of sale unless it was an assurance." F

Later he said:

> "Now if a receipt was an assurance of personal chattels, it was struck by the older Act under the general words. If it is not an assurance of personal chattels, it is not struck by this Act. The truth is, I think, that the draftsman had in his mind fictitious transactions, where receipts were used to give a colour of assurance, for assurance there was, properly speaking, none, because the document was not intended to have any effect unless the transaction was revealed to the eye of the world, and in his anxiety to bring within the operation of the Act fictitious assurances, he treats them as if they were real assurances." G

I think one has to test the application of s. 4 by asking oneself: Is the document one H whereby some real assurance in respect of personal chattels was given by Lovegrove to the sales company? And after a careful examination of the document I answer the question "No." I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the document cannot be avoided as coming within the ambit of the Bills of Sale Acts.

There is one more claim suggested. It is asserted in the pleadings that s. 43 of the Bankruptcy Act applies to avoid this assignment of book debts and that this might be I treated as an assignment of future book debts. That point was not much insisted on by the learned judge, and, indeed, in his judgment, he says:

> "There were, no doubt, from his [Applestone's] point of view, objections to taking a charge upon future debts because a difficulty might arise in the event of the subsequent bankruptcy of Lovegrove, and this device was adopted in order to enable loans to be made to Lovegrove by Applestone, security being given to Applestone by a charge on the chattels of Lovegrove, chattels remaining in the possession of Lovegrove until they actually passed into the hands of the ultimate purchaser."

A So that the learned judge, in so far as he deals with this point at all, records that, whereas there was a choice of two methods of doing it, the particular method actually adopted was chosen to avoid the possible danger of taking a charge on the future debts.

I think one must consider the application of s. 43 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, after taking full note of what our decision is on the bill of sale point and the reason for the transaction. When one comes to consider the purport, meaning, and intention of B the agreement of Sept. 1, 1933, there does not seem any just or sufficient ground for saying that it is an assignment of future book debts. The agreement is made for twelve months, and we were told that there was evidence which described how that figure of £2,500, which was to be the effective limit of the rights of the sales company to its interest in the sales which took place, was arrived at. There was to be that limit because a figure was given by Lovegrove as the ordinary result of his trading for twelve months, C which was the first limit fixed for the duration of the agreement. It might be said that, inasmuch as there was a reverter of a sum beyond £2,500 to Lovegrove, there was some ground for suggesting that this was really in effect a mortgage of the future book debts, but that seems a little artificial, and, after all, it is a case in which the trustees have to make out their case and to establish that the effect of the deed is that it is a charge or mortgage on future debts within s. 43.

D To my mind, when one has come to the conclusion that the deed is an honest one, that the transaction was not intended to cloak some improper stratagem, but was made by honest persons in the course of a high-class and honest business, and that the Bills of Sale Acts do not apply to ruin the document, it follows that the real purport of the document ought to be accepted, namely, that it was for the purpose of enabling Lovegrove to obtain an earlier payment of the aliquot part of the purchase price paid for E the furniture, and not for any other purpose. In these circumstances it appears to me that the trustees have not established that the document is within s. 43, and their case fails on that point also, although I quite agree that it was open to them to take it.

On these two grounds I have come to the conclusion that the document is not avoided, and the appeal must be allowed, with costs.

F ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. To appreciate the true meaning and effect of the documents with which we have to deal in this appeal it is essential to bear in mind the circumstances in which Lovegrove found himself on the date when they came into existence. Lovegrove was a manufacturer of furniture, carrying on business on a fairly extensive scale at High Wycombe. The customers who bought his furniture, however, were people who, for the most part, expected to obtain from him a rather G extensive credit—three months, I think, was the usual credit which they expected and in fact obtained from him. The result was that Lovegrove at times found himself rather short of liquid resources, and by Sept. 1, 1933, he was undoubtedly in financial difficulties, arising from the cause which I have mentioned, and he approached Applestone with a view to obtaining financial assistance from him. Applestone was prepared to make advances of some £5,000 on security of the then outstanding book debts of Love- H grove, amounting to £5,000 odd, and on Sept. 1, 1933, a mortgage of these existing book debts was effected to secure to Applestone the repayment of this £5,000 odd, which he then advanced to Lovegrove.

It was apparent, if Lovegrove's business was to continue in the future, that the customers would still require this inconveniently long credit, and that Lovegrove must make some provision for obtaining advances pending the expiration of the credit if his I business was to be carried on, otherwise he would shortly find himself again in the same difficulties as before. Applestone, again, was willing to help him, and Applestone's assistance could be provided for in one of two ways. The first and obvious way was for Applestone to agree that as and when Lovegrove entered into a contract with any customer for a sale to that customer of furniture Applestone should then and there advance to Lovegrove, say, ninety per cent. of the purchase price, taking a charge on the purchase price to secure the money which he advanced to Lovegrove. There were obvious disadvantages attached to that course which were only too clearly seen and realised by the solicitor advising the parties at the time. If Lovegrove should subsequently go bankrupt, s. 43 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, might have the effect of avoiding the whole transaction—and, indeed, really did, in the opinion of FARWELL, J. —and so the parties deliberately adopted the alternative course.

The alternative course was obvious. When Lovegrove found the customer for his furniture, he could get Applestone to enter into a contract with the customer for the sale of the furniture to the customer, giving the customer the ordinary three months' credit, and to enable Applestone to complete his contract with the customer Lovegrove at the same time entered into a contract with Applestone to sell that furniture to Applestone, say, at ninety per cent., payable at once. In that way Lovegrove would get his £90, and Applestone would be repaid his £90, with something representing interest, when he received the £100 from the customer. Applestone was willing to adopt that scheme, subject, however, to certain conditions. One condition was—I do not know whether it was imposed by Applestone more than by Lovegrove, but it was obviously a condition which had to be imposed, because it was no good Lovegrove running round and trying to find customers to buy his furniture from Applestone because the parties did not know Applestone. If, on the other hand, a company was formed preserving the name of Lovegrove, the customers might be willing to continue to give orders to that company, and so a company was formed to take the place of Applestone in the transaction. It was a perfectly innocent thing to do. The use of that name by the company preserved the connection which was necessary to be preserved in order that Lovegrove might get the contracts.

Another condition made by Applestone appears to have been that, if he were going to purchase these goods from Lovegrove and sell them to the customers, the customers might make default, and so Applestone said in effect: "I shall not be getting the customers, but you, Lovegrove, will, and you ought to be responsible for their solvency. You must guarantee the payment of the purchase price by the customers to whom I agree to sell the furniture." Another condition made by Applestone was this: "I am going to run some risk in this matter, and therefore I ought to have some assurance from you, Lovegrove, that the sales which you effect, and which I enter into with the customers found by you, are not to be less than a certain sum in the year." Not in opposition to it, but at the same time as that condition was made by Applestone, Lovegrove himself made a condition, namely: "You will make a profit out of these transactions, and the profit may be a very large one, depending on the amount of the sales to the customers I find." So Applestone agreed with Lovegrove that the profit coming to him (Applestone) out of the transaction should not exceed £2,500 in the year.

If the sale by Applestone to the customer was a real sale and the sale by Lovegrove to Applestone was a real sale, the trustees in bankruptcy could not in any way object to the transaction. It is, however, said by the trustees in bankruptcy that these were not real sales at all; that the documents, to which I will refer in a moment, merely pretended to effect a sale, but that the real substance of the transaction was that Applestone was lending to Lovegrove ninety per cent. of the purchase price. If one looks at the document, on the face of it it provides for real sales, and, indeed, if it were not for the conditions to which I have referred being inserted in the document, I do not think that we should have heard the trustees contending in this case that the transaction was not a real sale by Lovegrove to Applestone. I cannot, myself, attach to nor derive from the fact that those conditions were inserted the conclusion that the sales were not real sales. They were real sales if the conditions were not there, and the imposition of the conditions does not, in my opinion, prevent them from being real sales.

Supposing the trustees were right, and that, so far as the sales to Applestone by Lovegrove were concerned, it was merely a scheme by which Applestone was to advance money up to ninety per cent. of the purchase price to Lovegrove, I still fail to see how in any sense it can be said that the sales company has obtained a charge on any single stick of furniture manufactured by Lovegrove. I asked counsel for the trustees if he could suggest any circumstances in which the sales company could seize any part of the furniture which had been the subject-matter of the sale for the purpose of enforcing the payment to Applestone of the moneys which, according to this hypothesis, Applestone had lent to Lovegrove. Counsel was unable to tell me of any circumstance in which such a right to seize the furniture appeared, and, indeed, there was no such thing. So even if this were not a real sale, but merely a scheme by which Applestone was to advance money to Lovegrove, no charge was created on the furniture, and, therefore, no bill of sale on the furniture avoided by the Act of 1882.

Supposing the true effect of this transaction was that Applestone was advancing ninety per cent. of the purchase money from time to time to Lovegrove, this might be said: This transaction was effected for the purpose of bringing into existence book debts which, though in the name of the sales company, would have been held by the sales company, when received, as trustees for Lovegrove, subject only to the sales company repaying itself out of the book debts the moneys which it had advanced. There are, indeed, in the conditions to which I have referred, circumstances which may give rise to the suggestion that the whole transaction was no more than that, but I have already stated that, in my opinion, if those circumstances really be considered, they are not sufficient to induce the court to disregard the form of the document and to hold that the substance was something different from the form.

In my opinion, the trustees have not succeeded in discharging the onus which lies on them of showing that the form which the transaction took on Sept. 1, 1933, was not in truth the substance, but that the substance was something else, and I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be allowed.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first instance, it is important to remember the object of the Bills of Sale Acts of 1878 and 1882. Lord Halsbury, L.C., said in Charlesworth v. Mills (3) ([1892] A.C. at p. 235) that the object of the earlier Acts (Bills of Sale Acts, 1854 and 1878) was > "to prevent false credit being given to people who had been allowed to remain in possession of goods which apparently were theirs, the ownership, however, of which they had parted with."

He added:

> "The Acts intended, in a case with creditors, that if people were allowed to remain in possession of goods of which nevertheless the ownership was no longer theirs, those goods and chattels should be subject to the execution of bona fide creditors who ought not to have been induced to give credit by the apparent ownership of the goods being in those persons."

He also pointed out that the Act of 1882 was directed to a totally different subject-matter—namely, to protect impecunious debtors—and therefore insists on a particular form of words which would plainly express the nature of the contract as to the loan and the security for the loan. I think it may be useful, as I have said, to bear that in mind, because essentially the transaction here was not one within the Act at all. Of course, it might come within the Act for technical reasons, but essentially it really was not within the Act.

The transaction here, reduced to its simplest form, and considering it only in relation to a particular piece of furniture, is no other than this. Lovegrove, who was manufacturing some furniture, had a customer who was willing to give a particular price for it on credit terms. Lovegrove agreed with Applestone that when the furniture was ready he would sell it to Applestone—because for this purpose I am going to leave out the company altogether—for the price which the customer was willing to give for it less ten per cent., but on the term that Applestone should pay immediate spot cash. Thereupon Applestone was to sell the furniture on credit terms to the customer at a profit, say, of ten per cent. To that transaction, so far as I can see, there is no objection at all from the point of view either of the Bankruptcy Act or of the Bills of Sale Acts. It would not be a transaction by which false credit was given to Lovegrove by people who supposed him to be in possession of the furniture at a time when the furniture was no longer his. The essence of it would be that at the moment when Lovegrove parted with the furniture he would get cash for it. That is no more objectionable than any other ordinary contract of sale and purchase entered into by a trader. To my mind, it would be none the worse from the point of view of those Acts if Lovegrove agreed that, if the customer did not pay Applestone, he himself would pay, and it would be quite consistent with the fact that if Lovegrove was the man who was finding the customer he ought to find a good one. I do not shrink from saying that the obvious intention of the whole transaction such as I have mentioned was to enable Lovegrove to go on carrying on his business, and Applestone might well be influenced by friendly feelings in agreeing to assist Lovegrove.

I agree that the agreement by which the more elaborate transaction which is involved in this case was carried out is an agreement which required very careful consideration at the hands of the court. It was dated Sept. 1, 1933, and by a document of even date there was a transaction by which, beyond all doubt, Lovegrove borrowed a sum of £5,000 odd on the security of the existing schedule of book debts or list of book debts. The learned judge seems to have thought that, because that transaction bore on the face of it the nature of a mortgage, that was some reason for thinking that the second transaction, that which purported to be a sale and purchase, might also be considered to be a mortgage. But, with all respect, I do not think that there is any true weight to be attached to that argument. The two documents are, it is true, of even date, but I think that on the face of them they were, and were intended to be, very different transactions.

The essence of the agreement of Sept. 1, 1933, so far as sales and purchases by the sales company are concerned, is that there should not be a sale to that company until the purchaser, the customer found by Lovegrove, was ready to purchase at an agreed price. What was contemplated, and, so far as I know, what was carried out, was that, when the furniture was ready and the purchaser required delivery, the company should send an invoice accompanying the goods purporting to represent a sale by the company to the customer, at the larger price, but on credit terms. The smaller sum then became due from the company to Lovegrove.

There are several clauses in the agreement. One is the clause at the end of para. 5 by which Lovegrove agreed that the total of the prices for goods purchased from the company should not be less than a certain sum. Two others are cls. 7 and 8, and finally there is the beginning of cl. 13, all of which do require consideration and are certainly most unusual clauses to find in a contract of sale and purchase between a trader and an ordinary purchaser. I do not hesitate to say that this transaction was unusual, and was in effect a transaction by which Lovegrove was financed by Applestone or his company—it matters not which—so that he was able to carry on the business. But when it is considered that the mischief aimed at by the Bills of Sale Act or of the Bankruptcy Act was not being brought into play by anything that was done, I for my part do not see why we should be astute to come to the conclusion that this was anything other than an unusual form of sale and purchase between Lovegrove and the company, the intention being that the company should never hold the furniture in its own possession, but should immediately cause a re-sale to be made to the old customers of Lovegrove, so that he would be re-paid out of the purchase price. It is beyond all doubt that in a case such as this one does not look merely at the form of the document which is alleged to be a bill of sale. The true nature, not the form of the transaction, must be regarded, and if the document itself purports to be only a cloak for what is really a mortgage of chattels or a pledge of chattels, it may be disregarded.

The matter was elaborately considered by this court sitting with five learned Lords Justices in Re Watson, Ex parte Official Receiver in Bankruptcy (4). Whether a transaction purporting to be a sale and purchase of goods is no more than it appears to be on its face, or whether it really is a loan on security, and, therefore, a document which might be hit by the Bills of Sale Acts, is a question to be determined by ascertaining the true intention of the parties. That true intention may appear either from the document itself, because, although it uses the language of sale and purchase, it might very well on its mere words appear to be nothing other than a loan on security, or it may appear from any collateral agreement or other document which would show that the true intention was a loan on security, or finally the fact might be ascertained by parole

A evidence, more especially parole evidence which would suggest some fraud on the part of the person who was either the vendor or the borrower, whichever view the court should take.

In the present case on the agreement itself I see no reason for coming to the conclusion that the transaction was anything but a somewhat unusual sale and purchase—a sale by Lovegrove and a purchase by the company. The learned judge in his careful judgment B has told us that Lovegrove was a very frank and honest witness, and the circumstances in which he negotiated this agreement have already been detailed by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS. They are perfectly credible and honourable to him, and there was nothing, as I have said, in the real nature of the transaction which suggests in the remotest degree any intention to defraud anybody.

Accordingly, I think that the learned judge was wrong in thinking that there was C anything which ought to be regarded with suspicion or which should be treated as being a cloak for the true transaction. I come to the conclusion that, unusual as the agreement of Sept. 1, 1933, was, it represented the true intention of the parties. If that is so, that seems to me to be the end of the argument that it is a bill of sale, because in terms it is not.

The question which I think might have presented more difficulty was the question D with regard to the possibility of the agreement being one for a loan from the company with security on the purchase price of the goods. On the whole, I do not think it is necessary to add anything to that matter beyond what has already been said. It was not, I think, a point greatly relied on by the trustees, but in any case the onus of establishing such a proposition would lie on the trustees, and that, I think, they have failed to establish. Moreover, for the reasons which I have already given, I think that the true E nature of the transaction must be taken to be that actually expressed in the document. For these reasons, in addition to those given by my brethren, I think that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

THE BELDIS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Boyd Merriman, P., Scott, L.J., and Swift, J.), October 17, 18, November 4, December 19, 1935]

Admiralty—County court—Action in rem—Competence—Action based on arrest of property of defendants other than that in respect of which cause of action arose—Jurisdiction—"Claim arising out of agreement made in relation to use or hire of ship"—Claim on award made in arbitration under charterparty—County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Amendment Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 51), s. 2 (1).

By a charterparty entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants, owners of the steamship Belfri, on July 13, 1933, the plaintiffs chartered that vessel from the defendants. The charterparty contained an arbitration clause in the usual terms, and, a dispute having arisen as to an amount which the plaintiffs claimed they had overpaid by way of hire, the matter was referred to arbitration. On Jan. 24, 1935, the arbitrator made his award directing that the defendants should pay the amount in question to the plaintiffs with costs. The payment was not made and the plaintiffs thereupon arrested another vessel belonging to the defendants, namely, the steamship Beldis, and on April 5, 1935, brought an action in rem against that vessel in the county court to enforce the award. The defendants did not enter an appearance, and judgment was given against them by default. After judgment mortgagees of the steamship Beldis intervened and claimed that the arrest of the Beldis was illegal and that the proceedings were wrongly taken in rem, and they contended that the judgment signed in the action should be set aside. An issue for submission to the county court judge was agreed between the plaintiffs and the interveners in the following terms: "Whether the plaintiffs' action in rem against the steamship Beldis is maintainable in view of the fact that the plaintiffs' claim in this action arose out of a charterparty of the steamship Belfri being a ship belonging to the same owners."

Held: (i) an action in rem in a county court having Admiralty jurisdiction could not be based on the arrest of property of the defendant owners other than that in respect of which the cause of action arose, and, therefore, the plaintiffs' action was not maintainable.

Observations in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) (1885), 10 P.D. 44, criticised.

(ii) on a point taken by the Court of Appeal, a claim based on an award made in an arbitration held under an arbitration clause in a charterparty was a claim on the award and not a claim arising out of an "agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship" within s. 2 of the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Amendment Act, 1869; the present action was founded on the award and had no relation to the original dispute which gave rise to the arbitration; and, therefore, the county court had no jurisdiction to entertain it.

Notes. The County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Amendment Act, 1869, was repealed by the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 2 of the earlier Act being reproduced by s. 56 (1) (g) (i) of the Act of 1934. As to the limit of the jurisdiction of the county court, see now County Courts Act, 1955, s. 3 (1).

Appeal from an order of the county court judge sitting at Newport, Mon., in Admiralty.

The plaintiffs, the Anglo-Soviet Shipping Co., Ltd., chartered from the defendants the steamship Belfri upon the terms of a charterparty dated July 13, 1933. A dispute arose in regard to the charter hire, in respect of part of which the plaintiffs claimed a refund. The matter was referred to arbitration under the arbitration clause in the charter, and on Jan. 24, 1935, an award was made in favour of the plaintiffs with costs. The defendants failed to make the payment provided by the award, and the plaintiffs thereupon arrested another vessel belonging to the defendants, the steamship Beldis, and sued the defendants in rem to enforce the award. The defendants failed to appear, and judgment was entered by default in favour of the plaintiffs for the amount claimed with costs. After judgment, Lambert Brothers, Ltd., who held a mortgage on the Beldis, obtained leave to intervene, and it was agreed between them and the plaintiffs that one issue only should be submitted to the county court judge, namely, whether the action in rem against the Beldis was maintainable. The county court judge decided that it was and gave judgment for the plaintiffs with costs. The interveners appealed.

At an early stage of the hearing the Court of Appeal raised the question whether, apart from the point for decision in the agreed issue, they were not also called upon to decide whether a claim on an award was a "claim arising out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship" within the meaning of s. 2 (1), of the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Amendment Act, 1869, and was, therefore, a cause which could be prosecuted in rem. On this point the plaintiffs contended that, although the charterparty related to the steamship Belfri and not to the steamship Beldis, the action between the plaintiffs and the defendants, being for money due under an arbitration award in respect of a charterparty, was a claim arising out of an agreement for the use or hire of a ship within the meaning of s. 2 (1) of the 1869 Act. The words "arising out of" gave a very wide scope to the section. The statute enlarged the jurisdiction of the county courts and, according to the general rule, it ought, in the words of SIR MONTAGUE SMITH in The Pieve Superiore (2) ((1874), L.Rep. 5 P.C. at 492), "to be construed liberally so as to afford the utmost relief which the fair meaning of the language will allow." Counsel for the interveners was not called upon on this point.

As to the question raised in the issue submitted to the county court judge, it was contended by counsel for the interveners that there had been no reported instance, either in the High Court or in the county court since these courts were given Admiralty jurisdiction, of the arrest, in order to found an action in rem, of any property of a defendant other than the res in respect of which the cause of action arose. He referred to The Clara (3), The Dictator (4), The Ripon City (5), The Bold Buccleugh (6), The Gemma (7), The Joannis Vatis (No. 2) (8), and The Sheaf Steamship Co. v. Compania Transmediterranea (9), &c.

On behalf of the plaintiffs, it was argued that the decision of the county court judge based on the dictum in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) was entirely reasonable. Even if (contrary to the plaintiffs' contention) the right of arrest in an action in rem were limited in the High Court to the actual res, that need not necessarily apply to the county court. It is purely a matter of the construction of ss. 2 and 3 of the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Amendment Act, 1869, and it may be that in that matter the county court had wider jurisdiction than the High Court, as it undoubtedly had in charterparty cases: see The Alina (10). Proceedings in rem might be instituted both against the property subject to the maritime lien, where there was such a lien, and, where there was no maritime lien, against the property of the defendant within the jurisdiction, for the enforcement of rights against the person, as in necessaries cases. In the present case, the matter in issue was a debt of the shipowner and it was immaterial which property of the debtor was proceeded against. The dictum in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) was not obiter and was not disapproved by the House of Lords. It was also quoted with approval by the author of CARVER'S CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY SEA, in the argument which he propounded to the House of Lords in The Zeta (11) ([1893] A.C. at 475).

The county court judge, as stated above, held that the action in rem against the Beldis was maintainable and gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the interveners appealed.

The further contentions of counsel before the Court of Appeal appear from the judgments, which also contain an exhaustive review of the history of Admiralty jurisdiction both before and since the passing of the Admiralty Courts Act, 1840.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19. The following judgments were read.

SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P.—This is an appeal from the judgment of HIS HONOUR JUDGE THOMAS, sitting in Admiralty in the Newport County Court. On April 5, 1935, proceedings in rem were taken in that court by the Anglo-Soviet Shipping Co., Ltd., against the owners of the steamship Beldis, then lying in Newport Docks, for the sum of £27 4s. 6d. payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs under an award dated Jan. 24, 1935, made in a certain arbitration held by virtue of a clause in that behalf in a charterparty dated July 13, 1933, between the defendants, of the one part, and the agents of the plaintiffs, for and on behalf of the plaintiffs, of the other part. The owners of the Beldis failed to appear within the four clear days specified in the summons and, accordingly, on April 10, 1935, judgment was entered against them by default. On April 24, 1935, Lambert Brothers, Ltd., the appellants in this appeal, filed an affidavit showing that by virtue of a mortgage bond dated April 23, 1929, they were mortgagees of the steamship Beldis and that the award upon which the plaintiffs were suing related to a claim arising under a charterparty which did not relate to the steamship Beldis at all, but to another ship of the same owners named the Belfri. It will be observed that the particulars of the plaintiffs' claim, to which I have already referred, did not specify the ship in respect of which the charterparty of July 13, 1933, was made, but it is common ground that in fact this charterparty related to the steamship Belfri and not to the Beldis, and it was upon that basis that the appellants were permitted to intervene in the suit.

By agreement an issue was submitted to the court in the following terms:

> "We, the plaintiffs, and the interveners in the above-named action, herewith submit the following sole issue to be tried by this honourable court, pleadings being waived:
> "Whether the plaintiffs' action in rem against the steamship Beldis is maintainable in view of the fact that the plaintiffs' claim in this action arose out of a charterparty of the steamship Belfri, being a ship belonging to the same owners. The said parties agree that in the event of the question raised in this issue being answered in the affirmative, there shall be judgment for the plaintiffs with costs, and in the event of the question raised in this issue being answered in the negative, there shall be judgment for the interveners with costs."

The issue, therefore, raised the important question whether an action in rem in a county court having Admiralty jurisdiction could be based upon the arrest of property of the defendant owners other than that in respect of which the cause of action arose. This was the sole point argued before the county court judge, who decided that an action in rem against the steamship Beldis was maintainable.

The argument in this court proceeded on the same lines. In the course of the argument, however, we directed attention to the question whether the issue was not based on a misconception, inasmuch as it asserted as a fact that the plaintiffs' claim in the action arose out of a charterparty, whereas the plaintiffs' cause of action appeared to be, not upon the charterparty at all, but upon an award, although the submission to arbitration was to be found in the arbitration clause of a charterparty. Having regard to the fact that the parties had agreed upon the framing of the issue, neither counsel betrayed any marked enthusiasm for this point, though they both recognised that no agreement of the parties could give this court jurisdiction to deal with a point, however interesting and important, which did not arise upon the actual facts of the case. Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, argued that, if this court had no jurisdiction to deal with the appeal, the plaintiffs were entitled to hold the judgment in their favour by virtue of the express agreement in the issue. This argument appears to me to be quite untenable. If the truth of the matter is that the plaintiffs' cause of action is nothing but a common law claim upon an award, it would be impossible, nor has counsel attempted to contend that the Admiralty process in rem would be available whether the property against which the action was directed was or was not the very thing in respect of which the cause of action arose. But the county court judge purported to be dealing, as a judge, with an Admiralty action in rem, and it seems to me to be quite impossible to hold, if the foundation of that jurisdiction was lacking, that he unconsciously assumed the burden of a private arbitration between the plaintiffs and the interveners. I am of opinion, for reasons which I will proceed to give, that this point is fatal to the jurisdiction of the county court judge, and consequently of this court, notwithstanding the agreed wording of the issue. But in case I am mistaken in this view, and as the validity of the arrest is at the root of the proceedings and raises a point of great importance which has been very well argued by counsel on each side, I propose also to state my reasons for thinking that the judgment of the county court judge cannot in any event be supported. Our decision on this point will also have an important bearing on the question of costs.

The importance of ascertaining whether the plaintiffs' claim in the action did or did not, in the words of the issue,

> "arise out of a charterparty of the steamship Belfri, being a ship belonging to the same owners as the steamship Beldis," will be seen upon a consideration of one of the statutes on which the jurisdiction of the county court in Admiralty is founded. By s. 2 of the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Amendment Act, 1869, it is enacted as follows:—

> "Any county court appointed or to be appointed to have Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and > determine the following causes: (1) As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship . . . provided the amount claimed does not exceed £300." A

And by s. 3:

> "The jurisdiction conferred by this Act and by the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act, 1868, may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam." B

Counsel for the plaintiffs insisted, and the argument is valid whether it tells for or against him, that the jurisdiction of a county court is defined for the present purpose by this statute. It is not suggested that the claim is covered by any other words in the section. Unless, therefore, it can be shown that the plaintiffs' claim arose out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship, it cannot be the subject of an Admiralty action in rem in the county court. C

There was, in fact, no evidence before the county court judge as to the nature of the dispute arising under the charterparty of the Belfri, but the arbitrator's award has been put in before us and I am prepared to assume that both the claim on which he gave his award in favour of the plaintiffs, and the counterclaim which he dismissed, arose in respect of matters relating to the use or hire of the Belfri under the charterparty. In other words, I am prepared to assume that, if those same matters had been the actual subject of the litigation before the county court judge, The Alina (10) would have been decisive to show that he had jurisdiction in Admiralty. D

But, in my opinion, the claim in this action was not based upon that foundation at all. It was an action upon the award. The award does not in fact show upon its face what was the nature of the claim made by the plaintiffs; nor is there any reason why it should do so, though incidentally it happens to show the nature of the counterclaim, which was dismissed. The particulars of the claim contain no reference to the nature of the dispute or disputes arising under the charterparty. This is perfectly correct, because it is no part of the cause of action upon an award to show what was the nature of the dispute. All that the plaintiff has to prove is that certain matters in dispute have been submitted to an arbitrator and that he has made his award in the plaintiff's favour. As a matter of pleading it is unnecessary and, as I think, irregular to specify the nature of the dispute: see BULLEN AND LEAKE, PRECEDENTS OF PLEADINGS (3rd Edn.), pp. 71–74. The modern edition of that classic follows the same precedent: see 9th Edn., pp. 86–89. Quite plainly the cause of action is founded, in the summons in this case, upon the award itself and has no relation to the original dispute which gave rise to the arbitration. E F G

That being so, I should not be prepared to hold, even if the matter were free from authority, that a claim upon an award made in an arbitration held under the arbitration clause in a charterparty is a claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship. I think that it is a common law claim upon an award and nothing else. It may be that, as the defendants are out of the jurisdiction, this means that the award is difficult of enforcement, whether by action or by proceedings under s. 12 of the Arbitration Act; but that circumstance affords no ground for bringing an Admiralty action in rem in respect of a common law claim. H

This view of the matter is supported, even if it is not concluded, by the decision of the Court of Appeal in R. v. Judge of the City of London Court (12). This case, which is also of great importance upon the other point, decided that no greater jurisdiction, except with regard to charterparties, was conferred upon county courts by the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Acts, 1868 and 1869, than that which was possessed by the Admiralty Court itself. The point at issue in that case was whether an Admiralty action lay in respect of the negligence of a pilot. There could be no question but that a common law action would lie (see per LORD ESHER, M.R. [1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 286) but the claim in such an action would then have been limited to £50, whereas if the Admiralty jurisdiction was available, the limit was £300. There would, of course, as was pointed out in the judgments, be other distinctions between the two jurisdictions resulting from the difference between the Admiralty and common law doctrines as to the distribution I

A of blame. The plaintiff relied on the words "and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship," which are also contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the Act of 1869, part of which I have already quoted. In his judgment LORD ESHER, M.R. ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 291), makes it quite clear that he was prepared to hold that the Admiralty jurisdiction of a county court extended to a claim upon a charterparty only because he was bound by The Alina (10), so to hold; he said that he would follow that B case so far as it actually went, but not one inch farther. With this exception the court decided that the Admiralty jurisdiction of a county court was co-extensive with that of the Admiralty Court itself. That being the inch to which plaintiffs in a county court are entitled, it is not difficult to imagine what LORD ESHER would have said about the present attempt to take an ell. However that may be, I am not prepared to hold that a claim upon an award made under the arbitration clause of a charterparty is within the C words "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship."

Assuming, however, that I am wrong, and that the claim upon this award comes within the Admiralty jurisdiction of the county court, there remains the question, raised by the issue, whether the action in rem can be directed against property of the defendant owner other than that in respect of which the cause of action arose. I have D some difficulty in understanding what, in relation to a claim upon an award, the res would actually be. But that may be said to be immaterial, because it is certain that the ship actually arrested, the steamship Beldis, could not possibly be the res connected with the cause of action.

The learned county court judge was invited to decide this issue upon a passage in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) (10 P.D. at pp. 53 and 54). E It is evident from his judgment that, having regard to his own considerable experience in Admiralty, he would probably have decided the issue the other way if he had not felt himself bound by the particular passage in the judgment in The Heinrich Bjorn (1). The passage is as follows:

> "But how and in what manner was the new jurisdiction thus given to the Admiralty Court by the statute of 1840 [the Admiralty Court Act] to be exercised? F The answer is, that it must be exercised in the manner familiar to the Court of Admiralty and to all courts regulated by the civil law, either by an arrest of the person of the defendant if within the realm, or by the arrest of any personal property of the defendant within the realm, whether the ship in question or any other chattel, or by proceedings against the real property of the defendant within the realm G (The Charkieh (13) (L.R. 4 A. & E. at p. 91); see also per DR. LUSHINGTON, The Alexander Larsen (14) (1 Wm. Rob. at p. 294).
> "But if the material man may thus arrest the property to enforce his claim, how does his claim differ from a maritime lien? The answer is, that a maritime lien arises the moment the event occurs which creates it; the proceeding in rem which perfects the inchoate right relates back to the period when it first attached: 'the H maritime lien travels with the thing into whosesoever possession it may come' (The Bold Buccleugh (6) 7 Moo. P.C.C. at pp. 284 and 285); and the arrest can extend only to the ship subject to the lien. But, on the contrary, the arrest of a vessel under the statute is only one of several possible alternative proceedings ad fundandum jurisdictionem; no right in the ship or against the ship is created at any time before the arrest; it has no relation back to any earlier period; it is available I only against the property of the person who owes the debt for necessaries; and the arrest need not be of the ship in question, but may be of any property of the defendant within the realm."

Counsel for the interveners admitted that this passage was decisive against him, but argued that it was obiter, and that in any case it was wrong. Seeing that the decision is already fifty years old, it would be a strong thing to ask this court to differ from the statement of the law contained in the passage I have quoted, if it was, as counsel for the plaintiffs contended, an integral part of the decision itself.

It is, therefore, necessary to consider whether this passage was or was not obiter, and to examine the facts in that case in order to see what the point was. The claim was for necessaries, and the cardinal fact was that at the time when she was arrested the Heinrich Bjorn had been sold to parties who were complete strangers to the cause of action. Her former owner had entered into an agreement in writing in respect of the supply of the necessaries. It was attempted, unsuccessfully, to assert that this agreement was a bottomry bond; alternatively, it was argued that there was a maritime lien on the ship in respect of necessaries. If there were a maritime lien the ship would, of course, be subject to the lien even in the hands of the new owners; but it was held that there was no maritime lien for necessaries, though it was recognised that a claim for necessaries would give a right to seize the ship for which the necessaries had been supplied in an action in rem against owners on whose behalf the debt had been incurred. This right, however, did not relate back so as to be available against strangers to the claim for necessaries to whom the property in the ship had passed before action brought. In other words, when once the question whether the particular agreement amounted to a bottomry bond, which, for present purposes, is irrelevant, was out of the way, the only question remaining for decision was whether the supply of necessaries gave rise to a maritime lien. If not, the arrest of the Heinrich Bjorn could not be justified, since at the material date, namely, the commencement of the action, although she was the res in relation to which the cause of action arose, she was not a res belonging to the defendant owner. It follows that it was quite unnecessary to consider whether property of the owner, other than the ship itself, was liable to arrest in an action in rem. The passage relied upon cannot, therefore, be regarded as a binding statement of existing law on this point, though, naturally, a statement of the law by a court, composed as that Court of Appeal was, must carry weight.

It is, however, material to notice that Fry, L.J., in the passage quoted, couples with the arrest of the ship in question, or any other chattel, the arrest of the person of the defendant, if within the realm, and proceedings against the real property of the defendant within the realm. Now, the last-known instance of the foundation of Admiralty jurisdiction by the arrest of the person was in 1780: see the passage in Dr. Lushington's judgment in The Clara (3) quoted below. As regards the statement that the Admiralty jurisdiction was founded by proceedings against the real property of the defendant, this appears to be open to considerable doubt, as appears from the introduction to the Third Edition of the late Mr. Roscoe's book on Admiralty Practice, p. 43, note (y). With this qualification as regards proceedings against the real property of the defendant, I have no doubt that the passage relied upon is an accurate statement of the practice of the old Admiralty Court in former days. As regards arrest of the person, I propose to leave the matter where Dr. Lushington left it in The Clara (3), with this further observation, that The Clara was tried in 1855, fifteen years after the Acts of 1840 establishing the High Court of Admiralty; that no one would know better than Dr. Lushington what was the practice prevailing in Admiralty at the time when those Acts were passed; and that it is common ground that since that decision in 1855 there is no trace of any attempt to found an Admiralty action by the arrest of the person of the defendant.

As regards the arrest of property, there can, I think, be no doubt that the old Admiralty Court asserted the right to found jurisdiction by the arrest of any property of the defendant within the jurisdiction of the Admiral. This appears quite clearly from the introduction by Mr. Marsden to the Select Pleas in the Court of Admiralty, published by the Selden Society, p. lxxi, which was relied on by counsel for the plaintiffs. The passage, of which the marginal note is "Points of law and practice; arrest," reads as follows:

> "The following points may be noted as to the practice of the court and the law which it administered: The ordinary mode of commencing the suit was by arrest either of the person of the defendant or of his goods. Arrest of goods was quite as frequent as arrest of the ship; and it seems to have been immaterial what the goods were, so long as they were the goods of the defendant and were within the Admiral's jurisdiction at the time of arrest. As pointed out below, the Admiral at this period asserted and exercised a jurisdiction over all public streams, rivers, and waters, > whether the same were within the body of a county or not. Scarcely a trace appears of the modern doctrine of arrest being founded upon a maritime lien; the fact that goods and ships that had no connection with the cause of action, except as belonging to the defendant, were subject to arrest, points to the conclusion that arrest was mere procedure, and that its only object was to obtain security that judgment should be satisfied. The form of the article upon first decree shows that the defendant was always cited 'at'—'apud'—the goods or ship arrested, and that if he did not give bail to satisfy judgment the suit proceeded against him in his absence as well as against the res."

At p. 40 of the introduction to the Third Edition of ROSCOE'S ADMIRALTY PRACTICE, the learned author cites CLERKE'S PRAXIS to the effect that:

> "If the defendant could not be personally arrested in a civil cause by reason of being out of the kingdom, or because he had absconded, and he had any goods, wares, ship, or part of a ship, or vessel upon the sea, or within the flux and reflux of the sea, a warrant could be taken out to arrest such goods or such a ship belonging to the defendant debtor, in whose hands soever they were; and upon the attachment of such goods the debtor was cited specially in respect of the goods, and generally all others who had or pretended to have any right to, or interest in, the said goods, to appear on such a day to answer the plaintiff in a certain maritime and civil cause."

He proceeds (p. 44) to show that this process was a proceeding in rem in the sense that, if the defendant did not appear, the suit could go on without in any way touching the person, and that by the operation of the judgment the defendant was deprived of his property in the chattel, unless he appeared, in which case the proceedings went on in the ordinary course as an action in personam. He attributes the development of this form of action to the prohibitions to which the old Admiralty Court was subjected by the courts of common law if it attempted to act in personam.

But, in my opinion, it would be most unsafe to arrive at any conclusion as to the scope of Admiralty jurisdiction at and after the passing of the Admiralty Court Act, 1840, without bearing in mind that the old Admiralty Court was consistently asserting claims to exercise jurisdiction which the courts of common law as consistently prohibited. Even with regard to the claim which was the subject-matter of R. v. Judge of the City of London Court (12), if the SELECT PLEAS IN THE COURT OF ADMIRALTY had been published at the time when LORD ESHER gave his judgment I doubt whether he would have asserted as emphatically as he does ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 298) that > "from the beginning of time until now not one case is to be found in the Admiralty Court of any such action being entertained against a pilot."

There are, in fact, the records of two such cases in that volume. Again, on p. 293, contrasting the English and American Courts of Admiralty, the learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS asserted that it was undoubted that no jurisdiction over a policy of insurance in respect of ships or goods has ever been attempted in England. But the patent of the Admiralty judge is set out in an article by the late LORD PHILLIMORE under the title of "THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY" in the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA (14th Edn.) vol 1, pp. 171–2. The patent had been, in form, substantially unchanged from Tudor times, though the significant words "the statutes to the contrary notwithstanding" do not appear in the more modern patents. Jurisdiction in respect of policies of insurance is expressly mentioned, as is also the widest possible jurisdiction to arrest goods (see Warner v. Wheler (15)). But it is generally recognised that the patent was extravagant in its claims. A history of the struggle over jurisdiction is set out by MR. ROSCOE in the introduction to which I have already referred. It may be assumed that the Admiralty Court did not submit to the limitations imposed by the courts of common law without a protest. For example, a forcible expression of the point of view of the civilian is to be found in the remonstrance by DR. DAVID LEWIS, the Admiralty judge of Queen Elizabeth's time, which can be seen in the article on Doctors' Commons in STOW'S "SURVEY OF LONDON." Again, the BLACK BOOK OF THE ADMIRALTY, vol 1, contains an ordinance directing an inquiry to be made concerning

> "all those whoe doe sue any merchant, mariner or other person whatsoever at common law of the land for any thing of auntient right belonging to the maritime law" and directing that on conviction the plaintiff shall be

> "fined to the King for his unlawfull and vexatious suite and besides shall withdraw his suite from the common law and shall bring it in the Admiralty Court, if hee will prosecute any further" (see the reprint in the Rolls Series, p. 83).

It is, however, unnecessary to elaborate this aspect of the matter. The point of Lord Esher's judgment in R. v. Judge of the City of London Court (12) is that, even if a particular jurisdiction was asserted by the Admiralty Court, the assertion must be considered in light of the prohibitions from time to time imposed by the courts of common law, to which it was in those days always subject. It must always be remembered that it was not until the Act of 1840 that the High Court of Admiralty was established as a court with a jurisdiction defined by statute and a judge whose salary was chargeable upon the consolidated fund, and who was given in express terms all the privileges and protection appertaining to the judges of the courts of common law. In my opinion, the only safe rule is to assume that Parliament intended that the jurisdiction and practice then existing, but as extended and improved by the specific enactments of the statute, should thenceforward be the jurisdiction and practice of the Admiralty Court.

It is admitted that the industry of counsel has not resulted in finding a single instance in which, either between the passing of the Act of 1840 and the decision in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) in 1885, or from then until the present time, property, other than that directly connected with the cause of action, has been arrested as the res in an Admiralty action. On the contrary, as Scott, L.J., pointed out in the course of the argument, one aspect of the subject under discussion in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) is eloquent to show that no such right was believed to exist. In the passage quoted above from the Introduction to the Select Pleas in Admiralty, Mr. Marsden speaks of the modern doctrine of arrest being founded on a maritime lien. This doctrine is clearly expressed in the opinion of the Privy Council, given by Sir John Jervis in The Bold Buccleugh (6) (7 Moo. P.C.C. at p. 284), where it is laid down that a maritime lien is the foundation of the proceeding in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches; and while it must be admitted that where such a lien exists, a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true, that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course, there a maritime lien exists, which gives a privilege or claim upon the thing, to be carried into effect by legal process.

This view as to the coincidence of the maritime lien and the action in rem was expressly disapproved in the House of Lords in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) (see in particular the speech of Lord FitzGerald, 11 App. Cas. at pp. 285, 286). But the very fact that in 1851 it should be possible for the Privy Council to lay down that the action in rem was exactly co-extensive with the maritime lien, which was said to be its foundation, shows that no one then contemplated that an action in rem could be founded on the arrest of property of the defendant owner unconnected with the circumstances giving rise to the lien.

This brings me to a consideration of the decision of the House of Lords in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) affirming the Court of Appeal. In the opening paragraph of his speech Lord Watson used the following words:

> "The action is in rem—that being, as I understand the term, a proceeding directed against a ship or other chattel in which the plaintiff seeks either to have the res adjudged to him in property or possession, or to have it sold, under the authority of the court, and the proceeds, or part thereof, adjudged to him in satisfaction of his pecuniary claims. The remedy is obviously an appropriate one in the case of a plaintiff who has a right of property or other real interest in the ship, or a claim of debt secured by a lien which the law recognises. We have been informed that under the recent practice of the Admiralty Court the remedy is also given to creditors of the shipowner for maritime debts which are not secured by lien; and in that case the attachment of the ship, by process of the court, has the effect of giving the creditor a legal nexus over the proprietary interest of his debtor, as from the date of the attachment.

> "The position of a creditor who has a proper maritime lien differs from that of a creditor in an unsecured claim in this respect—that the former, unless he has forfeited the right by his own laches, can proceed against the ship notwithstanding any change in her ownership, whereas the latter cannot have an action in rem unless at the time of its institution the res is the property of his debtor."

In this passage Lord Watson, while stating that a maritime lien does give rise to an action in rem, and recognising that an action in rem is also available in respect of maritime debts which are not secured by lien, is engaged in showing that in the one case the action survives, and in the other case does not survive, change of ownership of the ship. This statement is not, of course, quite exhaustive, because under neither heading need the res necessarily be a ship: it may be the cargo, or the proceeds of the ship or cargo, and arrest of the cargo may include arrest of the freight. But it is quite plain that in stating the modern practice of the Admiralty Court Lord Watson is regarding the res as being the very thing in respect of which the maritime debt, or the maritime lien, as the case may be, has arisen. There is not a hint in the passage quoted of the bringing of a maritime action against anything other than that which gives rise to the cause of action. It is quite true that in the House of Lords, as in the Court of Appeal, it was unnecessary, once it was decided that there was no maritime lien for necessaries, to discuss all possible aspects of the action in rem. But of the two statements of the law, both of which are obiter, this is the higher tribunal. Even if it does not purport to be exhaustive, I am convinced that it is correct as a statement of Admiralty jurisdiction and practice in recent times and I propose to follow it.

This view, in my opinion, is supported by The Dictator (4). The point for decision in that case was whether, in an action in rem in which bail had been given to avoid an actual arrest, the res was or was not subject to execution by writ of fieri facias in respect of a sum recovered in excess of the amount of the bail. Sir Francis Jeune held that the ship was not exempt from execution. After reviewing the early history of the action in rem the learned President says ([1892] P. at p. 313):

> "Actions beginning with arrest of the person became obsolete in practice; as Dr. Lushington says in The Clara (3) (Swab. at p. 3) in the last century, the last recorded instance being in 1780; and arrest of property merely to enforce appearance became rare or obsolete, though in theory such arrest of the person or property would seem still to be permissible: per Fry, L.J., in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) (10 P.D. at pp. 53, 54). On the other hand, arrest of property over which a lien could be enforced became more common as the idea of a pre-existing maritime lien developed, and arrest of property, in order to assert, for the creditor, that legal nexus over the proprietary interest of his debtor, as from the date of the attachment, of which Lord Watson speaks in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) (11 App. Cas. at p. 277), grew up."

It will be observed that, though Sir Francis Jeune used the words "rare or obsolete" in connection with arrest of property, he evidently regarded arrest whether of the person or property merely for the purpose of compelling appearance as being in the same category, and only mentioned either as being theoretically permissible because of the dictum in the Court of Appeal in The Heinrich Bjorn (1). It is unlikely that if there had been any other subsisting foundation for the arrest of property unconnected with the cause of action Sir Francis Jeune would not have said so. It is worthy of note that Lord Watson founds his statement as to the nature of that kind of action in rem which is unconnected with a maritime lien upon recent Admiralty practice. In the third edition of Williams and Bruce on Admiralty Practice, at p. 249, the following passage occurs:

> "Admiralty proceedings may be in rem or in personam. By proceedings in rem the property in relation to which the claim has arisen, or the proceeds of such property when in court, can be proceeded against, and made available to answer the claim. This method of proceeding is peculiar to courts exercising Admiralty jurisdiction, > and generally it is in order to avail themselves of the advantages thus afforded that suitors resort to their jurisdiction. But in cases where the plaintiff does not desire to proceed against the property, the method of proceeding in personam may be resorted to." A

In the late LORD PHILLIMORE'S article on Admiralty jurisdiction in volume 1 of the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA (14th Edn.), pp. 173–174, it is plainly assumed, though not expressly stated, that the res must be that in relation to which the claim has arisen. B Finally, in paras. 94 and 95 of the title "Admiralty" in the second edition of HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, for which LORD MERRIVALE and LANGTON, J., are responsible, it is stated definitely that both arrest of the person and arrest of any property belonging to him in tidal waters have become obsolete. Even if these statements of the law are not, strictly speaking, authorities, they make a formidable collection of views about the modern law and practice held by those best qualified to know what the law and practice are. C

But counsel for the plaintiffs argued that once it was shown that the old law and practice were in his favour, it was immaterial that text-writers, however eminent, declared that the law and practice had become obsolete. It must be shown how and why they had become obsolete. I am inclined to think that the solution is to be found in the passage from the introduction to the SELECT PLEAS IN ADMIRALTY quoted above. D It will be recalled that MR. MARSDEN draws the conclusion that arrest was mere procedure, and that its only object was to obtain security that the judgment should be satisfied. It may be that this was not the only, nor indeed the primary, object, and that the original object of arrest, as MR. ROSCOE suggested in the introduction to which I have already referred, was to found jurisdiction at a time when any attempt to assume jurisdiction in personam was prohibited by the common law courts. It would appear, E however, that even before actions in personam were recognised by the statutes to which I am about to refer, this method of procedure was adopted in the old Admiralty Court. In The Milan (16) (Lush. at p. 397) DR. LUSHINGTON says:

> "By the ancient law of the Admiralty with respect to damage by collision, whether the damage was occasioned to ship or to cargo, the mode of proceeding was twofold, either by an action in rem or by an action in personam." F

There are indications of this in the textbooks (see WILLIAMS AND BRUCE (3rd Edn.), p. 321, and ROSCOE (3rd Edn.), p. 45, note (c)); but it is difficult to define when this practice grew up or whether, or to what extent, it was recognised by the common law courts. Probably the action in personam developed out of the original practice of founding jurisdiction by arrest of the person (see per JEUNE, P., in The Port Victor (17), G [1901] P. at p. 249), and grew as the latter fell into desuetude.

With regard to the statute law, there is no mention in the Act of 1840 of either form of action. The first statutory reference to an Admiralty action in personam appears to be contained in s. 13 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1854. Seeing that the Act deals almost entirely with procedure, and that the subject-matter of the section is not referred to in the preamble, which merely recites the expediency of resolving doubts about the H administering of oaths and for providing for the collection of fees, it is unlikely that s. 13 was regarded as effecting any very revolutionary change in the law or practice. The section reads as follows:

> "In all cases in which a party had a cause or right of action in the High Court of Admiralty of England against any ship or freight, goods, or other effects whatever, it shall not be necessary to the institution of the suit for such person to sue out I a warrant for the arrest thereof, but it shall be competent to him to proceed by way of monition, citing the owner or owners of such ship, freight, goods, or other effects to appear and defend the suit, and upon satisfactory proof being given that the said monition has been personally served upon such owner or owners, the said court may proceed to hear and determine the suit, and may make such order in the premises as to it shall seem right."

The right to issue a monition in personam against the owner or owners is given, but the right to proceed in rem is not taken away. It is clear, however, that in the case of arrest, the ship, freight, goods or other effects to be arrested are those in relation to which the cause of action arises. The words "cause or right of action against any ship or freight, goods, or other effects whatever" are perfectly apt to describe the arrest of the ship, freight, cargo, tackle, and other apparel connected with the ship in respect of which the cause of action arose, but would be inapt in connection with a supposed right to arrest any other property of the defendant owner. Moreover, the rules, orders and regulations made by Order in Council, in pursuance of the Acts of 1840 and 1854, on Nov. 29, 1859, and the forms the use of which is thereby enjoined (see COOTE'S ADMIRALTY PRACTICE (2nd Edn.) p. 190 et seq.) lead to the same conclusion. When, therefore, by s. 35 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, Parliament enacted that the jurisdiction conferred by that Act upon the High Court of Admiralty might be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam, it was merely enlarging the jurisdiction, but not changing the forms of action by which that jurisdiction might be exercised.

Arrest, either of person or property, has long ceased, therefore, to be necessary in order to found jurisdiction. Nor is arrest of property, other than the thing in relation to which the claim arises, necessary in order to obtain security that the judgment shall be satisfied. It is true that, unless the defendant appears to an action in rem, satisfaction of the judgment is limited to the value of the res, but if the defendant appears, the action proceeds in personam as well as in rem. In such a case, as where the action is brought in personam in the first instance, execution can issue against any property of the defendant, including any surplus value of the res over and above the amount for which bail has been given: see The Dictator (4), The Gemma (7), and The Joannis Vatis (8). In my opinion, arrest of property unconnected with the claim was merely procedural, and the maxim "cessante ratione leges cessat ipsa lex," applies. I for one am not prepared, to quote LORD ESHER'S words in R. v. Judge of the City of London Court (12) ([1892] 1 Q.B. at p. 299), to "re-open the floodgates of Admiralty jurisdiction" upon the public, especially when that public is an international public, and I can see that the innovation would be disastrous to the prestige of the court.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, submitted that, even if it was established that in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division the right to proceed in rem is limited to the res which gives rise to the cause of action, that cannot apply to the statutory jurisdiction given to a county court. He relied in particular on the fact that the Act of 1869, as construed in The Alina (10), gave to county courts an Admiralty jurisdiction in respect of charterparties, which plainly is not possessed by the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Divisions. By s. 3 of the Act this extended jurisdiction may be exercised by proceedings in rem as well as in personam. Therefore, he argued, the meaning of the words "proceedings in rem" in the Act of 1869 cannot be restricted to the process in rem as understood in the High Court.

I am not convinced by this argument. Section 3 of the Act of 1869 merely repeats, with reference to the county court, the corresponding enactment with reference to the High Court of Admiralty contained in s. 35 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, which, as has already been shown, was merely declaratory of the effect of s. 13 of the Act of 1854. I see no ground for supposing that the legislature meant to enact that the nature of the process should differ in the two cases, even if the causes of action in relation to which it could be employed were more extensive in the one case than in the other: see per JAMES, L.J., in The Alina (10).

In support of his construction of the statute, counsel also relied upon DR. LUSHINGTON'S judgment in The Alexander Larsen (14). I do not think, however, that that judgment really assists his argument. The question there was whether the Act of 1840, which gave the High Court of Admiralty jurisdiction to decide all claims for, among other things, necessaries supplied to any foreign ship, enabled the court to try a claim for such necessaries which had arisen before the passing of the Act. DR. LUSHINGTON said in effect that the action could not have been entertained before the statute because it would probably have been prohibited, though it was plainly within the original scope of the maritime law, but that as the legislature had recognised the cause of action, and there were no words prohibiting the court from entertaining after the passing of the statute a claim which had arisen before the statute, there was jurisdiction to try the action. Whether the actual decision was or was not in accordance with the general principles governing the construction of statutes it is unnecessary to inquire, as it does not seem to me to touch the present point. What is important is that in the above decision given in the year after the setting up of the High Court of Admiralty, DR. LUSHINGTON uses these words (1 Wm. Rob. at p. 294):

> "The statute therefore simply confers upon the court a jurisdiction to be employed in every lawful mode which the court has the power to exercise for enforcing the payment; it might be by arresting the person of the owner if he were resident here, or by arresting the property in case a necessity occurred."

As this passage is one of the foundations of the dictum in The Heinrich Bjorn (1), in the Court of Appeal, it is worth noting that it is a little surprising, having regard to what he said fourteen years later in The Clara (3), that DR. LUSHINGTON should be speaking in 1841 of arrest of the person as a lawful mode of exercising jurisdiction; but it is significant that even in connection with arrest of the person he speaks of the arrest not of "his" property but of "the" property, by which the context seems to show that he means the property in relation to which the claim has arisen. This appears even more clearly from the relevant passage in his judgment in The Clara (3) where he says (Swab. at p. 3):

> "In the Admiralty Court there were two modes of proceeding—by arrest of the person, or arrest of the ship. The proceeding by arrest of the person has now for many years been obsolete; I cannot exactly say how long, but I think there was a precedent in 1780; the amount of damage done was the only limit to the amount that might be recovered. The proceedings by arrest of the ship—or in rem, as it is called—was the most sure, for to the extent of the value of the ship the plaintiff would be sure of any amount of damage decreed."

Counsel for the plaintiffs also relied on Mr. Carver's argument in The Zeta (11) ([1893] A.C. at p. 475) as being a statement by an eminent Admiralty practitioner of the existing law. I think, however, that we are bound by the decision both in that case and in R. v. Judge of the City of London Court (12), followed, as they were, by a Divisional Court in The Champion (18), to hold that, except with regard to the special case of charterparties, the Admiralty jurisdiction given to county courts is that which was then exercised by the High Court of Admiralty.

In this connection the proviso to s. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, is significant. This section, which applies expressly to all courts exercising Admiralty jurisdiction in this country, imposes a limitation of two years upon any action to enforce any claim against a vessel or her owners (that is to say, upon an action whether in rem or in personam) in respect, among other things, of any damage or loss to another vessel, her cargo or freight, or any property on board her caused by the fault of the former vessel, or in respect of any salvage services, but provides that > "any court having jurisdiction to deal with an action to which this section relates . . . shall, if satisfied that there has not during such period been any reasonable opportunity of arresting the defendant vessel within the jurisdiction of the court . . . extend any such period to an extent sufficient to give such reasonable opportunity."

It is true that this section does not cover all cases in which proceedings in rem are available; but, between them, the two classes of case mentioned form the majority of Admiralty causes. It is improbable that Parliament would have enacted this proviso with regard to the arrest of the defendant vessel if in an Admiralty action in a county court there was also jurisdiction to arrest any other property of the defendant owner within the realm.

For these reasons, like LORD ESHER, I find it impossible to suppose that in 1869 Parliament meant to give to county courts any jurisdiction wider, with the exception mentioned, than it had conferred on the High Court of Admiralty in 1840. The appeal also succeeds, therefore, on the point actually argued before the learned county court judge. As regards costs, the plaintiffs bear the responsibility for starting this misconceived litigation with the original arrest of the ship. It is true that by concurring in the issue, which is also misconceived, the interveners have enhanced the costs, but I think that costs should follow the event. The appeal will be allowed with costs here and below.

SCOTT, L.J. (read by Swift, J.)—This appeal is from a judgment of the county court judge for Monmouthshire sitting at Newport on an issue agreed between the interveners in the action and the plaintiffs on the record, in which the interveners challenged the right of the plaintiffs to proceed in rem against the steamship Beldis belonging to the defendants. The action was brought in that court in its Admiralty jurisdiction by a plaint in rem dated April 5, 1935, against the steamship Beldis. The particulars of claim were expressed to be for money due and payable by the defendants, the owners of the steamship Beldis, to the plaintiffs under an award dated Jan. 24, 1935, in an arbitration held by virtue of a clause in a charterparty dated July 13, 1933, and made between the defendants and the plaintiffs, whereby the arbitrator awarded to the plaintiffs the sum of £27 4s. 6d. composed of an item of £19 7s. 6d. for money due in account and an item of £7 17s. for costs. Judgment was in default of appearance signed for the amount claimed.

After judgment Lambert Brothers, Ltd., sought to intervene. By their affidavit they stated that they were mortgagees of the steamship Beldis under a mortgage for £20,000 sterling registered at Oslo on May 25, 1929; they challenged the plaintiff's right to proceed in rem against that ship, asked leave to enter an appearance on the grounds (inter alia) that the arrest of the steamship Beldis was illegal and that the proceedings were wrongly taken in rem, and prayed that the judgment signed in the action in their absence might be set aside. An issue was agreed between them and the plaintiffs in the following terms:

> "We, the plaintiffs and the interveners in the above-named action, herewith submit the following sole issue to be tried by this Honourable Court, pleadings being waived: Whether the plaintiff's action in rem against the steamship Beldis is maintainable in view of the fact that the plaintiffs' claim in this action arose out of a charterparty of the steamship Belfri, being a ship belonging to the same owners. The said parties agree that in the event of the question raised in this issue being answered in the affirmative, there shall be judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs, and in the event of the question raised in this issue being answered in the negative, there shall be judgment for the interveners with costs."

The county court judge tried this cause and held on the authority of certain dicta of the Court of Appeal in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) that the contention of the interveners was wrong and gave judgment against them. The interveners then appealed to this court, the plaintiffs being respondents.

On the hearing of the appeal the said award was produced to us and it appeared on its face that the charterparty in question was made, not in respect of the steamship Beldis, the ship against which the action in rem was instituted, but in respect of a different ship altogether, also belonging to the defendants, namely, the steamship Belfri. It further appeared from the award that the said sum of £19 7s. 6d. was a balance due to the plaintiffs in account, being in fact, as we were informed by counsel, an overpayment of charter hire of the steamship Belfri.

The phraseology of the issue indicates that in the view of both parties the plaintiffs' action, although based on the award, was nevertheless a claim which arose "out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship," because the arbitration had been held pursuant to an arbitration clause in the charterparty of the steamship Belfri and because the dispute before the arbitrator "had arisen out of" that agreement.

In the above circumstances two questions call for decision. Question (i): Assuming that "the cause" was one which could have been prosecuted in rem against the steamship Belfri under s. 3 of the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Amendment Act, 1869, as a claim which arose "out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship" within the meaning of s. 2 (1) of that Act, could it be prosecuted in rem against another ship belonging to the same owners, the steamship Beldis, with which the said charterparty had no concern? Question (ii): Is the above assumption legally sound, when the plaintiffs were suing not on the charterparty but on an award of an arbitrator, merely because the arbitration had been held pursuant to an arbitration clause in such an agreement? Do the words "claim arising out of any agreement, &c.," cover such a cause of action?

In the court below the parties to the issue were in conflict over Question No. (i), but Question No. (ii) was not discussed, both sides apparently being in agreement in thinking that the court could entertain such an action on an award as an Admiralty cause in rem. No argument was addressed to us on this point until we directed the attention of counsel to the doubt as to whether county court had any Admiralty jurisdiction over such an action.

It is convenient to dispose of Question No. (ii) first. The answer depends upon the true interpretation of the Act of 1869, construed in the light of the state of the law at the time when the Act was passed. Are the words of s. 2 (1) wide enough and clear enough to cover this action? Voluntary arbitrations at that date were governed by the provisions of the Acts of 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18, and the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. Then, as now, an action lay at common law to enforce an award (see Bullen & Leake (3rd Edn.); Russell on Arbitration (3rd Edn.) (1864), p. 505); but the only other means of enforcing an award was either (a) by making the submission a rule of Court of Queen's Bench—with the consequence that a party acting in disobedience to the award could be attached for contempt (Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 17, and 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, s. 1; see also Russell on Arbitration (3rd Edn.), Part III, Ch. V, p. 565 et seq.); or (b) by obtaining from the common law court a rule absolute for payment of the sum awarded (see 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18; Russell on Arbitration (3rd Edn.), p. 612, and Jones v. Williams (19) there cited).

This being the state of the law about the enforcement of "voluntary" awards, it was unlikely that an action on an award would in 1869 be assigned by Parliament to the High Court of Admiralty; and in the absence of clear words it would be wrong so to interpret the Act even assuming the words to be wide enough to include it. But the words of the statute "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship" not only are not clear in the sense supposed, but, in my view, for the following reasons cannot include it.

By the early part of the nineteenth century, as a result of the long war with the common law courts (to which I shall return in connection with question No. (i)), the categories of "Admiralty causes" had become limited to damage, salvage, wages, bottomry, and certain other causes arising out of maritime events and affairs, of which there was then in truth a fairly well-defined list. Indeed, it was just because the jurisdiction in Admiralty had become thus restricted that the aid of the legislature had to be invoked in order to effect the extensions of it contained in the Admiralty Court Acts, 1840 and 1861.

It is true that the Court of Admiralty was thereby given jurisdiction over several causes of action cognisable in either common law or Chancery courts, but each one was defined in precise, plain, and carefully guarded terms; and in the case of those founded on contract, the cause of action was one directly based upon the maritime contract described in the section, e.g., towage and necessaries supplied to foreign ships (1840 Act, s. 6); necessaries to any ship anywhere (1861 Act, s. 5) and certain claims on bills of lading for damage but each of the last two cases only if the shipowner was not domiciled in England and Wales. In my view, it would be entirely wrong to hold that an action on an award arising indirectly out of such a maritime contract was included by the words in the above sections.

Precisely the same reasoning applies to the language of the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act, 1868, with even greater force, since the assignment of Admiralty jurisdiction to county courts was a new departure and in that Act made rather experimentally. By it certain county courts were given Admiralty jurisdiction to try a limited list of what the Act called "Admiralty" causes; and they were not given the full right of Admiralty procedure in rem, being authorised to arrest (otherwise than in execution) only if it was probable that "the vessel or property to which the cause relates" would be removed out of the jurisdiction (s. 22). It is true that by s. 3 of the Act of 1869 the right of Admiralty procedure in rem was conferred for the purposes of both Acts, but there was no change in the method of describing the permitted field of Admiralty jurisdiction: there was merely an extension of the list of particular Admiralty causes over which the court was to have jurisdiction.

With the above history of Admiralty jurisdiction both before and since 1840, it would in my judgment be plainly wrong to say that under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1869 a county court has Admiralty jurisdiction to entertain an action on an award upon a voluntary submission, merely because the arbitration was held pursuant to an arbitration clause in a charterparty for the reference of disputes arising out of that charterparty.

This conclusion is sufficient to dispose of the appeal and to show that the judgment of the learned judge cannot stand, but in case the above interpretation of the words "arising out of any agreement, &c.," be held by the House of Lords to be wrong, I give my conclusion and reasons on question No. (i) also. It is one of great commercial importance, for it applies to all proceedings in rem whether in county courts or the Admiralty Division.

In many continental systems of law and procedure (e.g., in Germany, Sweden, Belgium, and to a certain extent in France) there is a right of arrest for founding jurisdiction and obtaining bail in respect of any ship or other property of a defendant, although wholly unconnected with the cause of action sued on. But in England I have never heard of such an arrest, and I do not believe any attempt has ever been made here to exercise such a right in practice within the memory of any living practitioner in the Admiralty Court, until the plaintiffs in the present action made it. In my view, there is no such right in English law to-day.

Counsel for the plaintiffs naturally relied strongly upon the expression of opinion in the Court of Appeal in The Heinrich Bjorn (1), which appears in the judgment of the court (composed of BRETT, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.), and delivered by FRY, L.J. (10 P.D. at p. 54). The learned lord justice there says in regard to the procedure in rem:

> "The arrest need not be of the ship in question, but may be of any property of the defendant within the realm."

That observation was, however, purely obiter. Apart from an unfounded contention of a bottomry bond, which the court rejected, the only question of law relevant to the decision of the case was whether a maritime lien attaches in English law to a valid claim for necessaries. That was necessarily the sole issue in that case, since the ship for which the necessaries had been supplied had passed by sale from the ownership of the shipowner for whom the necessaries had been supplied to that of new owners who had nothing to do with the voyage when the necessaries were supplied. If there was a maritime lien the new owners took subject to the lien; if there was no maritime lien their ship was free and the plaintiff had no right to arrest it in their hands. The opinion of the court in The Heinrich Bjorn (1) is entitled to great respect; but it is not binding on us, and in my view the dictum is erroneous.

My reasons are as follow. There is little doubt that historically the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court was originally exercised by employing either of two methods of procedure for bringing the defendant before the court: (i) The arrest of his person; (ii) the seizure of his goods. There is more than one case in MARSDEN'S SELECT PLEAS OF THE COURT OF ADMIRALTY which illustrates the arrest of goods other than the goods or ship concerned in the particular cause of action for the purpose of founding jurisdiction. But it seems to be equally clear that both methods had fallen into disuse before the beginning of the nineteenth century, probably as a result of the incessant war of jurisdiction waged by the common law courts on the Admiralty Court in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. A full account of this long quarrel is contained in the third edition of ROSCOE'S ADMIRALTY PRACTICE, and that account may, I believe, be accepted as substantially accurate.

During the first half of the nineteenth century there emerges a fact of dominant significance. A belief had grown up in the minds of Admiralty practitioners that the ambit of Admiralty procedure in rem was coterminous with the ambit of the maritime lien; that where there was a maritime lien the right to proceed in rem existed, and where there was no maritime lien the right to proceed in rem did not exist. This belief, strongly held and widely prevalent until judicially corrected, actually found expression in 1851 in the judgment of the Privy Council in The Bold Buccleugh (6), reported under the name of Harmer v. Bell. There the Privy Council themselves said in the judgment (7 Moo. P.C.C. at p. 284):

> "Having its origin in this rule of the civil law, a maritime lien is well defined by Lord Tenterden, to mean a claim or privilege upon a thing to be carried into effect by legal process; and Mr. Justice Story (1 Sumner 78) explains that process to be a proceeding in rem, and adds, that wherever a lien or claim is given upon the thing, then the Admiralty enforces it by a proceeding in rem, and indeed is the only court competent to enforce it. A maritime lien is the foundation of the proceeding in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches; and whilst it must be admitted that where such a lien exists, a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true, that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course, there a maritime lien exists, which gives a privilege or claim upon a thing, to be carried into effect by legal process. This claim or privilege travels with the thing, into whosoever possession it may come. It is inchoate from the moment the claim or privilege attaches, and when carried into effect by legal process, by a proceeding in rem, relates back to the period when it first attached."

The view thus expressed, that the right to proceed in rem was limited to those cases where a valid maritime lien was recognised in Admiralty law, was considered in the very case of The Heinrich Bjorn (1), upon which the plaintiffs in the present appeal mainly rely, both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords, and there finally negatived as wholly erroneous; but the fact that it was so long and so widely entertained throws much light on the contention raised in the issue before us. If everybody practising in Admiralty had a firm belief that in order to arrest you must have a lien, they must equally have been satisfied that where there was no lien you could not arrest. If they believed that the right of proceeding in rem was thus limited, it follows that they must have recognised the impossibility of arresting any ship other than the particular ship to which the cause of action related—since ex hypothesi there could be no lien over a ship wholly unconnected with the cause of action. They could never have supposed that another ship of the same owner could be arrested in a cause for, e.g., damage or salvage, because ex hypothesi no maritime lien for damage or salvage could possibly attach to any but the delinquent ship or the salved ship. This historical misconception is, to my mind, conclusive proof that during the period of its prevalence the universal practice was to treat the right of procedure in rem as applicable only to the ship or property to which the cause of action related, and that the archaic right of arresting other property of a defendant, i.e., other than that with which the cause of action was concerned, had before that period fallen wholly out of use and become obsolete. The complete absence of any reported case in the last 100 years, in which the present attempt to arrest a ship or property unconnected with the cause of action has ever been made before, is, indeed, of itself almost conclusive that the procedure in rem was not regarded in the Admiralty Court as extending to such other ships or property, and from this fact, too, I draw the inference that it had ceased to be permissible.

This view seems to me to be implicit in the language of Parliament in the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act, 1868. The Act of 1869 is to be read as one with the Act of 1868 (s. 1). By s. 3 of the Act of 1869 the Court is empowered to exercise its Admiralty jurisdiction (under either Act) either in personam or by the ordinary Admiralty procedure in rem in respect of any causes within the combined Act. By s. 21 (1) of the Act of 1868 the Admiralty jurisdiction thus conferred is locally limited to the district within which the vessel or property "to which the cause relates" is at the time when proceedings are commenced. These provisions justify two comments. In the first place, they seem to presuppose the impossibility of applying the procedure in rem to any ship or property unless the cause relates to it; in other words, it is almost a statutory recognition of the existing practice which had then for long prevailed. In the second place, as the county court has no Admiralty jurisdiction beyond what is expressly conferred by the statute, its concomitant power to proceed in rem is equally confined, and it seems to me more consistent with sound interpretation to regard the procedural power as conferred in respect of the same res as that upon which the substantive jurisdiction is founded, viz., the res "to which the cause of action relates."

The language of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, to which the learned President has referred, is consistent with and supports the above conclusion. But the argument must not be pressed too far. The proviso to s. 8 which enacts a statutory limitation of two years for the bringing of collision and salvage actions, subject to a power in the court to extend the time if there has been no reasonable opportunity of arresting the defendant ship within the jurisdiction, merely repeats art. 7 of the convention, and that article was accepted with the above proviso by many continental nations who had in their codes of procedure the right of arresting property wholly unconnected with the cause of action and had no intention of altering their procedure; and the proviso has, since then, been put into force by several of them in their national legislation without any change being made in their method of procedure. The truth is that those conventions were not intended by the high contracting parties to touch national laws of procedure. The late LORD STERNDALE and I were delegates of the British Government at Brussels and conducted the negotiations and signed those conventions; and we were alive to this wide difference between the procedural laws prevailing in many continental countries on the one hand and the British Empire on the other. The correct view of the proviso to s. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, is, in my opinion, therefore, simply recognised and leaves unaltered the English Admiralty procedure in rem as it had existed for at least a century.

For the above reasons the conclusion seems to me plain that the plaintiffs had no right to arrest the steamship Beldis even if the cause did "arise out of the charterparty of the steamship Belfri." My answer to Question No. (i) is, therefore, also in favour of the appellants, the interveners. The appeal ought to be allowed and judgment entered for them, with costs here and below.

SWIFT, J.—By a claim dated April 5, 1935, filed in the County Court of Monmouthshire holden at Newport, the plaintiffs claimed against the owners of the steamship Beldis the sum of £27 4s. 6d. payable by the defendants to them under an award made by an arbitrator dated Jan. 24, 1935, and on the following day a summons directed to the defendants was issued out of the said court. The award was based upon a submission to arbitration contained in a charterparty of the steamship Belfri which belonged to the same owners as the steamship Beldis. The claim was made under the Admiralty jurisdiction of the court and the action purported to be an action in rem.

On April 5, the steamship Beldis was arrested under Admiralty procedure. Lambert Brothers, Ltd., claimed to intervene in the said action as being the mortgagees of the steamship Beldis and on April 25 they were permitted so to intervene. Thereafter, the plaintiffs and the interveners submitted a "sole issue" to be tried by the court

> "whether the plaintiffs' action in rem against the steamship Beldis is maintainable in view of the fact that the plaintiffs' claim in this action arose out of a charterparty of the steamship Belfri, being a ship belonging to the same owners."

On June 27, the question raised by that issue was decided by the court and the learned judge held that the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed on that question and judgment in their favour was entered with costs. From that judgment the interveners appeal.

The cause of action alleged is an ordinary common law claim for payment of money due under an award. Such a cause of action is not one of those upon which jurisdiction in Admiralty is conferred upon the county court by s. 2 of the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Amendment Act, 1869, nor is it a cause of action for which an action in rem could be brought apart from the County Courts Act. In my view, the proceedings were quite misconceived. The action could not be brought in the Admiralty jurisdiction of the county court at all and it could not be brought as an action in rem.

I think, therefore, that the whole action fails, that the parties had no right to propound any issue in such action for the decision of the court, that the decision of the court upon such issue was invalid and that the action should have been dismissed for want of jurisdiction and judgment should have been entered for the defendants and the interveners. That is sufficient, in my opinion, to dispose of this appeal, which should be allowed and the judgment set aside.

The parties, however, on the hearing of the appeal, argued at length the question which was raised before the county court judge, namely, whether an action in rem would lie against a ship or other property belonging to a person who was a party to the cause of action, but in respect of which cause of action the ship or other property sought to be made liable was in no way involved. I have read and agree with the judgments of the President and SCOTT, L.J., on this point and it is not necessary for me to say anything further than that in my view at the present time an action in rem will not lie save as against the ship or other property which is the very res in respect of or out of which the cause of action arises.

I agree that this appeal should be allowed, with costs here and below.

Appeal Allowed.

LONDON PASSENGER TRANSPORT BOARD v. SUMNER

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Hewart, C.J., Humphreys and Singleton, JJ.), October 11, 1935]

Tramway—Byelaw—Validity—Failure to pay fare—Offence irrespective of mens rea—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict., c. 78), s. 46.

A byelaw relating to the working of a tramway system was in the following terms: "Each passenger shall, immediately upon demand, or in case no demand shall have been made before leaving the carriage, pay to the conductor the fare legally demandable for his journey and accept a ticket therefor." Another byelaw provided that any breach of the tramway system's byelaws and regulations should be punishable by a fine of 40s.

Held: the first-mentioned byelaw was ultra vires as being repugnant to the general law of the land in that it made failure to pay a fare legally demandable an offence irrespective of whether there was an intention to avoid payment, and also as being unreasonable, and that a person could not be convicted of a breach of it.

Case Stated by the chief magistrate of the metropolis.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Bow-street three informations were preferred by the London Passenger Transport Board (the appellants) under byelaw 12 of the London County Council's Tramways byelaws and regulations, made by the Minister of Transport on July 27, 1920, under s. 7 of the London County Tramways Act, 1896, s. 2 of the Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, and ss. 46 and 47 of the Tramways Act, 1870, against Miss Mary Sumner (the respondent), for that she on Oct. 5, 6, and 27, 1934, contrary to the byelaw, being a passenger on a carriage using a tramway, did fail to pay to the conductor the fare legally demandable for her journey before leaving such carriage.

Byelaw 12 provided as follows:

> "Each passenger shall, immediately upon demand, or in case no demand shall have been made before leaving the carriage, pay to the conductor the fare legally demandable for his journey and accept a ticket therefor."

On the hearing of the information the following evidence was given on behalf of the prosecution:—On Friday, Oct. 5, 1934, the respondent entered a tramcar of the appellants at Kennington Cross and paid for and received a 2d. return workman's ticket entitling her to travel as far as Savoy-street and back. She continued travelling as far as Aldwych, which was about 500 yds. beyond Savoy-street. Between Savoy-street and Aldwych the conductor called out: "Any more fares, please?" but the respondent tendered nothing and left the tramcar without paying the excess fare of 1d. which was demandable of her. On Saturday, Oct. 6, 1934, exactly the same thing occurred again. On Wednesday, Oct. 10, 1934, the respondent made a similar journey, but paid for and received at the same time as she took the 2d. return workman's ticket a further 1d. ticket entitling her to travel to Aldwych. On Tuesday, Oct. 16, 1934, the respondent made a similar journey, but before leaving the tramcar paid the excess fare of 1d. demandable of her without any specific demand therefor being made. On Saturday, Oct. 20, 1934, the respondent made a similar journey, but before leaving the tramcar paid, on the demand of the conductor, the excess fare of 1d. On Saturday, Oct. 27, 1934, the respondent made a similar journey. Between Savoy-street and Aldwych the conductor called out: "Any more fares, please?" but the respondent tendered nothing and left the tramcar without paying the excess fare of 1d. Mr. Cooper, a plain-clothes inspector of the appellants, followed the respondent and questioned her. She said to him: "I forgot. There's the penny," and showed in her hand a penny and the 2d. return ticket. Mr. Cooper had seen the respondent pay her fare without any demand being made. He had never seen her refuse to pay her fare when demanded personally, but when conductors said: "Fares, please," she sometimes paid and sometimes did not.

At the end of the appellant's case, and before any explanation of the respondent's conduct was offered, it was contended on her behalf that the byelaw was invalid (a) because it was repugnant to the law of England in that it made failure to pay a fare legally demandable an offence, irrespective of whether there was or was not an intention to avoid such payment; and (b) because it was unreasonable.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that the byelaw was valid (a) because by s. 51 of the Tramways Act, 1870, it was an offence for anyone travelling in a tramcar to avoid payment of his fare, and there was no qualification in the Act as to what intention was necessary to constitute the offence, and because there was nothing in the general law which said, whether expressly or by implication, that it was lawful to avoid payment of a fare on a tramcar, or that a guilty intention was necessary to constitute the offence of avoiding such payment; (b) because the byelaw did not exclude the defence of a lawful excuse any more than s. 51 of the Tramways Act, 1870; and (c) because, having regard to the circumstances in which passengers were carried in tramcars, it was reasonable to require them to pay the fares demandable of them even if such fares be not demanded.

The chief magistrate, in his judgment, said:

> "Apart from authority, I should be disposed to hold that the words relied upon in the byelaw under consideration are repugnant to the laws of England, for no act or omission can be a crime unless mens rea is present, or there is express statutory provision that the act or omission is a crime without any criminal intent, or it can be inferred from the terms of the statute that the mere act or omission is in itself an offence. In the same way the byelaw, or at least the part of it with which I am particularly concerned, also appears to me to be bad as being unreasonable. It purports to make punishable acts or omissions of the most innocent nature, or rendered inevitable by the conduct of the tramway officials themselves. For instance, it would make punishable the omission of a passenger to pay his fare as the result of the most innocent inadvertence. . . ."

He said that he came to the same conclusion on a review of the authorities, especially Lowe v. Volp (1). He held that the byelaw was ultra vires as repugnant to the general law of the land, and also as unreasonable.

The appellants appealed to the Divisional Court.

Monckton, K.C. (E. F. M. Maxwell with him) for the appellants.—The chief magistrate appears to have based his decision, at any rate to some extent, on principles laid down in a series of cases involving the construction of railway bye-laws, but s. 5 (3) of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889, which imposes penalties for travelling on railways without paying the fare, contains the express words, "with intent to avoid payment [of the fare]." No such words are to be found in s. 51 of the Tramways Act, 1870, and the construction of tramway byelaws should, therefore, be approached from a different angle. Further, the position of a tramway company is entirely different from that of a railway company. Passengers leaving a train are obliged on all occasions to pass a barrier, and it may, therefore, be quite reasonable to impose on a railway company the burden of a demand for the fare in every case, but unreasonable to impose a similar burden on a tramway company. There are dicta in Lowe v. Volp (1), which appear to be contrary to the present argument, and the Scottish decision of Nimmo v. Lanarkshire Tramways Co. (2) is directly against it, but, viewing the matter as a whole, the byelaw in question should not be regarded as repugnant to s. 51 of the Tramways Act, 1870, or as unreasonable.

Comyns Carr, K.C., and Martin O'Connor, for the respondent, were not called on to argue.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—This is a Case Stated by the learned chief magistrate of the metropolis. It arises out of a prosecution of the respondent for failing to pay to the conductor of a tramcar the fare legally demandable before she left the carriage. The magistrate, having heard argument, dismissed the informations. The question for this court is whether he came to a correct determination in point of law.

It was argued on behalf of the respondent at the close of the appellants' case that the bye-law under which the informations were laid was invalid for two reasons—first, because it was repugnant to the law of England in that it made failure to pay a fare legally demandable an offence, irrespective of whether there was or was not an intention to avoid payment, and, secondly, because it was unreasonable. The chief magistrate upheld each of those contentions and decided, therefore, that the byelaw was invalid. He set out his reasons in a very careful and extremely able judgment.

I have paid the greatest attention to the able and attractive argument of counsel for the appellants, but I am satisfied that the judgment of the chief magistrate was right for the reasons which it expressed. It may be added that, side by side with Lowe v. Volp (1), there is the further case to which counsel very properly directed our attention, Nimmo v. Lanarkshire Tramways Co.

I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I agree.

SINGLETON, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Estoppel—Previous legal proceedings—Representations in minute of settlement of action and in answer to petition for divorce.

Marriage—Validity—Mental reservations by one party.

If two people with the same sources of information assert the same truth, or agree to assert the same falsehood, at the same time, neither can be estopped as against the other from asserting differently at another time.

In 1912 a man, C., and a woman entered into a valid Scottish irregular marriage. In 1915 the woman went through a form of marriage in England with another man, S. In 1920 C. filed a petition for divorce in England averring that he was lawfully married to the woman, and citing S. as co-respondent. By his answer S. pleaded that the Scottish marriage was invalid. The woman then brought an action in Scotland against C. for a declaration of perpetual silence anent the Scottish marriage. That action was settled, one of the terms of settlement being that C. undertook never to maintain that he had been lawfully married to the woman. In that action S. was the woman's curator and administrator, and as such was cognisant of that settlement and signed the minute of settlement. In 1934 S. filed the present petition for nullity of his marriage with the woman on the ground that in 1912 she had contracted a valid marriage with C.

Held: the representations in the minute of the settlement of the Scottish action in 1920 and in S.'s answer to C.'s divorce petition to the effect that the Scottish marriage in 1912 was not a valid marriage did not estop S. from pleading in the present proceedings that it was valid, since (i) he did not make those representations to the woman, (ii) he did not make them with the intention that she should act upon the faith of them, and (iii) it was not suggested that she had acted on the faith of them.

Observations by LANGTON, J., on the effect of mental reservations as to the validity of the ceremony on the part of a person going through a form of marriage.

Petitions for nullity of marriage.

In the first petition Geoffrey Michael Elliot Square sought a declaration of nullity of marriage on the ground that when he went through a form of marriage with Valerie Jean Square (née Grant-Davey) at the register office in the district of Thanet, Kent, on May 15, 1915, she was already married, having entered into an irregular, but valid, Scottish marriage at Sliddery, Isle of Arran, on July 25, 1912, with Aubrey Mendelssohn Cowan (then Cohen), who was still surviving. Mrs. Square, who, in July, 1912, was the widow of an Englishman named Bewicke, denied that she was married to Mr. Cowan, and said that Mr. Square was estopped from setting up the Scottish marriage because in an English divorce suit which Mr. Cowan filed in 1920 citing Mr. Square as co-respondent, the latter averred that he was lawfully married to her, and also because as her curator and administrator in a Scottish action which she brought against Mr. Cowan for "perpetual silence anent" the Scottish marriage Mr. Square was a party to the settlement of that action whereby Mr. Cowan undertook never to maintain that he was married to her. Mr. Cowan, intervening in Mr. Square's suit, adopted the same defence.

In the second petition Ada Mildred Cowan, formerly a widow named Youell, prayed for a declaration of nullity of her marriage on Jan. 7, 1921, to Mr. Cowan on the ground that on that date there was a subsisting marriage between Mr. Cowan and Mrs. Square. Mr. Cowan, by his answer, denied that there had been a valid marriage between Mrs. Square and himself.

The petitions were tried together. It was established that there was a promise of marriage by Mr. Cowan to Mrs. Bewicke (later Mrs. Square), whose domicil of origin was Scottish, and that each of them signed in Scotland a declaration in the following terms, mutatis mutandis:

> "I hereby swear solemnly to take [the other] to be my lawfully wedded wife [or husband] until death do us part."

There had been at least twenty-one days' residence in Scotland at the time of the declaration, and there was subsequent cohabitation by the parties. Mrs. Cowan (as she then was) having made the acquaintance of Mr. Square went through a form of marriage with him in May, 1915. Mr. Cowan had been serving abroad during the war. When he was informed of the latter ceremony and Mrs. Cowan's relations with Mr. Square he petitioned, on Jan. 21, 1920, for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of Mrs. Cowan's adultery and bigamous marriage with Mr. Square. By her defence to that suit she denied that she had married Mr. Cowan or committed bigamy. On Feb. 16, 1920, Mrs. Square (as she was then known) as the wife of Mr. Square, and with his consent and concurrence in his capacity as her curator and administrator, began proceedings in Scotland against Mr. Cowan claiming a declaration that she was the wife of Mr. Square and that Mr. Cowan be > "put to silence in respect of false and calumnious allegations by him that he was married to the respondent."

Those proceedings settled on the terms contained in a joint minute that Mr. Cowan admitted that there was no marriage subsisting between him and Mrs. Square, and that he undertook to withdraw his petition for divorce. In January, 1921, Mr. Cowan married Mrs. Youell.

Evidence was given, and the fact of the validity of the Scottish marriage having been found, the only issue remaining was whether Mr. Square was estopped from setting it up.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 17. LANGTON, J., read the following judgment. In the matters raised by this litigation there are two distinct actions. They raise questions so much interwoven that I made an order to try both actions together. The case of Square v. Square raises the important point, and the decision of this point governs the Cowan Case. I have taken time to consider the matter because the case is unusual and the facts are complicated. It is a history not lacking even in adventure or an element of romance, but it is probably a good thing for the peace and quiet of our work-a-day world that it represents a considerable departure from the normal.

This lady, who is to-day known as Mrs. Square, and whom it will be convenient to refer to hereafter as the respondent, apparently began life as Jean Sinclair Grant-Davey, A and her domicil of origin was Scottish. She made her first attempt at earning her living upon the stage, and, as I understand, dropped her surname and appropriated a new Christian name, Valerie, for this purpose. In the year 1909 she married a man named Bewicke. After a brief, but, from the respondent's point of view, most unhappy, married life, Mr. Bewicke died in the year 1911. I gathered from the respondent that the unhappiness of this comparatively short experience of marriage was such that she B felt very determined in 1911 not to repeat the experiment. I see no reason to doubt her sincerity in this respect; indeed, it is almost necessary to accept it in order to explain the next phase of her career.

In the year 1912 the respondent, having resumed her Scottish domicil on the death of Mr. Bewicke, went to Boulogne and there met Mr. Aubrey Mendelssohn Cohen (who has since changed his name by deed poll to Cowan). They met in the Casino, were C mutually attracted, and Mr. Cowan proposed marriage. The respondent rejected this proposal, but agreed to go with Mr. Cowan to Paris and to live with him there as his mistress. After a short sojourn in that city they went to Scotland—first to Glasgow, where the respondent's home was, and then to the Isle of Arran, where they eventually took a house from the local blacksmith at Sliddery, and stayed during the month of July. On July 25, when both parties had been resident in Scotland for over three weeks, D Mr. Cowan persuaded the respondent, after a very animated and most disagreeable dispute, to sign and countersign holograph documents to the effect that each took the other to be his (or her) lawfully wedded spouse "until death do us part." These two documents have been produced before me in evidence, and their complete authenticity is admitted. At the same time as they were written a third document in the same sense, and in the same terms, was written out and signed by Mr. Cowan and countersigned by E the respondent and taken by Mr. Cowan to Mr. Quick, the postmaster of Sliddery. The postmaster witnessed this third document, and Mr. Cowan kept it for some time in his pocket-book, but lost both wallet and document at Tarbet in the same year—1912. The documents which have been produced before me were put in Mr. Cowan's suit-case, and eventually locked in his desk in a house at Kenley, in Surrey.

After her season in Scotland the respondent turned southwards with Mr. Cowan, and F the years 1913 and 1914 saw her settled in Kenley, Surrey, and there installed, so far as the outside world could judge, as the lawful wedded wife of Mr. Cowan. In 1914, however, there came into the respondent's life a young man—younger and considerably less experienced than herself, named Geoffrey Square. The respondent and Mr. Square became deeply enamoured of one another, and the respondent announced to Mr. Square that she was not the wife, but only the mistress, of Mr. Cowan. On May 15, 1915, Mr. G Square married the respondent at the register office of Thanet, and it is this marriage which Mr. Square is now seeking to be declared void upon the ground of the previous marriage of the respondent to Mr. Cowan.

This marriage in 1915 was kept secret by the parties from Mr. Cowan until 1920, and during the intervening five years the respondent appears to have played the part of wife to both Mr. Cowan and Mr. Square intermittently. This difficult and exacting existence H was rendered possible by the fact that Mr. Cowan was seldom in England, and then only for short periods of military leave. Matters came to a head early in 1920 when Mr. Cowan met the respondent in Edinburgh with the intention of inducing her to join him in his military service upon the Rhine. At an extraordinary and somewhat dramatic interview in St. George's-square, Edinburgh, Mr. Square and the respondent informed Mr. Cowan that they were married, and so much did they fear the reaction of this intelli- I gence upon Mr. Cowan that they took the precaution of removing his revolver from him before imparting the news. This piquant detail is not without importance in considering the degree of seriousness with which Mr. Cowan regarded, and the respondent knew that he regarded, his Scottish marriage. Instead, however, of the apprehended violence, Mr. Cowan took a much more sensible step, and on Jan. 21, 1920, filed a petition in this court for divorce from his marriage in the Isle of Arran, citing Mr. Square as co-respondent on the ground of the bigamous marriage of the respondent with Mr. Square in Thanet and their consequent adultery.

The respondent, faced by this serious charge, sought legal aid in Scotland, and proceeded at once to commence an action in the Scottish courts for a "declaration of putting to silence" Mr. Cowan on the subject of the Scottish marriage. This is broadly the equivalent of the jactitation suit known to English law. The respondent then sought and obtained from the English Divorce Court a stay of the proceedings which Mr. Cowan had commenced against her, on the ground of lis alibi pendens. As the year 1920 advanced Mr. Cowan found himself in a very unenviable position. He was faced with Scottish proceedings in which he was unable to produce any documentary evidence of his irregular Scottish marriage. The document witnessed by the postmaster had been lost for ever at Tarbet, and the other two documents, which have been produced before me, had been deposited in a bank on June 30, 1917. It is quite certain that this very valuable evidence of his Scottish marriage was not in the possession of Mr. Cowan at the crucial moment in 1920. By the adroit manœuvre of the other side he was placed in a most difficult position. At the best he could only hope to establish at considerable cost, and in the face of determined opposition, some of the facts of his residence in the Isle of Arran and subsequently at Kenley. His English petition was stayed, and he was faced with the possibility of being saddled with two sets of costs out of the resources of a serving officer in the army. It is not surprising to learn that he took steps to withdraw as best he might from a most unpleasant position.

A joint minute, bearing no date, so far as I can ascertain, but clearly of a date prior to June 29, 1920, was drawn up between the parties in the Scottish proceedings, whereby Mr. Cowan withdrew his defence and admitted that no marriage either by consent de presenti or by habit and repute or otherwise took place between the parties. Clause 5 of the minute was in these terms:

> "That both parties agree to undertake in the future not to maintain that a marriage has at any time subsisted between them."

The minute was signed not only by the respondent and Mr. Cowan and their respective counsel, but also by Mr. Square. The latter had been made a party to the proceedings both as curator and administrator of his wife, and also, as expressed in the title of the action, "for his own interest in the premises." It is at least doubtful, however, in view of the wording of cl. 5 whether Mr. Square could be said to have done more than approve this clause, since the wording can hardly be said to bind him as to non-assertion of a marriage to which he was certainly not a party. In accordance with the agreement in the minute the court, on June 29, 1920, dismissed the action, and it is important to observe, on the unchallenged evidence of a member of the Scots Bar, that this formality conferred no judicial force upon the agreement such as could have founded an estoppel by judgment. The dismissal by the court amounted to nothing more than a discontinuance by leave without the determination of any issue. Mr. Cowan also discontinued, in accordance with the agreement between the parties, his petition for divorce in England, and since he was left by the agreement to pay his own expenses in the English courts and £21 towards the respondent's legal expenses as well, the respondent had no reason to complain of the result of her first encounter with the law. At a comparatively small cost to herself she had defeated Mr. Cowan's petition for divorce, had thrust behind her an ugly threat of a possible prosecution for bigamy, and was free to pursue her future with the man of her choice.

Mr. Cowan, for his part, being then satisfied that he was not married to the respondent, contracted a marriage on Jan. 7, 1921, with a widow named Mrs. Ada Youell. It is this marriage of parties now known as Mr. and Mrs. Cowan which forms the subject of the second petition for nullity with which the present litigation is concerned.

The respondent continued for some years to live happily with Mr. Geoffrey Square. But by the year 1929 he seems to have become tired of her companionship and was carrying on a correspondence of an amatory nature with another woman. It is clear from this correspondence that he had at least contemplated divorce from the respondent about this time, and this circumstance again points strongly against knowledge on the part of Mr. Square of the existence of the documents still reposing in the bank, which would have enabled him to obtain the desired release by an easier road than divorce.

In November, 1933, at a time when I gather that the respondent and Mr. Square had become still further estranged, Mr. Square closed his account at the bank and asked for a return of all the effects which the bank were holding on his behalf, with the result that the documents from the Isle of Arran were sent to him on Nov. 13, 1933, and on June 4, 1934, he filed a petition for nullity on the ground of the respondent's Scottish marriage to Mr. Cowan.

On behalf of the respondent it was argued, first, that there was no Scottish marriage, and, secondly, that, if there was a marriage, Mr. Square could not be heard to assert it, because he was estopped by his conduct towards the respondent from asserting a fact which he has already formally denied by pleas both in this court and in the court in Scotland, as also by living with her as her husband for five years in secret, and openly for another fourteen years.

On the question of the Scottish marriage, I can entertain no doubt whatever. I had interesting evidence from two natives of the Isle of Arran which I need not detail further than to say that they established beyond question the residence of the respondent and Mr. Cowan in that island for all periods material to the marriage. I may, perhaps, be forgiven for saying that their appearance and personalities caused me a mild disappointment. For many weeks prior to this case I had been apprised of their coming by applications which foreshadowed a considerable movement of wild clansmen from the far west. I do not say that I had actually been led to expect or would have welcomed the appearance in this court of a shaggy horde of tribesmen such as the wild Macdonalds whom Montrose so often led to victory; but, after so much heralding, two staid Scotsmen came to me as something in the nature of an anti-climax. Their costumes were almost painfully prosaic, their speech was not noticeably Doric, and I judged that they would be more interested in the fluctuations of the tourist market than in any operations which could be performed with claymore and targe.

Upon the material point as regards the respondent's state of mind when she signed the marriage document in Arran, I find on her evidence and that of Cowan, that she intended to sign it knowing that it would constitute a Scottish marriage, and making no mental reservation other than this, that she was a little sorry that she had been induced to do it by Mr. Cowan, and retained a faint hope that, if it were ever expedient or necessary, she might be able to disavow it on the ground that it had not received subsequent publication or approval at the hand of the sheriff. Although she realised that she was locking the door, she had a rather nebulous idea that she was not throwing away the key.

It is a feature of this class of marriage that one is bound to have regard to all the surrounding circumstances, including the conduct of the parties before and after the alleged marriage de præsenti in verbis, to interpret and weigh the validity of the marriage. One of these parties, the respondent, had a Scottish domicil. At the time of the marriage they had resided together in Scotland for upwards of twenty-one days, and were living together as Mr. and Mrs. Cowan, a reputed husband and wife. In the Isle of Arran they passed for and were accepted as husband and wife. During the remainder of their stay in Scotland and for more than two years following in Kenley, they continued to live and were received by their social equals as man and wife. Indeed, it is not until Mr. Square came into their lives that there was any suggestion on the part of the respondent that she did not accept to the full the position which she, a woman of full age and considerable experience, had openly contracted to take in the Isle of Arran.

On the question of mental reservation, even in a sense far wider than any which I could possibly attribute to the respondent, there is a clear and impressive passage from the judgment of LORD STOWELL in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (1) (2 Hag. Con. at p. 107), adopted and emphasised by LORD WATSON in the Dysart Peerage Case (2) (6 App. Cas. at p. 543):

> "Surely it cannot be represented as the law of any civilised country that in such a transaction a man shall use serious words, expressive of serious intentions, and shall yet be afterwards at liberty to aver a private intention, reserved in his own breast, to avoid a contract which was differently understood by the party with whom he contracted."

This, as laid down by LORD WATSON, is the law of Scotland, which I must accept as a fact.

The remaining point concerns the estoppel. When the facts are viewed as a whole A they are far from supporting an estoppel. The estoppel suggested is in pais, and the first step can be stated with some force against Mr. Square. In the English proceedings, commenced by Mr. Cowan in 1920, Mr. Square put in a plea to the effect that the respondent was not married in Scotland, and in the Scottish proceedings, to which he was technically at least a party, he also denied the marriage. He is to-day asserting the reverse, and grounding a suit for nullity upon the very fact which he denied in 1920. B On this aspect of the matter it is urged on his behalf that from 1915 until 1933 he did not know of the documents signed in Arran, but one can have little doubt that, had he known of them, even in 1920, he would equally have denied the Scottish marriage. But I do not think that this knowledge or ignorance of the existence of these documents, or the question whether his conduct towards the respondent is blameworthy or not is in any way decisive of the point of estoppel. C

Counsel for the respondent relied on the well-known classical statement of LORD DENMAN, C.J., as to estoppel in Pickard v. Sears (3) (6 A. & E. at p. 474):

> "But the rule of law is clear that where one by his words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time." D

This passage was cited and approved by BARON PARKE in Freeman v. Cooke (4) (18 L.J.Ex. at p. 119). I have also refreshed my memory of the admirable exposition of the law on the subject contained in the judgment of CHANNELL, J., in Compania Naviera Vasconzada v. Churchill and Sim (5). To my thinking there is no clearer and more compendious statement of the law concerning this rather difficult rule of evidence than E that which recently fell from LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in the case in the Privy Council of Nippon Menkwa Kabushiki Kaisha v. Dawson's Bank, Ltd. LORD RUSSELL says (51 Lloyd's List Rep. at p. 150):

> "Estoppel is not a cause of action. It may . . . assist a plaintiff in enforcing a cause of action by preventing a defendant from denying the existence of some fact essential to establish the cause of action on . . . by preventing a defendant from F asserting the existence of some fact the existence of which would destroy the cause of action. It is a rule of evidence which comes into operation if (a) a statement of the existence of a fact has been made by the defendant or an authorised agent of his to the plaintiff or someone on his behalf; (b) with the intention that the plaintiff should act upon the faith of the statement; and (c) the plaintiff does act upon the faith of the statement." G

There are thus three conditions necessary to bring the rule into play.

Applying this test to the present case it is difficult to see how any one of the conditions can be said to be here fulfilled. It is true that Mr. Square himself made the statement quite categorically that the Scottish marriage had not taken place—but he never made it to the respondent. Whatever his knowledge or belief may have been at any moment, he was certainly never in a position to inform, still less to mislead, the respondent, upon H this subject. Her knowledge of the facts must at all times have been greater than his. The fallacy lies in supposing that because he may have led her to believe that he would always act in a certain way he cannot now be allowed to act differently. A volte face of this character may open a man to grave reproach, possibly even to some kind of action for breach of promise or contract, though I do not pretend to see how such an action could be laid, but there is no attempted change of any statement of fact which I Mr. Square made to the respondent.

If one looks at the second and third conditions laid down by LORD RUSSELL, the matter becomes clearer still. Mr. Square did not make the statement which he made in his plea to the English proceedings or elsewhere with the intention that the respondent should act on the faith of the statement. The respondent was at the same time making the same statement upon her own initiative for a common purpose. If two people with the same sources of information assert the same truth, or agree to assert the same falsehood, at the same time, I cannot see how either can be estopped as against the other from asserting differently at a later time. When, as in this case, the party claiming the estoppel had in fact better information than the other party, the case would seem to be a fortiori.

It has not been suggested that the respondent relied in the least upon what Mr. Square was saying in 1920 about the Scottish marriage. She was relying upon her own knowledge and her own statements about the happenings in Arran, in which she took part and Mr. Square did not, and though she might have acted differently if she had not thought that Mr. Square intended to stand by her, there was and could be no fact asserted by Mr. Square upon the faith of which she acted to her detriment. Although, therefore, it may be right to extend some measure of sympathy to the respondent, and it may be difficult to admire the conduct of Mr. Square, there is no case here of an estoppel. Counsel for the petition was prepared to argue that there could never be an estoppel to condition or decide matrimonial relations. Parties cannot, he averred, be married by estoppel. They are either married or they are not, and a rule of evidence cannot be allowed to interfere with a question of status which concerns not only the parties themselves but also the State. It may be that the question is as important and as difficult as he suggests, but for the reasons which I have given I do not think that it arises here.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Farwell, J.), April 11, 1935]

Intestacy—Sale by personal representatives—Postponement—Intestate domiciled abroad—Postponement impossible under law of domicil—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 23), s. 33 (1).

The deceased, who was domiciled in Ontario, Canada, and died in July, 1934, owned property in Canada, United States of America, France and England. He by his will dealt with the property in all those countries except England. Part of the property in England consisted of a block of shares in a private company. Letters of administration were taken out in England in respect of the English property, and the administrators desired to postpone the sale of the shares. According to the law of Ontario the sale of that portion of the shares to which the deceased's infant children were entitled could not be postponed.

Held: the English administrators were entitled to exercise the power to postpone given to them by s. 33 (1) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, over the assets in England until they got a good discharge for the money in their hands from the persons who were beneficially entitled to it.

Notes. As to administration of the residuary estate on intestacy, see 16 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 390 et seq., and for cases, see 24 DIGEST 564 et seq. For Administration of Estates Act, 1925, see 9 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 718.

Adjourned Summons.

The facts appear in the headnote and the judgment of FARWELL, J.

Greenland for the plaintiff, one of the English administrators.

R. S. B. Best for the deceased's widow.

Geoffrey Cross for the deceased's infant children.

FARWELL, J.—This summons raises a curious question which seems at present to A be free from authority as to the powers of administrators in this country over property in England of persons who died domiciled abroad.

The deceased was possessed of property in various parts of the world, and was admittedly domiciled in Ontario, Canada. He left wills dealing with his property abroad, but he omitted to make a will dealing with his English estate, and, accordingly, letters of administration have been granted to the plaintiff and the first defendant in B this country. Their duty is to administer the estate according to the law of this country; but in distributing the estate among the beneficiaries the rights of the parties must be governed by the law of the domicil. In the present case the testator's property in this country consisted, among other things, of a considerable holding of shares in a private company. The shares are by no means readily saleable and the legal personal representatives are anxious, if they can properly do so, to postpone the sale of the shares for C the present. The persons entitled to the testator's property in this country, according to the law of Ontario, are the widow, who is entitled to one-third, and the children, all of whom are infants. According to the law of the domicil it would not be possible for the administrators in Ontario to retain these shares on behalf of the infants. They would be bound, according to that law, to sell them at once. If, therefore, having once paid all the debts and other administration expenses the administrators in this country D have ceased to have any administrative duties beyond distributing the property among the persons entitled according to the law of Ontario, it must follow that the rights of those parties must be regulated by the law of the domicil, in which case these shares must be sold.

The question, therefore, is at what point the administrators cease to administer the estate in this country and become trustees for the purpose of distributing the estate E among the persons interested. So long as they are performing the duties of administrators their powers and rights are to be found in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. If, on the other hand, their only duty is to distribute the estate among the persons entitled, according to the law of the domicil, then the powers which are given to them as administrators under the Act can no longer avail. Part III of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, consisting of ss. 32 to 44, is headed: "Administration of assets," and F
Part IV of the Act is headed "Distribution of residuary estate." So that it would look as though the intention of the legislature was to include in Part III, all those duties which fall to an administrator, and in Part IV to deal with the rights of the parties as to distribution of the assets after the administration has been completed. In Part III, which is the part which deals with the administration of assets, s. 33 (1) provides:

G

> "On the death of a person intestate as to any real or personal estate, such estate shall be held by his personal representatives—(a) as to the real estate upon trust to sell the same; and (b) as to the personal estate upon trust to call in sell and convert into money such part thereof as may not consist of money, with power to postpone such sale and conversion for such a period as the personal representatives, without being liable to account, may think proper, and so that any reversionary interest be not sold until it falls into possession. . . ." H

Subsection (2) provides:

> "Out of the net money to arise from the sale and conversion of such real and personal estate (after payment of costs), and out of the ready money of the deceased (so far as not disposed of by his will, if any), the personal representative shall pay all such funeral, testamentary and administration expenses, debts and other liabilities I > as are properly payable thereout. . . ."

By sub-s. (3):

> "During the minority of any beneficiary or the subsistence of any life interest and pending the distribution of the whole or any part of the estate of the deceased, the personal representatives may invest the residue of the said money, or so much thereof as may not have been distributed, in any investments for the time being authorised by statute for the investment of trust money, with power, at the dis> cretion of the personal representatives, to change such investments for others of a like nature."

By sub-s. (4):

> "The residue of the said money and any investments for the time being representing the same, including (but without prejudice to the trust for sale) any part of the estate of the deceased which may be retained unsold and is not required for the administration purposes aforesaid, is in this Act referred to as 'the residuary estate of the intestate.'"

The other sections in that part of the Act deal with other matters in connection with the administration of the estate. Section 42 (1) provides:

> "Where an infant is absolutely entitled under the will or on the intestacy of a person dying before or after the commencement of this Act (in this subsection called 'the deceased') to a devise or legacy or to the residue of the estate of the deceased, or any share therein, and such devise, legacy, residue or share is not under the will, if any, of the deceased, devised or bequeathed to trustees for the infant, the personal representatives of the deceased may appoint a trust corporation or two or more individuals not exceeding four (whether or not including the personal representatives or one or more of the personal representatives), to be the trustee or trustees of such devise, legacy, residue or share for the infant, and to be trustees of any land devised. . . ."

It is noticeable that that section appears to deal with a case of an infant becoming absolutely entitled on an intestacy of a person dying after the Act of 1925. If that section deals only with persons domiciled in this country, it seems to be a curious provision, because under the Act it is no longer possible for an infant to become absolutely entitled on the intestacy of a person domiciled in this country, since the Act itself makes an infant's interest contingent upon his attaining twenty-one or marrying. Therefore, it looks as though this section is contemplating an intestacy in the case of a person dying domiciled abroad. Whether that be so or not, and I do not propose to found my judgment on that proposition, it appears to me that this is a matter of administration and that the administrators are entitled to exercise the power of postponement which is given them by the Act. They have in their hands money which, no doubt, is the property of the infants, but in respect of which they can get no receipt from the infants because they are still infants. I think that it would be possible for them under s. 42 to appoint a trustee for the infants, and that they could do so as administrators. Equally, in my judgment, it is open to them as administrators to exercise the powers to postpone the sale which they are given by s. 33 (1), and until they can distribute the estate by handing over the proceeds or the property to persons who can give them a good receipt for it they are trustees, but trustees holding the property in their character as administrators and having, therefore, the powers which are given to administrators under s. 33 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. The power to postpone given by the Act is a power given to administrators and, in my judgment, it is exercisable over the assets which are in this country until the administrators can get a good discharge for the money in their hands from the persons who are beneficially entitled to it. I propose to make a declaration to that effect.

Declaration accordingly.

A holding company was formed to acquire ninety per cent. of the capital of six existing electricity supply companies, including the W. Co., and of any other similar company. The scheme of acquisition provided inter alia that "the present companies will continue in existence to carry on business as before subject to the control of the board of the new company which would consist wholly or chiefly of the directors drawn from the boards of the existing companies."

£1,125 of the stock of the W. Co. was comprised in a settlement, the trustees of which took out a summons to determine whether the proposed scheme was a "scheme or arrangement . . . for the amalgamation of the W. Co. with another company" in which the trustees were empowered to concur by s. 10 (3) (c) of the Trustee Act, 1925.

Held: the proposed scheme was not such an amalgamation because it connoted the continued identity of each separate company and not the blending together of the six companies into one, and, therefore, the trustees had no power to concur therein under s. 10 (3) (c).

Summons taken out by the Royal Exchange Assurance, as trustees of a settlement B made by the late Mr. Henry Claude Walker, dated March 8, 1920, to which summons a number of beneficiaries were made respondents.

It raised the question whether a proposed scheme for the transfer to a holding company, the London Associated Electricity Undertakings, Ltd., of the issued capital of, among other electricity companies, the Westminster Electric Supply Corporation, Ltd., was or was not an amalgamation within the meaning of s. 10 (3) (c) of the Trustee C Act, 1925, and whether the plaintiffs, as trustees, had power to concur in the scheme and exchange stock of the Westminster company for shares in the holding company. The trustees had considered the scheme and approved it generally in the interests of the beneficiaries.

Section 10 (3) of the Trustee Act, 1925, provides as follows:

> "Where any securities of a company are subject to a trust, the trustees may D concur in any scheme or arrangement—(a) for the reconstruction of the company; (b) for the sale of all or any part of the property and undertaking of the company to another company; (c) for the amalgamation of the company with another company; (d) for the release, modification, or variation of any rights, privileges, or liabilities attached to the securities or any of them; in like manner as if they were entitled to such securities beneficially, with power to accept any securities of any E denomination or description of the reconstructed or purchasing or new company in lieu of or in exchange for all or any of the first-mentioned securities. . . ."

Vaisey, K.C., and W. T. Elverston for the trustees.

Evershed, K.C., and N. K. Hutton for beneficiaries sui juris, contended that the scheme was an "amalgamation" into which the trustees could enter.

F Harman, K.C., and Gerald Upjohn for beneficiaries who were infants, or married women restrained from anticipation, argued the contrary.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 5.—EVE, J. The plaintiffs are the trustees of a settlement executed by the late Henry Claude Walker on March 8, 1920. The defendants are all the beneficiaries except two who are of full age and resident in Australia. Included in the trust premises G is a sum of £1,125 ordinary stock of the Westminster Electric Supply Corporation, Ltd. A scheme is on foot for the acquisition by a holding company known as London Associated Electricity Undertakings, Ltd., of the preference and ordinary stock and share capital of the Westminster and five other similar companies. On Feb. 8, 1935, the holding company sent to the respective boards of the six companies a detailed statement of the scheme and of the terms on which they were prepared to acquire on or before H April 6, 1935, the £550,000 4½ per cent. cumulative preference stock and the £1,450,000 ordinary stock of the Westminster company. They offered to each ordinary stockholder of the Westminster company one ordinary share of £1 fully paid in exchange for each £1 of ordinary stock held by him in the Westminster company.

In substance, the inducement held out to the shareholders of the Westminster and other five companies for accepting the offer was that the immediate result of acceptance I would be to emancipate them from their position as contributories in a statutory company restricted and confined to and within its statutory powers, and would make them shareholders in a public company formed with objects and endowed by its memorandum of association with powers to embark in enterprises altogether outside the powers of the existing company, but calculated to produce a more satisfactory return in the way of profits on the capital invested.

I shall have to refer by and by to some of the terms of the scheme, but before examining them further it would be more convenient to explain the nature of these proceedings. By sub-s. (3) of s. 10 of the Trustee Act, 1925, it is provided that

> "where any securities of a company are subject to a trust the trustees may concur in any scheme or arrangement: (a) for the reconstruction of the company; (b) for the sale of all or any part of the property and undertaking of the company to another company; (c) for the amalgamation of the company with another company." A

The trustees, finding that the adult beneficiaries were not unanimous on the question whether the offer ought to be accepted or not, and being in doubt themselves whether B the scheme is really one for the amalgamation of the Westminster company with the other five companies within the section referred to, this summons has been issued for the purpose of having it determined by the court whether the scheme is one for amalgamation within the section, and whether the trustees have power under such section to concur in the scheme; and to accept, in exchange for the ordinary shares or stock in the Westminster company, and retain as an authorised investment under the settlement, C such ordinary shares of the holding company as is provided by the scheme.

The question, therefore, in issue is whether the scheme is or is not an amalgamation within the Trustee Act, 1925.

Before embarking on an examination of the scheme itself, reference to the memorandum of association of the holding company shows that it was incorporated on Feb. 2 last, with a nominal capital of £300 and with the object of acquiring not less than D ninety per cent. of the issued share capital of each of the six companies and of any other company, being an authorised undertaker for the supply of electricity within the county of London or of any adjoining or neighbouring county, for such consideration and on such terms and conditions, whether in fully-paid shares or otherwise, as the holding company shall think fit; and of carrying on in all its branches the trade or business of producing, storing, distributing, and supplying electrical energy for all purposes, and E of promoting, supporting, or opposing any Bill or Bills in Parliament for or with a view to improving or dealing with the distribution or supplying of electrical energy in the county of London and elsewhere, and of erecting and maintaining buildings of all descriptions and of promoting companies, lending money for undertaking, carrying on and executing all kinds of financial, commercial, trading, and other operations, together with many other objects not to be found as a general rule in the memoranda of com- F panies whose ordinary shares are regarded as suitable for the investment of trust funds.

The scheme is dated Jan. 30, 1935, and is endorsed as "Holding Company's scheme of merger." So far as I have hitherto referred to it I cannot help thinking that there is little in its conception which accords with the primary meaning attached to the word "amalgamation." The acquisition by the London company of a sufficient number of shares in each of the six companies to give the purchasing company the control of each G company does not involve the conclusion of any bargain by the six companies to bring into a combination their several undertakings and assets or to sink the individuality of each company in a joint adventure.

Nor does the scheme itself disclose anything carrying the matter much further. It provides in para. 2 for the formation of the holding company with the object of acquiring the preference and ordinary capitals of the six companies, subject to its being able to H obtain relief from stamp duty under s. 55 of the Finance Act, 1927, by purchasing ninety per cent. of the ordinary capital of each of the six companies, the whole consideration consisting of fully-paid shares or stock of the holding company. The scheme then sets out particulars of the preference capital of each of the companies and of the terms on which this was to be dealt with. I can pass this over because the applicants are only concerned with the scheme so far as it affects the ordinary stock of the Westminster I company. Para. 6 deals with the price offered for the ordinary capital of each company, and concludes with a statement that the price will be one unit of the holding company's ordinary stock fully paid for each existing ordinary share or stock unit of £1, and that for the purposes of the scheme regard has been had to the true values of the ordinary shares of the companies without regard to the relative market quotations. I do not think I need read any of the paragraphs in full until I come to No. 11. That paragraph is in these terms:

> "The present companies will continue in existence and carry on business as before > subject to the control of the board of the new company, which will, in the first place, consist wholly or chiefly of directors drawn from the boards of the existing companies. Under this unified control efficiency should be improved and economies effected in various directions, e.g., by bulk buying of materials, by centralising office administration, and selling or letting surplus premises."

Paragraph 12 provides for the compensation of directors for whose services there is no further use, and then follows:

> "(13) The new company will not be subject to control by the Electricity Commissioners and will be able to raise capital in any form it may think fit. No doubt, however, the commissioners will require to be satisfied regarding the rate of interest charged by the new company to the constituent companies in respect of any loans made to them out of capital raised by the new company. If desired, the new company can undertake activities other than the business of selling current and apply any profits it makes without restriction. For example, it can take over the business of selling apparatus to consumers. (14) The income of the new company will consist of dividends received on the shares held in the existing companies and any profit it may make from selling apparatus and from other activities. The expenses to be met out of such income will consist of office rent, secretarial and other salaries, directors' fees, and other administrative expenses in so far as they are not recovered by charges made against the constituent companies for managerial and other services. (15) After the scheme has been put into operation the businesses of the constituent companies will be conducted on lines likely to produce the best results for the undertakings as a whole. The effect may be that revenue will be diverted from one company to another, and the position may arise at some future date that one company has a separate profit over the amount required to meet its dividend, while another company has insufficient profits. If, in course of time, it appears that this is likely to happen, the question of an arrangement for the pooling of profits can be considered. There seems to be nothing in the London Electricity (No. 2) Act, 1925, which definitely prohibits such an arrangement, but it would be advisable to obtain the approval of the Electricity Commissioners before bringing it into operation."

This paragraph appears to me to be the only one in which anything like an amalgamation is adumbrated, but it is only a suggestion of something that may be done in the future and has no present application.

That is, I think, all I need read; the concluding paragraph deals with a statutory authority to amalgamate any two or more of the undertakings of any of the companies, subject to the approval of the Electricity Commissioners, but it is not suggested that this holding company's scheme of merger constitutes such an amalgamation, and I come back to the question whether this scheme is an amalgamation within the meaning of the Trustee Act. Speaking for myself, I can see nothing in it which connotes such a blending together in whole or in part of two or more separate undertakings as to amalgamate or fuse them into one. However, it has been held in these Courts (in Re South African Supply and Cold Storage Co. (1)) that there is no very precise meaning to be given to the words "amalgamate" or "amalgamation," that neither word has any definite legal meaning, that they are commercial and not legal terms, and that even as commercial terms they have no exact definite meaning. So be it, but in the very case in which these conclusions were authoritatively laid down the learned judge went on to express an opinion that an amalgamation must involve certain characteristics. There is no authority to which I have been referred wherein any doubt has been cast on the judgment pronounced by BUCKLEY, J., in Re South African Supply and Cold Storage Co. (1), and I think I am entitled to assume that the legislature, when conferring this important power on trustees to concur in a scheme for the amalgamation of one company with another, must have contemplated an amalgamation embodying the characteristics enumerated by BUCKLEY, J. The present scheme does not, in my opinion, involve those elements which he regarded as essential for an amalgamation. BUCKLEY, J., said (91 L.T. at p. 452):

> "Now what is an amalgamation? An amalgamation involves, I think, a different idea. There you must have the rolling, somehow or other, of two concerns into one. You must weld two things together and arrive at an amalgam—a blending of two undertakings. It does not necessarily follow that the whole of the two undertakings should pass—substantially they would pass—nor need all the corporators be parties, although substantially all must be parties. The difference between reconstruction and amalgamation is that in the latter is involved the blending of two concerns one with the other, and not merely the continuance of one concern."

In my opinion, I ought to answer the question raised in this summons in the negative, and I so do. Costs will be paid out of the capital of the estate.

The beneficiaries sui juris appealed.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—This case raises an interesting point, and one in which we must take a little trouble to explain the reasons why this court is in agreement with EVE, J.

I am taking some of the facts from his judgment, where he states them very accurately: [His lordship then read the first two paragraphs of the judgment of EVE, J., supra.]

I now turn from that statement to take some excerpts from the scheme, which is called "Holding company scheme of merger." The scheme has been prepared, it said,

> "in accordance with instructions received from the Central London Electricity Distribution Committee, 1934, Ltd. Only the above-named six companies are concerned in the first instance, but the scheme has been drafted in such a way as to facilitate the inclusion of other companies later on. Particulars of the debenture and share capitals of the six companies are given in a statement attached hereto. (2) A new company will be formed to acquire the preference and ordinary capitals of the companies, the object of acquiring the preference capitals being to obtain the relief from stamp duty granted, subject to certain conditions, by s. 55 of the Finance Act, 1927, in a case where not less than ninety per cent. of the total issued share capital of an existing company is purchased. The issued ordinary capital of the Chelsea company represents more than ninety per cent. of its total issued share capital, so that in the case of that company it is not absolutely necessary for the new company to acquire the preference capital, but for the sake of uniformity it is suggested that it shall do so. From inquiries made by Messrs. Slaughter and May at Somerset House it has been ascertained that in order to obtain relief from stamp duty it will be necessary for the new company to acquire the ordinary capital of the city undertaking of the Charing Cross company as well as that of the west end undertakings, notwithstanding the fact that the latter own the city undertaking's ordinary capital through the medium of the Suppliers' Construction Co., Ltd. [now come important statements:] It will be unnecessary for the new company to acquire any of the debenture capitals. (3) The whole of the consideration payable by the new company will consist of its own stocks, issued as fully paid, thus complying with the condition in s. 55 of the Finance Act, 1927, that in order to obtain relief from stamp duty not less than ninety per cent. of the consideration must consist of shares or stock of the transferee company."

Then it sets out the exact position of the companies and of their stocks, and it says this in para. 11:

> "The present companies will continue in existence and carry on business as before subject to the control of the board of the new company which will in the first place consist wholly or chiefly of directors drawn from the boards of the existing companies. Under this unified control, efficiency should be improved and economies effected in various directions, e.g., by bulk buying of materials, by centralising office administration and selling or letting surplus premises."

I do not think I need read more of the scheme.

That being the offer that is made to the members of these several companies, a summons was taken out, asking that it may be determined

A

> "whether the proposed scheme for the transfer to London Associated Electricity Undertakings, Ltd., of the issued capital of" inter alia Westminster Electric Supply Corporation, Ltd., in which the trustees are holders of shares

> "is a scheme for the amalgamation of the companies parties thereto within the meaning of s. 10 (3) of the Trustee Act, 1925, and whether, accordingly, the plaintiffs as such trustees as aforesaid have power under such section to concur in the said scheme and to accept in lieu of or in exchange for the ordinary stock of the said Westminster Electric Supply Corporation, Ltd., now held by them as such trustees as aforesaid and retain as an authorised investment under the said indenture of settlement such ordinary shares or ordinary stock of the said London Associated Electricity Undertakings, Ltd., as provided by the said scheme."

When the matter came before EVE, J., on that summons, he came to the conclusion that the scheme was not an amalgamation within the Trustee Act. He held this:

> "The acquisition by the London company of a sufficient number of shares in each of the six companies to give the purchasing company the control of each company, does not involve the conclusion of any bargain by the six companies to bring into a combination their several undertakings and assets or to sink the individuality of each company in a joint adventure."

D

It will be observed that the purpose, as indicated in the scheme, is the hoped-for unified control which would promote efficiency in various directions, but the identity of each company is maintained, and the debenture capital of each company will remain the loan to each individual company and the responsibility of each individual company. In effect, the new holding company will be a supplying company, but the old companies will have to exercise the powers which are given to them under the statutes, and they will still remain separate entities.

E

That being so, I turn to look at s. 10 (3), which is the section we have to construe:

> "Where any securities of a company are subject to a trust, the trustees may concur in any scheme or arrangement: (a) for the reconstruction of the company; (b) for the sale of all or any part of the property and undertaking of the company to another company; (c) for the amalgamation of the company with another company; (d) for the release, modification, or variation of any rights, privileges or liabilities attached to the securities or any of them; in like manner as if they were entitled to such securities beneficially, with power to accept any securities of any denomination or description of the reconstructed or purchasing or new company in lieu of or in exchange for all or any of the first-mentioned securities."

G

Examining that section itself, it would seem that there are four possibilities contemplated, the reconstruction of a company, the sale of the property or undertaking of a company to another company, what is called the amalgamation, not of undertakings, but in contrast with the previous sub-cl. (b), it is the amalgamation of the company with another company; then (d) is for the release, modification, or variation of any rights, privileges and liabilities, which would include voting power and the like. The contemplated cases in which these changes occur, and in respect of which the trustees are empowered to concur and to accept new securities in place of the old, are three: they may accept any securities of any denomination of the "reconstructed" company (that refers to (a)), or "purchasing" (that refers to (b)), "or new company in lieu of or in exchange for all or any of the first-mentioned securities"; the "new" company must be appropriated to (c), and, so far as it does, it would seem that what was contemplated was an amalgamation of the company with another company by means of a new company. I do not want to stress it or to place too much emphasis upon those words, but one certainly must say this, that there is no indication of what is meant by an amalgamation of the company with another company, except by the method of a new company, although I do not want to say that all amalgamations within the section can only be carried out by the means of a new company. One turns, however, to consider what is the meaning of the word "amalgamation." It has been explained by BUCKLEY, J., in Re South African Supply and Cold Storage Co. (1) ([1904] A 2 Ch. 287), that the word "amalgamation" has not any definite legal meaning, and that statement has been reinforced in a number of other authorities both before and since. I also think that it is right to bear in mind what was said in Wall v. London and Northern Assets Corporation (2), namely, that when you are using a word like "amalgamation," you must look at the context in which it is used in order to ascertain its meaning. CHITTY, L.J., in that case ([1898] 2 Ch. at p. 481), says : B

> "I agree that the term has no fixed meaning in point of law. You have to see how the term is used in the particular document that has to be construed."

For my own part, I think it would be impossible to give an exact or definitive interpretation to the meaning of the word "amalgamation." I think one will be able to identify an amalgamation when one sees it, but I hesitate to offer any suggestions of finality as C to its interpretation. I think the better course is to examine each case as it comes, and to determine whether upon the facts of that particular case there is or is not what may pass for and be properly called an amalgamation. It is only thus that one will elucidate what is the meaning of and what are the limits of "amalgamation."

I turn, therefore, to consider the present proposal. It is a proposal which, from the passage I have read from the scheme and the facts, connotes the continued identity D of each separate company, with its board of directors more or less identified with the board of the new company, but not necessarily in every particular the same. Each company still carries its deadweight of debt in the form of its debentures. It is not proposed to dissolve any of the companies. The attraction is that the shareholders of the existing companies may find that in the new company they have got wider facilities and a possibility of more profitable adventures or undertakings or business. E Can one call that an amalgamation? The observations that are made by BUCKLEY, J., in Re South African Supply and Cold Storage Co., Wild v. The Company (1) are, of course, matters to which one would pay great attention, but can you say that either of these companies is merged in the new one, that its identity has been lost, and that there is a unification of the one company with another? The facts seem to absolutely contradict any such statement; and while one may give full weight to the prospect of unified F control and improved efficiency by means of that unified control, still there is nothing like an amalgam made of the one company with the other. Further, I would point out once more, for the purposes of emphasis, that in this sub-cl. (c) we are considering the amalgamation of a company with another company, and not considering what is by contradistinction referred to in sub-cl. (b), the unification or the sale of the property or undertaking by one company to another. There is a definite indication in those G clauses that the undertaking and property are considered apart from the company; and when one comes to look at it, one is talking of the amalgamation of company with company, and not the amalgamation of undertaking with undertaking, or property with property.

For these reasons it appears to me, as EVE, J., put it, it > "does not involve the conclusion of any bargain by the six companies to bring into H a combination their several undertakings and assets or to sink the individuality of each company in a joint adventure."

It has been suggested that before you can find amalgamation you must find that provision is made for the winding-up of the transferring company as no longer required to be maintained. I do not wish to accept that test. In some cases I do not think that may be necessary. I do not think it will be a good touchstone to apply, but upon the facts I of the present case it appears to me that there is no amalgamation, for the reasons which I have given, and therefore that EVE, J., determined the question put to him rightly, and the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that EVE, J., arrived at a correct conclusion. In my opinion the scheme which we have to consider in this case cannot properly be described as a scheme of amalgamation. It does not result, in my opinion, either in an amalgamation of the six corporations, or result in an amalgamation of the six undertakings. I agree with what was said by Buckley, J., in Re South African Supply and Cold Storage Co., Wild v. The Company. He said ([1904] 2 Ch. at p. 287):

> "Now what is an amalgamation? An amalgamation involves, I think, a different idea. There you must have the rolling, somehow or other, of two concerns into one. You must weld two things together and arrive at an amalgam—a blending of two undertakings."

It must not be thought from that statement of Buckley, J., that he in any way thought that an amalgamation of two undertakings was the same as an amalgamation of two companies. I think he was only intending to refer to the fact that, as the result of an amalgamation proper of two companies, there must be an amalgamation of the two undertakings. It is quite obvious you can have an amalgamation of two undertakings, that is to say, the undertakings of two companies without there being an amalgamation of the two companies. If one company sells its undertaking to another for cash, and the new purchasing company thenceforward carries on its own undertaking and the purchased undertaking as one, without question there has been an amalgamation of the two undertakings. There has not been in that case an amalgamation of the two companies. I find some definition, if it be a definition, of "amalgamation" in Buckley on Companies (11th Edn.), p. 487. It is a definition which, so far as it is a definition, I should like to adopt as my own; it is there stated as follows:

> "The word 'amalgamation' has no definite legal meaning. It contemplates a state of things under which two companies are so joined as to form a third entity, or one company is absorbed into and blended with another company."

Two companies can amalgamate, as one knows, in either of two ways: Company A can sell its business and undertaking to company B in consideration of shares in company B. Company A then goes into liquidation and distributes the shares in company B amongst its shareholders, and the result of it all is that, whereas there were previously two corporations, A and B, corporation A has now become merged in B. There is only one corporation carrying on one undertaking with one set of shareholders. Another way in which it is frequently done is that a third company, a new company, is formed, company C, and both the companies A and B sell their undertakings to company C in consideration of shares in undertaking C. The shares in A and B are then distributed amongst the shareholders by means of liquidation, and companies A and B cease to exist. As the result of the transaction there is now one corporation C in place of the former corporations A and B. There is one set of shareholders instead of two sets of shareholders, one undertaking instead of two undertakings.

I need not go through the scheme in the present case. It is quite obvious from what Lord Hanworth, M.R., has said that as the result of that scheme there will not in future be one corporation instead of six corporations; there will not be one undertaking instead of six undertakings; there will not be one set of shareholders instead of six sets of shareholders, because each company will continue to carry on its business in its own name, and the shareholders in the six companies will now be different indeed from the shareholders previously existing, but they will be shareholders of six separate companies. There will not be a blending together of all the shareholders in the six companies.

It was said by counsel for the beneficiaries sui juris, and I appreciate the force of his argument, that in the two methods, to which I have referred, of amalgamating two companies, there is a sale, that is to say, one company sells its undertaking, and he says if those be the only two forms of amalgamation I have described, it would be unnecessary for the legislature to refer, in this sub-s. (3) of s. 10, to an amalgamation of the company with another company, in addition to referring to the sale of all or any part of the property and undertaking of the company to another company. There appear to me to be two answers to that. The first is this, that the company may become amalgamated with another company, not by means of a sale, but by means of a purchase. Company A may purchase the assets of company B and the undertaking of company B in consideration of shares in company A, and that would not be covered by the subsection relating to the sale of all or any part of the property and undertaking of the company to another company. It is true that in that case the trustee of shares in company A would not be called upon to take up anything in exchange, any new shares or additional shares, for the shares he already held in company A; but that does not show that such an amalgamation is not within the contemplation of the legislature, because a trustee is given express power in this subsection to concur, amongst other things, in the release, modification, or variation of any rights, privileges or liabilities attached to the securities, or any of them, and his concurrence in that would not result in any new shares or securities being acquired. The truth of the matter is that the power given to the trustees to concur includes a power of concurring by means of an exercise of the trustees' voting power. Therefore, if a scheme be put forward for the amalgamation of a company, in which a trustee holds shares, with another company, to be carried out by means of a purchase of the company in which the trustee holds shares, the trustee may concur under the powers conferred upon him by this section by voting in favour of the scheme put forward.

I think there is this further to be observed, that an amalgamation may be carried out by means of a purchase by one company of all the shares in another company with which it is proposed to amalgamate. The purchase of the shares does not, by itself, result in an amalgamation. It may be a step towards amalgamation, and amalgamation would, in such a case, eventually be brought about by the first company being put into liquidation by the company which has bought all its shares, or the large majority of its shares, and by the acquisition by the purchasing company of the undertaking of the first company. In that event there would be an amalgamation of the two companies; there would be an amalgamation of the two undertakings. There would then be one set of shareholders and not two sets. I think that that consideration is the answer also to the argument which was based upon the Finance Act of 1927. It is to be observed that s. 55 (1) begins as follows, and is governed by these words:

> "If in connection with a scheme for the reconstruction of any company or companies or the amalgamation of any companies it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioners of inland revenue that there exist the following conditions, that is to say . . . (b) that the company (in this section referred to as 'the transferee company') is to be registered or has been incorporated or has increased its capital with a view to the acquisition either of the undertaking of, or of not less than ninety per cent. of the issued share capital of, any particular existing company";

then, if certain other conditions are shown, the relief in the matter of stamp duty is provided. If an acquisition by one company of all the shares in another company was equivalent to an amalgamation in the view of the legislature, the legislature certainly would not have said in this section:

> "If in connection with a scheme for the . . . amalgamation of any companies it is shown";

it would have contented itself, I should have thought, with saying: "If it is shown," but it continues in the way the section does continue.

For these reasons, it seems to me that here one cannot say that there has been an amalgamation. It seems to me that the scheme here lacks the really essential qualities of amalgamation, the essential quality being that which I have mentioned, of there being one corporation in the future instead of the six corporations, one undertaking instead of the six undertakings, one body of shareholders instead of the six bodies of shareholders, and I agree that this appeal fails.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is the apparently simple question, at first sight, as to the true construction of s. 10 (3) (c) of the Trustee Act, 1925. The Act is now some ten years old, which one is sometimes tempted to forget, and there have been quite a number of statutes passed which are said to show that the legislature had taken a rather wide view of the meaning of the words in the subsection to which I have referred, namely, the words "for the amalgamation of the company with another company." Strictly speaking, of course, you cannot construe that section by reference to anything in the Finance Act of 1927, or the Companies Act of 1929, but still, I think, one may fairly look to see how the legislature does use the word "amalgamation," even in a later Act than the Trustee Act of 1925.

Primâ facie I think it must be accepted, at any rate, it is, in my opinion, correct to say, that in the year 1925 "amalgamation" had, generally speaking, the meaning which is to be found in Buckley on Companies (11th Edn.), p. 487. I accept, like my brother Romer, the view that the word "amalgamation" has no definite legal meaning; and I also accept the view that it contemplates a state of things under which two companies are so joined as to form a third entity, or one company is absorbed into and blended with another company. If that be right, the question here would be whether there is, in this case, a scheme or arrangement for the amalgamation of the company, in which the trustees have their interests with another company or companies; and you ask yourself whether, accepting the statement which I have read, there is anything to show that two companies are so joined as to form a third entity, or one company is absorbed into and blended with another. The answer is clearly that there is not.

I need not repeat the facts stated by Lord Hanworth, M.R.; it is sufficient to summarise the position by observing that the undertakings of the five companies are to be continued. Their liabilities will still remain the liabilities of the separate undertakings, and the debenture holders' position in the various companies is not to be affected. There will continue to be separate boards of directors and, I think, there is really no possibility of saying, in accurate language, that there is a blending of any undertakings at all. What may be described as amalgamated or blending are the interests of the shareholders in the various concerns; in other words, I think, without gross inaccuracy, this might be described as an amalgamation quoad, the interests of the shareholders. However, the section we are dealing with speaks of a scheme for the amalgamation of the company with another company. On the view I take as to the meaning of the word, there is nothing of that kind; but I agree with the earnest argument that has been addressed to us on behalf of the beneficiaries sui juris, that it might be that there could be found something in the general frame, or the context, of s. 10 (3) of the Trustee Act which might lead the court to give to the word in sub-s. (3) (c) a popular and, as I think, a somewhat inaccurate meaning.

The first point and, perhaps, I may say, the main point, upon which counsel urges us to take that course, is founded upon the fact that the trustees are being authorised under the subsection to concur in a scheme or arrangement (a) for the reconstruction of the company; (b) for the sale of all or any part of the property and undertaking of the company to another company; and (c), the material subsection, "for the amalgamation of the company with another company." He says that if you read that as combined with the words that the trustees are to have power > "to accept any securities of any denomination or description of the reconstructed or purchasing or new company in lieu of or in exchange for all or any of the first-mentioned securities," you will find that "amalgamation" must have the more general meaning which he says should be attributed to it. To my mind, there are two answers to that argument. The first is, that I am not sure that (b) and (c) in the subsection are necessarily exclusive. I think it is quite sufficient to explain (c) to say that the draftsman or, to put it in other words, the legislature, may have thought that there were possibly amalgamations such as the section refers to, which would not be properly described as within sub-cl. (b), which refers to the sale of all or any part of the property and undertaking of the company to another company. I would observe, though I do not lay much stress upon it, that there might be an amalgamation under s. 154 of the Companies Act, 1929, which would not involve, I think, such a sale as I have mentioned, and yet there would be, by the direction of the court, a dissolution possible without winding up of the transferor company, and provisions for the appropriation by the transferee company of shares and other like interests which are to be allotted or appropriated to or for any person. Apart from that, there are the reasons which my brother Romer has given, and I would add one more: that there might be an amalgamation properly so-called by private Act of Parliament.

Accordingly, I do not myself attribute very much weight to the contention that you will find that the phrase "amalgamation of the company with another company" must necessarily involve the case where shares are to be acquired in the other company by the shareholders in the company which is primarily concerned. I think we have to answer this question: Can an acquisition of shares by a holding company properly be described as an amalgamation of the company whose shares, or a controlling interest therein, are being acquired by the holding company? For my part, I must answer that in the negative. It is material to remember that there is no warrant for limiting sub-cl. (c) to a case where there is to be an acquisition of not less than ninety per cent. of the share capital of the company in which the securities are subject to the trust. Apparently, the mere acquiring of a controlling interest would have to be regarded, according to the view of the beneficiaries sui juris, as resulting in an amalgamation. For my part, I do not believe there is any warrant for so wide an extension of the sentence.

In s. 55 of the Finance Act of 1927, a section not too easy to construe and which has been the subject of three decisions—Murex, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (3); Oswald Tillotson, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (4); Brotex Cellulose Fibres, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (5)—language is used which certainly points to the fact that the legislature has used the word "amalgamation" as though it included in that case a scheme for the acquisition of not less than ninety per cent. of the shares to be acquired by the transferee company in the existing company. The section, in other words, upon its true construction, explains quite clearly, or with reasonable clearness, what in the statement of conditions (a), (b) and (c) in sub-s. (1) the legislature is dealing with, and what conditions have to be observed and, I may add, strictly observed, in order that there may be the exemption from stamp duty with which the section is dealing. The argument on behalf of the appellants is, at any rate, double edged, for it would have been quite easy, in s. 10 of the Trustee Act, 1925, to add to the phrase "for the amalgamation of the company with another company" some such words as are to be found in s. 55 (1) (c), sub-cl. (2), of the Finance Act, 1927. They are not to be found there.

In the argument for the appellants I do not think it was suggested that the acquisition of shares by a holding company in a single other company can properly be described as an amalgamation of that company with a holding company. What was said was, that if there are a number of subsidiary companies whose shares are being acquired by a holding company, you can then say that each subsidiary is amalgamated with each other subsidiary; but it is to be noted that, although the singular would include the plural, you have to make the subsection we are considering, namely, a scheme "for the amalgamation of the company with another company," apply if there is only a single company which is being amalgamated with the other company. It seems to me impossible to say, if the whole transaction consists of certain shares being acquired by a holding company, the controlling interest, I would assume, being acquired by a holding company in the company where the securities are subject to trust, it can be said that that alone involves an amalgamation.

Accordingly, in my opinion, for the reasons given by my brethren and by EVE, J., it is not possible here to say that the scheme with which we are dealing is one for the amalgamation of the company with another company, and the appeal must fail.

Appeal dismissed.

Gaming—Lottery—Possession of tickets for sale or distribution—Tickets bought on behalf of syndicate—Tickets held by one member as custodian—No sub-sale among members—Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934 (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 58), s. 22 (1) (b).

The appellant received from the purchaser a block of forty-eight tickets in a lottery on behalf of a syndicate comprising twenty-one persons, including the appellant. He collected from each member 2s. a week and himself set aside a similar amount weekly, and subsequently paid over the money collected by him to the purchaser of the tickets. The whole of the forty-eight tickets were held by the syndicate on behalf of all the members, each member holding a twenty-first part in the whole of the tickets. No individual member was entitled to any particular ticket or tickets, and any prize won by means of any of the tickets would have been divided equally between the members of the syndicate. The appellant was convicted under s. 22 (1) (b) of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, of having the tickets in his possession for the purpose of sale or distribution.

Held: the members of the syndicate were co-partners in the purchase of the tickets; it was never in their contemplation that there should be a sub-sale of the tickets inter se, but it was contemplated that the appellant should hold all the tickets as custodian or agent on behalf of all the members; and in those circumstances the appellant was not guilty of the offence charged, and the conviction must, accordingly, be quashed.

Case Stated by Lincolnshire justices.

An information was preferred by the respondent, Police Superintendent Dolby, under s. 22 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, against the appellant, Charles Corfield, charging the appellant with unlawfully having in his possession, for the purpose of sale or distribution, forty-eight tickets in a lottery, namely, the Irish Free State Hospitals' Sweepstake on the 1935 Derby.

On the hearing of the information the following facts and matters were admitted or proved:—On May 28, 1935, Detective-Sergeant Brewster saw the appellant at Ashby, Scunthorpe, and then and there took possession from him of forty-eight 10s. tickets for the Irish Free State Hospitals' Sweepstake on the 1935 Derby. The tickets were received by the appellant from a Mr. Fred Robertshaw about the end of February or the beginning of March, 1935. The appellant received the tickets for and on behalf of himself and twenty other men, one of whom was Mr. Robertshaw, and they together formed a syndicate known as "One Big Family." The appellant collected from each of the other men in the syndicate 2s. a week and himself set aside a similar weekly amount. Mr. Robertshaw had bought the tickets from a Mr. Britain Petch as agent on behalf of the members of the syndicate, and had received the tickets from Mr. Petch, to whom he paid the price thereof. After receiving the tickets from Mr. Petch, Mr. Robertshaw had handed them over to the appellant in order that the appellant might hold them as custodian and agent for the members of the syndicate, he being the treasurer thereof. The appellant subsequently paid over to Mr. Robertshaw the moneys which had been collected by him from the members of the syndicate in reimbursement of the amount which Mr. Robertshaw had paid to Mr. Petch for the purchase of the tickets. The whole of the forty-eight tickets were held by the syndicate on behalf of all the members thereof. Each of the members had a twenty-first part or share in the whole of the tickets, and no individual member of the syndicate was entitled to any individual ticket or tickets. If any prize had been won by means of any of the tickets, such prize would have been divided equally between the members of the syndicate.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that (i) the tickets were in his possession as custodian on behalf of the members of the syndicate and would have so continued in his possession; (ii) the tickets were not in his possession for the purpose of sale or distribution. On the part of the respondent it was contended that, while it was in order for any individual to have in his possession a ticket or tickets in the sweepstake for himself, one of the objects of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, was to prevent a person having possession of tickets for the purpose of sale or distribution to another person or other persons, as had been done in the present case, and that in any event the appellant had the tickets in his possession for the purpose of distribution.

The justices were of opinion that the weekly collection from the members of the syndicate and the payment of the proceeds over to Mr. Fred Robertshaw was, in effect, a sale of the tickets, notwithstanding the fact that the tickets remained in the possession of one member of the syndicate, and that the appellant was guilty of having the tickets in his possession for the purpose of sale. They also held that the appellant had the tickets in his possession for the purpose of distribution. They, accordingly, convicted the appellant and fined him 10s. and a certain sum for costs.

The appellant appealed to the Divisional Court.

By the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, s. 22 (1):

> "Subject to the provisions of this section, every person who in connection with any lottery promoted or proposed to be promoted either in Great Britain or elsewhere . . . (b) sells or distributes, or offers or advertises for sale or distribution, or has in his possession for the purpose of sale or distribution, any tickets or chances in the lottery . . . shall be guilty of an offence."

Sandlands, K.C., and John Neal for the appellant.

Walker Carter for the respondent.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—In my opinion, this appeal ought to be allowed. [His Lordship stated the facts as set out above, and continued:] The justices came to a wrong conclusion in point of law. There was no evidence that any of the tickets were in the possession of the appellant for the purpose of distribution. On the contrary, what was desired was that there should not be a distribution, but that the tickets should be held as a whole on behalf of all the members of the syndicate. Nor was there, in my opinion, any evidence of a sale by the appellant. There was, undoubtedly, a sale by Petch to Robertshaw, and a purchase by Robertshaw, but purchase is not hit in s. 22 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, eo nomine. It is impossible to say that what was contemplated was that the appellant should sell any of the tickets or any interest in any ticket to the other members of the syndicate.

The legal view of the position of those members is that they were co-partners in the purchase of the tickets. To use a common expression, they had clubbed together to buy the tickets, and nothing was further from their minds than that the appellant should sell tickets or fractions of tickets to the other members. The intention was that he should hold all the tickets as custodian and agent on behalf of all the members. Although there had been a purchase on behalf of those persons who had clubbed together to buy, it was never in contemplation that there should be a sub-sale inter se. If all had gone together with their money to buy a block of forty-eight tickets, it would not have been suggested that they were selling the tickets to each other. In the present case there was a domestic arrangement by which the same result was produced, and it cannot reasonably be suggested that what was contemplated was a sale by the members inter se.

Counsel for the police has suggested that, if the conviction be quashed, grave consequences may follow. One consequence may be that in the future those who are responsible for the initiation of prosecutions will exercise a little of the ingenuity which is often displayed by those who have to answer prosecutions. For these reasons I am of

A opinion that the conclusion of the justices cannot be supported, and that the appeal must be allowed.

GODDARD, J.—I agree. I cannot see that what was done in the present case amounted to an ingenious evasion of the Act or to taking advantage of a loophole in it. By the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, Parliament has made the sale of lottery tickets B unlawful, but has expressly refrained from making the purchase of a ticket in a lottery an offence. If the buying of a ticket by an individual is lawful, the buying of a ticket by two persons jointly is equally lawful, and, if two persons can lawfully buy a ticket jointly, it seems to follow that there can be no reason why any number of persons should not buy jointly with an agreement between themselves that, if a fund comes into existence as a result of the purchase, they should all be entitled to share in it.

C SINGLETON, J.—I also think that this appeal should be allowed, but I wish to add that in my opinion that does not mean that the appellant did not commit any offence against the statute. If the information had been framed differently, I think that it is quite possible he would have had no answer on the facts as found.

Appeal allowed.

The right to recover a sum of money from a creditor who has been preferred is conferred on the liquidator of a company to benefit the general body of the creditors.

On Jan. 14, 1933, a company issued a debenture to secure a loan of £2,000, it being provided that the moneys secured should become immediately payable if a H distress or execution were levied or issued against any property of the company and were not paid out within seven days. On Jan. 17 the company paid to a creditor £240 11s. 2d. On Jan. 23 another creditor levied execution on the goods of the company. On Jan. 28 the debenture holders demanded payment of the £2,000 secured by the debenture and three days afterwards appointed a receiver. On March 31 the company passed a resolution for voluntary liquidation. The I liquidators claimed from the first-mentioned creditor the £240 11s. 2d. that had been paid to him, alleging that the sum had been paid to him with the intention of preferring him to other creditors. In December, 1933, that creditor paid the £240 11s. 2d. to the liquidators. On a summons taken out by the debenture holders for an order that the £240 11s. 2d. should be paid to the receiver appointed by them,

Held: at the date when the security contained in the debenture crystallised the money was not the property of the company nor property in respect of which it could be said that the company had even a contingent interest, for the company had as yet not gone into liquidation; and, therefore, when it was recovered, it did not become part of the general assets of the company, but was impressed in the hands of the liquidators with a trust for those creditors to whom they had to distribute the assets of the company.

Notes. The Companies Act, 1948, s. 265, has been replaced by s. 320 of the Companies Act, 1948, which alters the period within which certain acts constitute a fraudulent preference from three to six months before the commencement of the winding-up.

Summons.

The following facts are taken from the judgment of BENNETT, J.

This is a summons in the liquidation of Yagerphone, Ltd., issued by the applicant, H. Yager (London), Ltd., to which the two liquidators of Yagerphone, Ltd., are respondents, asking for an order that the liquidators do forthwith pay the sum of £240 11s. 2d. to the receiver appointed by the applicant of the property and assets of Yagerphone, Ltd., comprised in and charged by a debenture issued by the company to the applicant on Jan. 14, 1933, such sum of £240 11s. 2d., having been received by the liquidators on Dec. 1, 1933, namely, after the appointment of the receiver and being or representing moneys subject to the charge contained in the debenture.

The debenture referred to in the summons was issued by Yagerphone, Ltd., on Jan. 14, 1933, in consideration of a loan of £2,000 made by the applicant. By the debenture Yagerphone, Ltd., acknowledged that it had received the £2,000 and undertook that it would on demand or without any demand on the happening of any of the events thereinafter specified pay to the applicant as debenture holder all such sums as were then or should thereafter become owing to the debenture holder from the company and that the company would pay interest on any such sum by equal quarterly instalments. The debenture provided that the principal moneys thereby secured should become immediately payable without any demand, and on the happening of any of the following events: (a) if the company gave three months' notice in writing to the debenture holder of its intention to pay off this debenture; (b) if a distress or execution were levied or issued against any of the property of the company and were not paid out within seven days; (c) if an order were made or a resolution were passed for winding-up the company; (d) if the company should cease or threaten to cease to carry on its business; (e) if a receiver should be appointed of the company's assets or any part thereof.

On Jan. 17, 1933, Yagerphone, Ltd., paid to a creditor the sum of £240 11s. 2d. On Jan. 23, 1933, another creditor levied execution on the goods of the company. On Jan. 28, 1933, the applicant demanded payment of the money secured by the debenture. On Jan. 31, 1933, the applicant appointed the person named in the summons to be the receiver of the property comprised in the charge created by the debenture. On March 31, 1933, Yagerphone, Ltd., passed a resolution for voluntary liquidation. The liquidators took proceedings to recover from the creditor who had been paid the £240 11s. 2d. on Jan. 17, 1933, alleging that the payment was a payment made by Yagerphone, Ltd., with a view to preferring him over the other creditors. The proceedings were based on s. 265 of the Companies Act, 1929, which incorporates into the liquidation of a company the provisions of s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. In December, 1933, the creditor paid to the liquidators the sum claimed by them, i.e., £240 11s. 2d., and the contest between the liquidators and the applicant is whether the sum paid in these circumstances is charged by the debenture held by the applicant or whether it is a sum which the liquidators are entitled to retain and distribute among the creditors for whom they hold the assets, namely, the creditors of the company who have proved in the liquidation.

Lionel Cohen, K.C., for Maurice Berkeley for the applicant.

Grant, K.C., and C. Montgomery White for the liquidators.

BENNETT, J. [after stating the facts as above set out, continued:] So far as my attention has been called to the authorities there is, I think, no case which decides the point which calls for decision on this summons. There have been two cases which establish quite clearly that, whether in bankruptcy or in the liquidation of a company, a secured creditor has no right to enforce for his benefit the remedy which is given to a trustee in bankruptcy or the liquidator of the company of avoiding a payment or setting aside a transaction made or entered into with a view to preferring a creditor of the bankrupt or a company in liquidation. The authorities are Ex parte Cooper (1) and Willmott v. London Celluloid Co. (2).

Neither of these cases, as I have said, decides the point which arises on the summons. I propose to decide it in favour of the liquidators on this ground, namely, that, at the time when the securities contained in the debenture issued to H. Yager (London), Ltd., crystallised, the £240 11s. 2d. was not the property of Yagerphone, Ltd., the company which issued the debenture. The debenture charges with the payments which fall to be made the undertaking of Yagerphone, Ltd., and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future. On Jan. 17, 1933, the creditor to whom the money was paid and from whom the money was recovered was a creditor of Yagerphone, Ltd. When Yagerphone, Ltd., paid to the creditor the £240 11s. 2d., that sum, in my judgment, ceased to be the property of Yagerphone, Ltd. The payment to that creditor could not have been attacked or impeached, unless within three months from the date of payment the liquidation of Yagerphone, Ltd., had begun, and, in my judgment, at the date when the security contained in the debenture crystallised, the sum of £240 11s. 2d. was not the property of Yagerphone, Ltd., nor property in respect of which it could, I think, be said that Yagerphone, Ltd., had even a contingent interest.

The right to recover a sum of money from a creditor who has been preferred is conferred for the purpose of benefiting the general body of creditors, and I think counsel for the liquidators was right when he said that the sum of money, when recovered by the liquidators by virtue of s. 265 of the Companies Act, 1929, and s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, did not become part of the general assets of Yagerphone, Ltd., but was a sum of money received by the liquidators impressed in their hands with a trust for those creditors amongst whom they had to distribute the assets of the company. The application fails and must be dismissed.

By the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 19 (1): "... It shall not be lawful in the case of ... (c) any motor vehicle constructed to carry goods other than the effects of passengers for any person to drive or cause or permit any person employed by him or subject to his orders to drive (i) for any continuous period of more than five hours and one-half; or (ii) for continuous periods amounting in the aggregate to more than eleven hours in any period of twenty-four hours commencing two hours after midnight. ... Case Stated by Sunderland justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction at Sunderland an information was preferred by the appellant, Police Superintendent Cook, on behalf of the Traffic Commissioners for the Northern Traffic Area, against the respondents, Alfred Plumpton, Ltd., charging them that they, on Jan. 3, 1935, being then the owners of a motor lorry constructed to carry goods other than the effects of passengers, unlawfully permitted James Henderson to drive the vehicle for continuous periods amounting in the aggregate to more than eleven hours, namely, twelve-and-a-half hours, in the period of twenty-four hours beginning at 7.30 a.m. on Jan. 3, 1935, contrary to s. 19 (1) (ii) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. A second information charged the defendants with a similar offence on the following day. Informations were also preferred charging the driver with driving the vehicle in contravention of the above section of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, on the two days above mentioned.

On the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted. Alfred Plumpton, Ltd., were at all material times the owners of the vehicle in question, and James Henderson was employed by them as a driver. On Jan. 3, 1935, the driver worked for Alfred Plumpton, Ltd., from 7.30 a.m. to 1 p.m. He rested from 1 p.m. to 2 p.m. He worked from 2 p.m. to 6 p.m. rested from 6 p.m. to 6.30 p.m., and then worked from 6.30 p.m. to 9.30 p.m. He had worked, therefore, according to the records, for twelve-and-a-half hours on that day. On Jan. 4, 1935, the driver worked from 7.30 a.m. until 1 p.m. He rested from 1 p.m. to 2 p.m. He worked from 2 p.m. until 6 p.m., rested from 6 p.m. to 6.30 p.m., and worked again from 6.30 p.m. to 9 p.m. He had worked, therefore, according to the records, for twelve hours on that day.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant (i) that s. 19 (1) (ii) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, prohibited Alfred Plumpton, Ltd., from permitting the driver to drive, and the driver from driving, the vehicle for continuous periods amounting in the aggregate to more than eleven hours in any period of twenty-four hours, beginning two hours after

A midnight; and (ii) that the admitted facts and records showed that the defendants were guilty of the offences charged. It was contended on behalf of the respondents (i) that the periods worked by the driver could not be deemed continuous periods in view of s. 19 (2) of the Act, as the periods of work were on each day separated by intervals of at least half an hour; and (ii) that, accordingly, the admitted facts and records showed that the driver had not worked for continuous periods amounting in the aggregate to B more than eleven hours in a period of twenty-four hours. Similar contentions were made on behalf of the driver.

The justices were of opinion that, in view of s. 19 (2) (a) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the driver had not driven the vehicle for continuous periods amounting in the aggregate to more than eleven hours in the period of twenty-four hours beginning at 7.30 a.m. on each of the days in question, within the meaning of s. 19 (1) (ii). They accordingly C dismissed all the informations, and the appellant appealed to the Divisional Court.

George Bankes for the appellant.

Neither of the respondents appeared.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—These cases are really too clear for argument, and it is not surprising that neither of the respondents has thought fit to appear. The justices have D evidently, and no doubt inadvertently, confused the expression "continuous period" in s. 19 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, with the expression "aggregate of continuous periods." What the section provides is that it is unlawful for a person to drive or to cause or permit another person to drive a vehicle of the specified classes for one continuous period of more than five and a half hours. If that time is exceeded, then an offence is committed. Again, it is no less unlawful for a person to drive or to cause or permit E another person to drive such a vehicle for a number of continuous periods amounting in the aggregate to more than eleven hours in twenty-four. We have, therefore, two expressions "continuous period" and "aggregate." When one comes to s. 19 (2), it is provided that "(a) any two or more periods of time shall be deemed to be a continuous period"

F not an aggregate of continuous periods, but a continuous period—unless separated by a certain interval. The justices have evidently come to the conclusion that those words are applicable when one is examining what an aggregate of continuous periods is, which, with all due respect to them, is plainly contradictory of the express terms of the statute. I think that it is clear that in each of these cases the appeal ought to be allowed, and that the cases should go back to the justices with the direction that the offences charged G were proved.

A taxpayer, who had been assessed to an additional assessment to income tax, gave notice of appeal against that assessment. He subsequently gave notice that C he withdrew the appeal, but the Special Commissioners refused to allow the appeal to be withdrawn.

Held: the proceedings on an appeal under Part VII of the Income Tax Act, 1918, were still directed towards ascertaining the correct assessment; that entailed consideration not only of the question whether the assessment appealed against was too high, but also of the question whether it was too low; and, therefore, a notice D of appeal having been given, the appeal could not be withdrawn at the instance of the taxpayer.

Rule nisi for prohibition.

In June, 1932, an additional assessment to income tax under Sched. D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, was made on the applicant Elmhirst by the income tax commissioners for the parish of Dartington, Devon, for the financial year 1925–26, in the total sum of £5,200. On July 5, 1932, notice of appeal against that assessment was given on behalf of the applicant to the Special Commissioners. On Nov. 21, 1933, the appellant gave G notice that he withdrew the appeal, but the commissioners refused to allow the appeal to be withdrawn.

The applicant obtained a rule nisi calling on the Special Commissioners to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not be awarded to prohibit them from proceeding to hear the appeal. The grounds urged in support of the rule were that, the appeal having been withdrawn, there were no appeal proceedings in existence and no jurisdiction in H the commissioners to hear any such alleged appeal.

LORD WRIGHT, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court I discharging a rule nisi which had been granted to the present appellant addressed to the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, and requiring them to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not be awarded to prohibit them from proceeding to hear an appeal against an additional assessment to income tax No. 55,371, made by the commissioners of income tax for the parish of Dartington, under Sched. D for the year ended April 5, 1926, in the total sum of £5,200. That rule nisi was discharged by the Divisional Court, and it is from that that this appeal is brought.

The facts of the case are not really material, and need not be referred to except in the baldest outline, because the matter at issue turns on the true construction of certain sections of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The assessment in question was in the terms which already appear in the passage which I have read. The notice of the assessment, which was an additional assessment, was dated June 14, 1932, and the assessment was in respect of the tax year 1925–26. The applicant for the rule, Mr. Elmhirst, had, in 1925, married an American lady of considerable wealth. He had acquired definitely and beyond question a residence in this country in 1926, after the determination of the previous tax year up till April, 1926, and it appeared to the commissioners that in fact he had resided for tax purposes in this country in the years 1925 and 1926, and thereupon this additional assessment was made. He gave notice of appeal from that assessment on July 5, 1932, and matters proceeded on the basis of a pending appeal until Nov. 21, 1933, when he wrote a letter to the inspector withdrawing, or purporting to withdraw, his notice of appeal. In view of that he has contended that the commissioners have no further jurisdiction to proceed in the matter, and his main argument is that a notice of appeal so given may give to the commissioners certain powers, for instance, to order him to deliver a precept under s. 139, but that there is no appeal being prosecuted by him. He distinguishes a notice of appeal from an actual appeal, and his argument is that the actual appeal is only constituted and the powers of the commissioners to hear the appeal and to determine the appeal only come into effect, as contrasted with preliminary powers, when he actually appears at the hearing, the date having been fixed for the hearing, as, in fact, it was in this case, and that, if he does not do that—if he does not appear, and, indeed, gives notice that he does not intend to appear and has withdrawn his notice—then the whole of the jurisdiction of the commissioners ceases entirely and they cannot go on any further and deal with the assessment. The practical point at issue arises from the fact that on an appeal the commissioners have not merely a right of reducing the assessment which has been made in favour of the appellant, but, if the appeal proceeds, they have the power to alter it against the interests of the appellant and to increase the assessment. In this particular case it is said (we have not gone into the facts and we have not considered them) that the assessment ought to be something like ten times as much as the sum so far assessed from the appellant.

In order to determine the issue at law so raised it is necessary to refer to certain sections of the Income Tax Act of 1918, some of them from Part VI, but principally from Part VII, which is the part dealing with appeals. It must be admitted at the outset that these sections do present some difficulties, or, at least, apparent difficulties, because of their phraseology, and, in particular, the arrangement of the sections, but I have come to the conclusion, after considering all these sections, that the decision of the Divisional Court was right and should be affirmed, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

I will refer shortly, in the first place, to s. 121 in Part VI, the part dealing with assessment. Shortly, that deals with the procedure to be followed in order to make an assessment when there is no question of an appeal. Sections 121 and 122 are to be read together, and the end of s. 122 (3) is significant. It says:

> "The assessments under Sched. D, certified and delivered by the additional commissioners to the general commissioners, shall be allowed and confirmed by the general commissioners after the time for hearing appeals against such assessments has expired."

I need not say that though the assessment is made provisionally by the additional commissioners it is not effective until it has been allowed and confirmed by the general commissioners, and the final words that I have just read mean that, if no notice of appeal has been lodged and the time for hearing appeals has expired, the assessment is to be allowed and confirmed. I need not deal in detail with the provisions of s. 121. In the first place, the surveyor has to examine the statements made by the taxpayer which have to be laid before the additional commissioners, and it provides that, when a surveyor has had a reasonable time for the examination, the additional commissioners shall appoint meetings for the consideration of such statements as are then or from time to time delivered to them. If the commissioners are satisfied that a statement is in accordance with the Act and is sufficient, or there is no ground to doubt the sufficiency of the statement, and the surveyor makes no objection, the additional commissioners shall direct the assessment to be made in accordance with the statement. If, however, the surveyor declares himself dissatisfied with the determination of the additional commissioners, he can then require them to state and sign a case for the opinion of the general commissioners and the general commissioners shall with all convenient speed return the case with their opinions subscribed thereon, and the assessment shall be altered or confirmed accordingly. Then there is a provision for what is to happen if the taxpayer makes a default in delivery of a statement, or if the additional commissioners are not satisfied with the statement delivered, or if the surveyor makes an objection in writing to the statement, "setting forth the cause thereof." Then the additional commissioners are to > "make an assessment on the person concerned in such sum as, according to the best of their judgment, ought to be charged on him."

There are further provisions, and, in particular, there is a provision that if the surveyor, after examining the assessment which the additional commissioners have made before it is delivered to the general commissioners, makes an objection in writing as to the amount of the assessment, the commissioners shall certify his objection, and any information they may have obtained respecting it, to the general commissioners, and the surveyor shall give notice of his objection and particulars thereof to the person assessed in order that he may appear before the general commissioners in support of the assessment.

This, I think, is all I need say on the general question of the procedure when there is no question of an appeal, and I may note at once that in making the assessment and in dealing with the appeals the commissioners are exercising the statutory authority which they are bound to carry out, not as judges deciding the issue between the particular parties, but under a wider obligation. It is to exercise their judgment on such material as comes before them, and, as we shall see later, to obtain any material which they think is necessary and which they think they ought to have, and on that to make the assessment or the estimate which the law requires them to make. They are not deciding the case inter partes; they are assessing or estimating the amount which, in the interests of the country at large, the taxpayer ought to have to deal with as the basis on which he is to be taxed.

I may at this point refer to a very short passage from Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Sneath (1). I need not refer to the facts; the question was whether the decision of the commissioners in one year constituted an estoppel binding the commissioners in the following year, and it was held that it did not, and I may refer to the reasoning on which that was based, which involved some definition of the province and duty of the income tax commissioners. I read a short passage from the judgment of ROMER, L.J. ([1932] 2 K.B. at p. 390). He says this:

> "The duty of the commissioners, as I read the provisions of the Income Tax Acts, is to form an estimate in each year of assessment of the amount of the income of the taxpayer on which the surtax imposed for that year is to be charged. For this purpose the taxpayer is required to make a return of his income from all sources as defined by s. 5 of the Income Tax Act, 1918. With this to guide them, the Special Commissioners have then to form their own estimate of the total income and to make an assessment accordingly."

This was surtax. The general principles apply to surtax, and the general principles apply to any form of income tax.

> "With this to guide them, the Special Commissioners have then to form their own estimate of the total income and to make an assessment accordingly. If the taxpayer is not content with such assessment he can bring the matter before the Special Commissioners by way of appeal. But the proceedings on the appeal are still merely directed towards ascertaining the income upon which the taxpayer is to be charged with surtax for the particular year of assessment, and the Special > Commissioners may, if they think fit, increase the assessment made by them in the first instance. The appeal is merely another step taken by the commissioners, at the instance of the taxpayer, in the course of the discharge by them of their administrative duty of collecting the surtax."

With these words in mind I can now turn to Part VII of the Act, which deals with appeals, and s. 133 (1) is in these terms:

> "Save where expressly authorised by this Act, the general commissioners shall not alter any assessment before the time for hearing and determining appeals, and then only in cases of assessments appealed against, and in accordance with their determination."

That makes the precise matter their determination as the result of an appeal. Then sub-s. (3):

> "Where an objection has been made by the surveyor to an assessment upon any person, and that objection has been dealt with and determined on appeal, the surveyor shall not, thereafter, make any further charge for the same year, upon that person, in respect of the same matter, property, or profits included in the assessment to which the objection, so determined, was made."

That relates back to the provisions of ss. 121 and 122. Then s. 134 merely deals with the notices of the assessments, and s. 135 provides:

> "Notice of appeal meetings to be held by the general commissioners shall also be given to the surveyor by the clerk to the commissioners."

Then comes s. 136 (1):

> "A person aggrieved by any assessment upon him, made by the additional commissioners, or by the assessor for any parish, or by a surveyor, in any first or additional first assessment, or by any objection by the surveyor to an assessment made by the additional commissioners, shall be entitled to appeal to the general commissioners, on giving notice in writing to the surveyor, within twenty-one days after the date of the notice of such assessment or objection."

Those provisions, in my opinion, do not have the meaning which counsel for the applicant has sought to attach to them. He relies on the words "shall be entitled to appeal . . . on giving notice," and he says that the right given by s. 136 (1) is not a general right of appeal, but merely a right to give notice of appeal, and that a person is nowise committed to the position of an appellant because he has given a notice of appeal. I do not accept that construction of s. 136 (1). I think it merely gives to the taxpayer, if he is aggrieved by the assessment, a right of appeal in general terms, and "entitled to appeal" means that he has that right conditioned on his giving notice within the appropriate time. But, as it will appear later, in my opinion, if he does give that notice, an appeal is constituted with whatever consequences may follow from that circumstance. Subsection (3) of s. 136 was also referred to as indicating, in the submission of counsel for the applicant, that the presence of the taxpayer at the hearing of the appeal was something which was essential to the continuance of the appeal, but I do not so read it. I think all it means is that the appellant, if I may call him so—the person aggrieved—may have the full opportunity of being present, and that there should be no decision behind his back in the sense that he has not had a proper opportunity of coming, if he wanted to come. Section 137 deals with the duty of the commissioners to give notice of the day for hearing appeals to every appellant, and the word "appellant" there is important: it, to my mind, indicates that when the provisions of s. 136 have been followed, the taxpayer who has given notice of appeal is an appellant, and that there are appeals in existence which have to be heard.

There are three other subsections of that section which I think ought to be noticed. The first is sub-s. (2):

> "The surveyor and the assessor may attend every appeal, and shall be entitled (a) to be present during all the time of the hearing, and at the determination of the appeal; > and (b) to produce any lawful evidence in support of the assessment or surcharge; A > and (c) to give reasons in support of the assessment or surcharge."

There is nothing there obviously in the negative. It gives him certain positive rights and in particular gives him the right to be present during all the time of the hearing, and, as will appear in the sequel, I think he, having the right to be present and also the duty to be present, is available to give such information and help to the commissioners B on the hearing of the appeal as may appear to them to be necessary or desirable. Then sub-s. (4) is:

> "If, on an appeal, it appears to the majority of the commissioners present at the hearing, by examination of the appellant on oath or affirmation, or by other lawful evidence, that the appellant is overcharged by any assessment or surcharge, the commissioners shall abate or reduce the assessment or surcharge accordingly, but C otherwise every such assessment or surcharge shall stand good."

Then sub-s. (5), which is complementary, because sub-s. (4) is not, as might appear to be at first sight, comprehensive, says:

> "If, on any appeal, it appears to the commissioners that the person assessed or surcharged ought to be charged in an amount exceeding the amount contained in D the assessment or surcharge they shall charge him with the excess."

These two subsections clearly contemplate, first, that an appeal has been constituted by the giving of notice of appeal, and secondly, that on the hearing of that appeal the appellant may give evidence on oath, other lawful evidence may be called, and furthermore that the commissioners have the duty and the right of coming to a conclusion, not only diminishing, if that appears to them to be the proper course, but increasing E the assessment.

Then s. 139 has been much debated, and I think it has to be read as part of a general code which goes at least to the end of s. 145, and I think these sections must all be read together to give a picture of what is to happen when the process starts which is indicated in s. 139. It will be noted in s. 139 that the start of the whole thing and the foundation of the jurisdiction and the duty of the general commissioners depend on their receiving F notice of appeal. I ought to have said, and I say at once, that we are dealing here with Special Commissioners and not general commissioners, because the choice has been exercised of appealing to the Special Commissioners, and I shall call them in future "commissioners," because I need not distinguish between the general or the Special Commissioners. What I am going to say will apply equally to either class of commissioners. Then s. 139 is: G

> "(1) If the general commissioners have received notice of appeal against an assessment made by the additional commissioners, or see cause to allow the objection of the surveyor to any such assessment"— that is the other matter provided for, as I have already shown—"they shall issue a precept to the appellant ordering him to deliver to them, within the time limited by the H precept, a schedule containing such particulars, for their information"—that ought to be noted as indicating their functions—"as they may demand under the authority of this Act." Then the schedules are to contain particulars of the profits or gains, and so forth, of the taxpayer and the deductions—"which particulars the said general commissioners are hereby empowered and required to demand at their discretion whenever the same shall appear to them necessary for the purposes mentioned in this Act." The I section continues:

> "(2) The general commissioners may issue further precepts whenever they consider it necessary for the purposes aforesaid, until complete particulars have been furnished to their satisfaction. (3) A person to whom a precept is issued shall deliver the schedule required, within the time limited, and in default thereof, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding twenty pounds and treble the tax at which he ought to be charged. (4) Any surveyor may, at all reasonable times, inspect and take copies of or extracts from any schedule."

Counsel does not contest the proposition that once the notice of appeal has been given by a person, that person is under an obligation to obey the precept and to deliver a schedule containing the necessary particulars and such further schedules as may be required. Section 140 merely deals with penalties for failure to deliver a sufficient schedule, and it also gives the taxpayer the right to rectify or amend the schedule in proper cases. Then the precept, it is assumed, has been duly obeyed and the schedule has been issued, and thereupon the position of the surveyor is taken into account. Section 141 says:

> "(1) The surveyor may, within a reasonable time to be allowed by the commissioners to whom an appeal is made"— again emphasising the fact that there is a subsisting appeal at that stage—

> "after examination by him of any schedule, object to such schedule or any part thereof, and in that case shall state, in writing, the cause of his objection, according to the best of his knowledge or information. (2) In every such case he shall give notice in writing of his objection, to the person to be charged in order that he may, if he thinks fit, appeal against the same. The notice shall be under cover and sealed, and addressed to the person to be charged. (3) No assessment shall be confirmed or altered until any appeal against such objection has been heard and determined."

Here the surveyor is put in the position of initiating a step on his own account. The schedule has been delivered; the surveyor objects; and thereupon the taxpayer is entitled to appeal, if he thinks fit, against that objection, and that is a matter which seems to be, as it were, a subsidiary or an auxiliary appeal; but in that proceeding, which follows inevitably from the delivery of the precept, if the surveyor so decides that appeal may decide the whole matter of the assessment. However, s. 142 proceeds to deal with the matter in still further detail. It deals with two contingencies. The first is:

> "If (a) the commissioners to whom an appeal is made see cause to disallow an objection of the surveyor to a schedule," and the second is:

> "If (b) on the hearing of an appeal, the commissioners are satisfied with the assessment made by the additional commissioners, or if, after the delivery of a schedule, they are satisfied therewith, and have received no information as to its insufficiency, they shall direct the assessment to be confirmed or to be altered in accordance with any such schedule, as the case may require."

That deals with the circumstances of the commissioners being satisfied with the schedule and with the assessment already made by the additional commissioners, and then the assessment will be confirmed or altered in accordance with the schedule and in accordance with either of these possible contingencies. Then comes a series of provisions which deals with the case of the commissioners being > "dissatisfied with an assessment delivered to them by the additional commissioners or with a schedule, or if they require further information relating thereto";

then they may (this is s. 143 (1))

> "at any time and from time to time, by precept, put any questions in writing concerning the assessment or schedule, or any matter which is contained or ought to be contained therein, or concerning any deductions made in arriving at the profits or gains, and the particulars thereof, and may require true and particular answers in writing, signed by the person to be charged, to be given within seven days after the service of the precept. Subsection (2) (a) The person to be charged shall, within the time limited, either answer any such questions in writing signed by him, or shall tender himself to be examined orally before the commissioners, and may object to, and refuse to answer, any question, but the substance of any answer or answers given by him orally shall be taken down in writing in his presence, and be read over to him, and after he has had liberty to amend any such answer or answers he may be required to verify the same on oath to be administered to him by any one of the commissioners."

The next part of the section is mere machinery enabling the taxpayer, instead of himself being examined, to tender someone else on his behalf to attend and be examined. That obviously provides for an oral proceeding or hearing in the course of this appeal, which has, as we have seen, been proceeding since the time when the notice of appeal was given. Section 144 gives the commissioners further powers of acquiring information to enable them to perform their duties. It enables them to > "summon any person whom they think able to give evidence respecting an assessment made or to be made on another person, to appear before them to be examined, and may examine such person on oath (except the clerk, agent, servant or other person confidentially employed in the affairs of a person to be charged . . .)" and so on, and there is a penalty attached to any failure to answer truly by such witness in accordance with the oath. Section 145 deals in the main with the case where there has been a refusal by a person required to deliver a schedule in accordance with a precept to obey that precept or to deliver the schedule, or where a clerk, agent or servant of any such person, having been summoned, has neglected or refused to appear before the commissioners to be examined (these are all provisions ancillary to these powers which I have already referred to in the preceding section) or has declined to answer questions; and then there are two further rather different categories dealt with in the section. The first is where an objection has been made to a schedule, and the objection has not been appealed against; or the commissioners decide to allow any objection made by the surveyor; then in all or any of the circumstances

> "the commissioners shall ascertain and settle, according to the best of their judgment, the sum in which the person chargeable ought to be charged, and shall make an assessment and charge accordingly."

Section 148 provides for an appeal against an assessment under Sched. D being made to the Special Commissioners instead of to general commissioners.

I do not think it necessary to go on to discuss any of the further sections in the Act in this part relating to appeals. I will only say that on an examination of this code (because I think all these sections from 139 to 145 inclusive ought to be read together as embodying an inclusive code; s. 146 merely, I think, deals with penalties), the conclusion I draw from the code is that the commissioners, having set before them the duty of ascertaining and settling according to the best of their judgment the sum on which the taxpayer ought to be assessed, are required to make the assessment in accordance with that judgment, and in view of that I find it quite impossible to accept the argument that the giving of the notice of appeal is merely, as it were, a sort of offer, or is merely an act, from which the taxpayer can at his discretion, at any time resile, subject to his obeying the precepts and so forth, and that he can at any moment prevent the commissioners from ascertaining and settling the sum to be assessed by the simple process of intimating by word or by deed that he withdraws the notice of appeal, and that there is no appeal pending at all. It seems to me that the code contained in these sections is quite inconsistent with any such argument. It would, indeed, be a curious position if, notice of appeal having been given by the taxpayer in the hope of reducing his assessment, he should be able, when the information elicited shows conclusively that the assessment, so far from being an overcharge, was an undercharge, and possibly a very serious undercharge indeed, to prevent the commissioners from estimating or valuing or assessing the taxpayer's liability according to the true facts which have been elicited, or that they should be debarred from proceeding further to develop the facts so that they can feel that they have ascertained the true position. The whole trend of these sections seems to be inconsistent with and contrary to any such view. There is one phrase which I think was relied on. The words are used in more than one case "on an appeal" or "upon the hearing of an appeal," and it was argued that there could not be a hearing of an appeal unless the appellant was present. I find it impossible to accept any such view. If the appellant does not think fit to be present, the machinery of these sections shows that in such a case the commissioners have the power and the duty of examining all the facts, and that power is given to them by the mere giving of the notice of appeal. Having a duty to examine the facts, they are bound to give effect to what appears to them to be the proper assessment or estimate or valuation to be made in view of those facts. For these reasons, as I have already said, I think the appeal should be dismissed and dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. The Income Tax Act, 1918, provides the procedure to be adopted for the purpose of assessing the gains and profits of an income tax payer under Sched. D, and that procedure is as follows. After the statement of profits or gains has been made by the income tax payer in accordance with the Act, that statement is laid by the surveyor before the additional commissioners unless an assessment has to be made by the Special Commissioners; in general it is laid before the additional commissioners. If they are satisfied that the statement has been bona fide made so as to enable them to assess the person with the full tax which ought to be charged, and no information is given to them as to the insufficiency of the statement and the surveyor makes no objection thereto, the additional commissioners shall—it is provided by s. 121—direct an assessment to be made in accordance with that statement. If, on the other hand, the income tax payer makes default in delivery of this statement, or the additional commissioners are not satisfied with the statement which has been delivered, or the surveyor makes an objection in writing to that statement, the additional commissioners are required under the section to which I have referred to > "make an assessment on the person concerned in such sum as, according to the best of their judgment, ought to be charged on him."

The additional commissioners, having so made an assessment, are required by s. 122 to enter that assessment in books provided for the purpose, and to make out in those books certificates of assessments accordingly; and by s. 122 (2) they are required to sign the assessments and deliver the signed assessments to the general commissioners. Then s. 122 (3) provides this:

> "The assessments under Sched. D, certified and delivered by the additional commissioners to the general commissioners, shall be allowed and confirmed by the general commissioners after the time for hearing appeals against such assessments has expired."

It is plain that to those words must be added, as a necessary implication: "If in the meantime no notice of appeal against the assessment has been served." Where, therefore, no notice of appeal has been served against the assessment of the additional commissioners, the general commissioners are under a statutory obligation to allow and confirm the assessment, and after they have so allowed and confirmed the assessment, the procedure for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of income to be taxed under Sched. D has been completed. If, on the other hand, a notice of appeal has been served by the income tax payer, the general commissioners have no power under this section to make or to confirm or to allow the assessment, and the power to do so is, as I read the Act, in that event to be found in the sections which immediately follow s. 132 in Part VII of the Act, which is entitled "Appeals." Where, therefore, as in the present case, the income tax payer serves a notice of appeal, it is under Part VII and Part VII alone, of the Act that the general commissioners have the power to take the final step in the assessment of allowing and confirming the assessment of the additional commissioners.

The question that we have to determine in this case is whether, when a taxpayer has served a notice of appeal, and so brought into effect the machinery designed by s. 133 for the purpose of completing the assessment, he can stop the further working of that machinery either by withdrawing the appeal or by refusing to be present at the hearing of the appeal. If that be right, and he can in that way stop the working of the machinery, then, as it appears to me, he is in a position to prevent any final assessment being made upon him at all under the Act. That would be an extraordinary intention to impute to the legislature. In my opinion, that is not the effect of the Act. In my opinion, the income tax payer has no more power, after he has served the notice of appeal and so brought into operation the machinery of procedure set up for it in Part VII of the Act, to stop the machinery of procedure than he is in the position to stop the machinery of procedure for the ascertainment of his liability to tax in any other part of the Act. It is not now asserted on his behalf that by withdrawing his notice of appeal or failing to make an appearance at the hearing of the appeal, he can stop a part of the procedure laid down in Part VII. If, for instance, the general commissioners are not satisfied with the information before them, it is admitted that under s. 139, not only have the general commissioners power, but they are under a statutory obligation to issue a precept to the taxpayer to compel him to provide them with further information. It is admitted that no withdrawal of the appeal can prevent the commissioners from exercising that power. The precept having been issued to the income tax payer, he is under a statutory liability to make a return in accordance with that precept. If he does not, he is subjected to various penalties. If he does make a return to the precept, then the surveyor has power to object within a reasonable time under s. 141 to the schedule which has resulted from the obedience to the precept. If he does so object, then the income tax payer may appeal against that objection, and it is agreed that until that appeal has been heard no assessment can be confirmed or altered. That is the result of s. 141. If the commissioners decide to allow the surveyor's objection, or if the person to whom the precept has been delivered has neglected or refused to deliver a schedule in accordance with it, or if an objection has been made to the schedule by the surveyor and the objection has not been appealed against, it is admitted that under s. 145, the commissioners are under a statutory obligation to ascertain and settle according to the best of their judgment the sum in which the person chargeable ought to be charged, and that whether the notice of appeal has been withdrawn or not.

But what has been said by the applicant in the present case is that, if the commissioners are satisfied with the assessment made by the additional commissioners, or, if after the delivery of a schedule in accordance with the precept they are satisfied therewith, and have received no information as to its insufficiency, they have no power under s. 142 to direct the assessment to be confirmed or to be altered in accordance with any such schedule as the case may require, because s. 142 says, in sub-s. (b): "on the hearing of an appeal"; that is to say, because the section says that this power of the commissioners can be or is to be exercised at the hearing of an appeal, the appellant, by withdrawing his notice of appeal or by refusing to appear at the appeal, can prevent the commissioners from exercising that power. I have too much respect myself for the legislature to impute to them any such absurdity as that. I think that, once the procedure laid down in Part VII of the Act has been brought into being, the income tax payer has no power of preventing it being carried out to its full effect, resulting as it will in the assessment either in the amount originally assessed by the additional commissioners or with some variation by way of increase or diminution.

For these reasons, in addition to those which have been given by the Master of the Rolls, I think this appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

GREENE, L.J.—I agree.

Quarter Sessions—Appeal to—Appeal against sentence—No appearance by prosecutor—Quarter sessions not entitled to quash conviction—Criminal Justice Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 86), s. 25.

Magistrates—Court of summary jurisdiction—Right to appear on appeal to quarter sessions—Duty to assist court.

On an appeal to quarter sessions against sentence only, quarter sessions are entitled to deal only with the question of sentence, and the failure of a private prosecutor in the court below to appear on the hearing of the appeal cannot be a ground entitling the court to quash the conviction.

R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1), [1892] 2 Q.B. 719, distinguished.

On the hearing of an appeal to quarter sessions the justices of the court of summary jurisdiction have always a right to appear, to instruct counsel, and to call evidence in support of their decision, without making themselves a party to the appeal.

Per Humphreys, J.: If the justices are informed that the prosecutor is not going to be represented, it is the duty of their clerk to see that quarter sessions are afforded assistance in the manner above indicated on the hearing of the appeal. If the justices do not wish to instruct counsel, they may arrange that some public authority, such as the local police authority, shall act on their behalf, and it is desirable that they should request the authority in writing so to act.

Quære, whether the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police has ex virtute officii a special right to appear as respondent on the non-appearance of a private prosecutor.

Rules nisi for certiorari and mandamus.

At Bromley Petty Sessions a defendant was charged on a private prosecution by the manager of an inn with stealing an article therefrom. He elected to be dealt with summarily, pleaded Guilty and was fined £2 and ordered to pay a sum of 5s. for damage. He appealed to quarter sessions against that sentence, on the ground that it was too severe. When the appeal was called on for hearing before the appeal committee, counsel for the appellant stated that he appeared for the defendant, and another counsel stated that he appeared to oppose the appeal on behalf of the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police. Counsel for the appellant objected that his opponent could not be heard, inasmuch as the commissioner was not a party to the appeal, and neither the commissioner nor any police officer had been prosecutor in the court below. The appeal committee held that the commissioner was not entitled to be heard or to take any part in the appeal. They declined to respite the appeal to a later date and, on the authority of R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1), proceeded to quash the conviction. At the instance of the commissioner rules nisi for certiorari and mandamus were obtained, calling on the justices who constituted the appeal committee to show cause why their order quashing the conviction should not be quashed, and directing them to hear and determine the appeal according to law.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—These are two rules nisi, one for a writ of certiorari and the other for a writ of mandamus, and it will be convenient to deal first with the case of the writ of certiorari. A rule was granted calling upon certain justices of the county of Kent

> "to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into this court a certain order dated May 22, 1935, allowing the appeal of the defendant against a conviction by the court of summary jurisdiction for the Bromley petty sessional division whereby he was convicted" of stealing an article of the value of 5s. from the New Inn public-house, Hayes. The justices in quarter sessions quashed the conviction, and what is desired is that the order quashing that conviction should be removed into this court and quashed.

The facts of the case are very simple. On March 25, 1935, the defendant appeared before the justices at Bromley upon a charge that he stole an article of the value of 5s. from a public-house, and in the alternative that he did receive that property well knowing it to have been stolen. On that occasion he elected to be dealt with summarily and pleaded Guilty to the offence of stealing. No evidence was called, but a statement of the facts was made, and, after hearing the facts and a plea in mitigation of punishment, the justices imposed a fine of £2 and ordered the defendant to pay a further sum of 5s. for damage. Against that sentence the defendant appealed by notice dated April 5, 1935, and the only ground stated was that his sentence, as he alleged, was too severe.

The facts, therefore, were that there had been a plea of Guilty, that against conviction there was not, and could not be, an appeal, and that there was an appeal only against sentence. When the appeal was called on, counsel on one side informed that court that he appeared on behalf of the appellant, and another counsel informed the court that he appeared on behalf of the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police. Counsel for the appellant then objected that this counsel could not be heard, inasmuch as the commissioner was not a party to the appeal, and neither the commissioner nor any police officer was prosecutor in the proceedings in the police court. After some argument counsel who appeared on behalf of the prosecution said that he abandoned his claim to represent the justices, who were not parties to the proceedings, though they had the right to appear, but he contended that the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police was entitled to be heard and to conduct the appeal as respondent. Argument followed upon that contention, and in the result the West Kent appeal committee came to the conclusion that the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police was not entitled to be heard or to take any part in the appeal. They by no means stopped there. Instead of calling upon the chief witness, who was present in court, to depose to the facts or of respiting the appeal to a later date, as they were invited to do, they decided to deal with the matter in the absence of counsel for the prosecutor, and, having had their attention directed to R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1), they accepted the contention urged on the appellant's behalf that he was entitled not only to have his appeal allowed and the sentence which was being appealed from struck out, but also to have the conviction quashed. They, accordingly, quashed the conviction, having decided that there was nobody whom they could hear on behalf of the prosecutor.

It is quite clear that in taking that course the justices believed that they were acting upon the authority of the decision in R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1), but it is no less clear, when one looks at that case and the date of it, that they could find there no warrant for the course which they took. In R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1), decided in August, 1892, that is to say forty-three years ago, there was an appeal against sentence in the sense that there was an appeal against a summary conviction upon the sole ground that the punishment inflicted was excessive. But in that case there had been no plea of Guilty, and the appellant was appealing against his conviction. The justices, dealing with the sentence, came to the conclusion that the appeal ought to be allowed and quashed the conviction. Much has happened since then. By s. 25 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, it is provided:

> "A person who after pleading Guilty or admitting the truth of the information is convicted of any offence by a court of summary jurisdiction shall have a right to appeal in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to a court of quarter sessions against his sentence."

There a right is given to appeal against sentence even though a defendant has pleaded Guilty in the first court. Previously, by s. 37 of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, it was provided:

> "Any person aggrieved by any conviction of a court of summary jurisdiction in respect of any offence, who did not plead Guilty or admit the truth of the information, may appeal from the conviction in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to a court of quarter sessions."

In my opinion, since the passing of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, which gave a right to appeal against sentence notwithstanding a plea of Guilty, the decision in R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1) throws no light at all upon the duty of a court of quarter sessions in such a case. Here the court was entitled to deal only with the question of sentence, and they exceeded their jurisdiction when, going beyond the appeal which was before them, they proceeded to quash the conviction.

With regard to the other point whether the contention of counsel for the respondent was right, when he argued that the commissioner of police was entitled to appear and to take part in the conduct of the appeal, I prefer at this moment to express no final opinion; the matter may hereafter call for very careful consideration. It is quite obvious that the justices might have instructed counsel. It is, perhaps, true that in the circumstances which happened the justices, in effect, instructed counsel by inviting the police to take the matter up, and, if all the facts had then been known, counsel who said he was appearing for the commissioner of police might conceivably have been in a position to say he was appearing for the justices. He took no such course; on the contrary, he abandoned the contention that he was appearing for the justices, and said he claimed to appear only for the commissioner of police. I do not think it is at all necessary for the decision of the present case to decide whether the commissioner of police was entitled so to appear, but I have no doubt at all that the justices came to an erroneous conclusion when they decided that in the circumstances no course was open to them except to proceed to deal with the appeal in the absence of evidence. They might have obtained evidence themselves, or they might have adjourned the appeal, as they were asked to do. But even if they had been right in proceeding to hear the appeal against sentence in the absence of evidence, they had no jurisdiction to quash the conviction.

I think, therefore, that this rule nisi for certiorari for the purpose of quashing that order of quarter sessions must be made absolute, and, as it appears clearly that the justices never directed their minds to the real and only point which was before them, namely, the quantum of the sentence which had been imposed by the court below, I think that the rule nisi for a writ of mandamus directing them to hear and determine the matter according to law must be made absolute.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The rule in this case is directed to justices of the peace for the county of Kent to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into this court, for the purpose of being quashed, an order dated May 22, 1933, allowing the appeal of a defendant against a conviction by the court of summary jurisdiction for the Bromley petty sessional division. The very short ground which is sufficient for the decision of this case is that, in truth, there was no appeal by the defendant against any conviction by a court of summary jurisdiction, and, therefore, the court of quarter sessions which made an order allowing such appeal must be wrong, and I further think that it was clearly in excess of their jurisdiction to make any such order. Therefore a writ of certiorari ought to issue to them to quash that order made without jurisdiction.

The appeal in this case was brought by virtue of s. 25 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, and until the passing of that Act no such appeal could possibly have been brought to any court of quarter sessions. The section provides:

> "A person who after pleading Guilty or admitting the truth of the information is convicted of any offence by a court of summary jurisdiction shall have a right to appeal in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to a court of quarter sessions against his sentence."

Those words are so plain and clear that it would have been extremely difficult for anyone to argue that upon such an appeal the question of an appeal against conviction was a matter which quarter sessions had power to consider. Counsel for the justices has based his argument upon R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1) on which the court of quarter sessions relied. I think it is only necessary to realise what the law was at the date of that case, 1892, and to have in one's mind the alteration of the law made in 1925, to see that that case is no authority whatever for the proposition that the justices in this case had any power to deal with the matter as they did. In 1892 the only general right of appeal against a conviction by a court of summary jurisdiction—I use the word "general" because certain Acts of Parliament gave a specific right of appeal against conviction for certain offences—was under s. 19 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which provided that where any person was adjudged by a court of summary jurisdiction to be imprisoned without the option of a fine and did not plead Guilty or admit the truth of the information or complaint, he might appeal to a court of general or quarter sessions. It was, therefore, necessary for any person who came to quarter sessions and purported to have a right of appeal to show that he had been convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction, that he had not admitted the truth of the accusation, in other words, had not pleaded Guilty, and that he had been sentenced to imprisonment. Those circumstances were present in the case of Bell, who was the appellant in R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1). He had not pleaded Guilty, he had been convicted of an offence, and he had been sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment. He appealed against that conviction, which was the only thing he could appeal against, but his object in doing so, as he made clear in his grounds of appeal, was that he desired to protest against the propriety of the fourteen days' imprisonment. When the matter came before the Divisional Court it was held, following the ratio decidendi of the earlier case of R. v. Purdey (2), that upon such an appeal, since it was an appeal against the conviction, although the only matter of controversy was the matter of the sentence, it was for the respondent to begin and to prove de novo the commission of the offence. Some reliance has been placed by counsel upon some of the words in the judgment of CAVE, J. The learned judge is reported to have said, speaking of the case under consideration ([1892] 2 Q.B. at p. 722): "Here the appellant appealed against the judgment, not against the verdict." If that is to be taken to mean that he did not appeal against his conviction, but did appeal against his sentence, of course, it is wrong, and obviously wrong. I prefer to assume that the learned judge was not saying anything of the sort, but was merely indicating that the object of the appellant was to get not the conviction but the sentence altered.

The next change in the law, as my Lord has mentioned, was in 1914, when by s. 37 of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, an amendment, but only a very slight amendment, in the law was made. It was provided by that Act that a person should have the right of appeal to quarter sessions against a conviction although he had not been sentenced to imprisonment, and that was the only alteration which was made. The section provides:

> "Any person aggrieved by any conviction of a court of summary jurisdiction in respect of any offence, who did not plead Guilty or admit the truth of the information, may appeal from the conviction."

It left out the proviso that he must have been sentenced to imprisonment. In 1918 that section was under consideration by this court in Harris v. Cooke (3). The ratio decidendi of that case is of no materiality in the consideration of the present case; it B turned upon the right of appeal expressly given by the regulations made under the Defence of the Realm Act, 1914, but in the course of his judgment, with reference to a matter which had been argued by counsel who appeared for the appellant, AVORY, J., made this observation (83 J.P. at p. 73):

> "I will only say that I do not at present think that any person who has really, with- C out any ambiguity, pleaded Guilty to an offence covered by [s. 37 of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914] has any right to appeal either against the finding that he is Guilty or against the sentence. I think that the purpose of that section, as of s. 19 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, was to take away from a person who has in fact pleaded Guilty any right of appeal."

D Therefore, it is, to my mind, clear beyond question that when the defendant decided to appeal against the sentence he could only appeal under the terms of s. 25 of the Act of 1925, and that the matter of the conviction which was not appealed against, and could not be appealed against by him, was not before the court. For these reasons I agree with the judgment of my Lord that certiorari must go in this case.

An interesting matter has been argued by counsel upon both sides as to the position of a member of the Bar who appeared, as he said, for the prosecutor upon the appeal. I E agree that this case does not call for, and, therefore, ought not to receive, a decision upon the question whether the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police has the right to appear as the respondent in a case where the party to the appeal other than the appellant is not represented. I will only say this, that, having looked at the case which was relied upon by counsel supporting the rules—R. v. Truelove (4)—I do not regard that as any authority at all in support of the proposition that the commissioner has the right to F appear; it does not seem to me to touch the matter at all. It is, to my mind, of the greatest importance that, where a private prosecutor has initiated criminal proceedings, and a conviction by a court of summary jurisdiction has been obtained, and there is an appeal, some person other than the appellant should be present to assist quarter sessions in the matter, and I entertain no doubt whatever that, while the party who initiated the proceedings is a proper respondent, and normally the only respondent, to the appeal, G the justices themselves have an absolute right to appear, to instruct counsel, and to call evidence in support of the decision at which they have arrived and which is then under consideration by the court hearing the appeal. In so doing they do not make themselves a party to the appeal, and, therefore, no order can be made against them in respect of costs, but they appear, in my view, in precisely the same way as licensing justices who have refused the renewal of a licence appear where there is an appeal to quarter H sessions from such refusal—to inform the court of quarter sessions of the reasons upon which they acted, and to give their assistance to the court. One can well understand that normally a bench of magistrates, or a stipendiary magistrate, would not desire to be represented on such an appeal where the respondent is going to be represented. I should like to express my view that, upon information that the respondent to the appeal is not going to be represented, it is the duty of the clerk to the justices to see that I quarter sessions are afforded that assistance to which I have referred. That may be done in several ways; one way in which it clearly may be done is by requesting the Director of Public Prosecutions to take up the matter, and he has statutory power to do so. If it is desired to insist upon his doing so, recourse may be had to the Attorney-General, who has power to direct the Director of Public Prosecutions to take up any case. But apart from that, and if the justices have some reluctance to instruct counsel through their clerk, assuming him to be a solicitor, I can see myself no objection in law, and it seems to me to be an extremely convenient thing in practice, for the justices to arrange for some person, probably a public authority, and it might conveniently be the local police authority, to act on their behalf in the way in which I have indicated. I would only add that, in my own opinion, it would be very desirable in future, if justices think it right to take such a course, to put the matter beyond doubt by directing their clerk to apply to the local police authority in writing requesting that authority to act on their behalf, and to represent them upon the hearing before quarter sessions. Whether, in those circumstances, the commissioner of police has any more right than any other individual to take up the matter and make himself respondent is a matter upon which I express no opinion.

SINGLETON, J.—I agree. When the defendant was before the justices on March 25, 1935, he elected to be dealt with summarily, and pleaded Guilty to the offence with which he was charged. The justices inflicted a fine of £2, and ordered him to pay 5s. damages. On April 5, 1935, he gave notice of appeal, and it is clear that his appeal was an appeal against sentence only, as, indeed, it could only be, because he had pleaded Guilty to the offence with which he was charged. That appeal was filed under s. 25 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925. When the case came before the court of quarter sessions objection was taken by the appellant, who appeared by counsel, and after a discussion it was decided by the justices that they could not hear counsel on behalf of the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police. Thereupon, as is shown by the affidavit of the chairman of the West Kent Appeal Committee:

> "Proof having been given to the satisfaction of the committee that the statutory notices had been duly served upon the said Frank Clarke [the prosecutor in the court below] and the clerk of the said court of summary jurisdiction [counsel for the appellant], upon the non-appearance of the said Frank Clarke and the Bromley justices, cited to the committee the case of R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1), and contended that in the absence of any evidence the appellant was entitled to have his appeal allowed and the sentence appealed against struck out, and that the conviction must consequently be quashed. The committee, having considered the said case cited to them, accepted the contention, and thereupon quashed the said conviction."

I think that was wholly wrong for this reason. There was no appeal against conviction; there could be none. R. v. Surrey Justices and Bell (1) was cited to us in this court in support of the proposition for which it was used in the court of quarter sessions. In my view, however, it has no bearing whatever upon a case in which there is no appeal against conviction, but an appeal against sentence only under s. 25 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925; and it is no part of the duty of the appeal committee of quarter sessions to quash a conviction where there is no appeal against it. The circumstances of that case and the present case are quite different, and I feel that a consideration of the change in law made by the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, would have obviated any such argument. The justices should consider such evidence as is put before them. If they had not sufficient evidence to deal with the matter of sentence, which was all that was before them, they could have adopted the suggestion of adjourning the case until there was representation on the other side satisfactory to them, and then all the facts could have been put before them.

Rules absolute.

Re A DEBTOR (No. 591 of 1934). Ex Parte THE DEBTOR v. PETITIONING CREDITORS AND OFFICIAL RECEIVER

[Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Romer and Maugham, L.JJ.), January 18, 1935]

Bankruptcy—Petition—Hearing—Duty of court—Proof of debt, service and of act of bankruptcy—Unconscionable moneylending transactions—Moneylenders Act, 1927 (17 & 18 Geo. 5, c. 21), s. 10—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 5 (2)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 171.

In bankruptcy proceedings it is of primary importance that the registrar should comply strictly with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 5 (2), and the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 171, regarding proof of the matters stated in the petition. Furthermore, it is the duty of the court under the Moneylenders Acts, 1900 and 1927, to consider, with a view to re-opening it, any moneylending transaction to which the debtor is a party and which is harsh and unconscionable, and no agreement between the parties can relieve the court of that duty. A full note of these matters should be made in case of an appeal.

Notes. For material rule, see now Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, r. 167 (1).

Appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Warmington made on Dec. 4, 1934. The facts so far as any facts are material are stated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

G. F. Kingham for the debtor.

T. F. Davis for the petitioning creditors.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—It is by no means clear that certain important principles of the bankruptcy court have been duly observed in this case.

The debtor failed to comply with a bankruptcy notice which had been issued by a creditor who was different from the petitioning creditors, the respondents to this appeal. He had committed an act of bankruptcy and the petitioning creditors took advantage of the fact that he had committed an act of bankruptcy by presenting a petition in bankruptcy on June 21, 1934. The petition states facts, but facts to which very important additions, in our opinion, ought to have been made.

The petition is presented by two creditors—Louis Sherwood and the Dunn Trust, Ltd., in respect of the sum of £1,683 14s. With regard to the Sherwood claim, there was an aggregate sum of £1,156 2s. 10d. that was due for a principal sum of £1,150 advanced and interest at 5 per cent., and there was also some further interest under s. 9 (1) of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, for the sum of £160 2s. 2d. which was recoverable in bankruptcy only if all the other creditors had been paid in full. That was interest at the rate of 60 per cent. With regard to the Dunn Trust, Ltd., the claim was for a sum of £527 11s. 2d. advanced, with 5 per cent. interest, and there was a postponed claim in respect of interest payable at 240 per cent. per annum.

In addition to those facts, it ought to have been made clear to the court that with regard to the portion of the sum of £1,156 judgment had been given by the master for £580 and £5 8s. 4d. There was leave to defend as to the rest, and there had been a stay of execution in respect of the £580 for which judgment had been given. The matter went before DU PARCQ, J., who confirmed the order of the master, and granted a stay of execution until an appeal to the Court of Appeal, and that appeal was not determined until July 26, 1934.

With regard to the Dunn Trust, Ltd., in which there was a judgment, there was a contest, and the sum for which judgment was given was £130 and no more. Therefore, as the facts stood on the day when the petition was presented, namely, on June 21, the position was that, although there were these claims made by these two petitioning creditors, the total amount for which at that time there was an available debt was £130 and no more due to the Dunn Trust, Ltd. More than that, it would appear from a statement made, that in both cases the matters arose out of transactions in which provision was made for the payment of interest at a sum exceeding 48 per cent., and, therefore, requiring the duty of the court to be exercised in accordance with s. 10 of the Moneylenders Act. That duty cannot be evaded by any admission or consent which is given by any one of the parties. That is made clear in Mills Conduit Investment, Ltd. v. Leslie and Denholm (1), and I desire to re-state the observations which were made in the judgment given by the court ([1932] 1 K.B. at p. 239):

> "The consent of the parties cannot relax the duty or lessen the powers of the court. . . . Although the parties have made their own agreement, it is still the duty of the court to observe, respect, and carry out the direction in s. 10 and to presume that in this case the interest is excessive and the transaction harsh and unconscionable until the contrary is proved."

By the effect of the Moneylenders Acts of 1900 and 1927 the Bankruptcy Court is charged with the duty of respecting and carrying out the terms of the Moneylenders Act, 1927.

When the matter went before the registrar, as it did on July 17, the stay of execution in respect of the whole of the claim of Louis Sherwood was still effective, and the only debt which at that time was available was this sum of £130 due to the Dunn Trust, Ltd. We have got a note which seems imperfect; the note of the registrar is this:

> "The debt and act of bankruptcy admitted, attendance of petitioning creditors dispensed with."

It may be that that note was only made for the registrar's own purpose and without thought of making a record for the Court of Appeal, but it is not a very useful record when produced in the Court of Appeal. In all cases the court would want to be satisfied that the terms of s. 5 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, have not been overlooked, that section saying that:

> "At the hearing the court shall require proof of the debt of the petitioning creditor, of the service of the petition, and of the act of bankruptcy, or, if more than one act of bankruptcy is alleged in the petition, of some one of the alleged acts of bankruptcy, and, if satisfied with the proof, may make a receiving order in pursuance of the petition."

Rule 171 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, carries out the terms of s. 5 (2), because the terms of it are as follows:

> "On the appearance of the debtor to show cause against the petition, the petitioning creditor's debt, and the act of bankruptcy, or such of those matters as the debtor shall have given notice that he intends to dispute, shall be proved. . . ."

I have specifically called attention to these rules because on July 13 there was filed a notice to dispute, and that notice to dispute has in terms stated that there was a stay of execution in respect of the Louis Sherwood debt, and that with regard to the Dunn Trust, Ltd., only £130 was due. Inasmuch as the note is not perfect, I will say no more, but I do call the attention of the registrar and of all other persons to the importance of observing and complying with s. 5 (2), and r. 171, and of making a note that they have been complied with. I also call attention to the fact that any admission is not sufficient in bankruptcy proceedings; the court is acting not merely inter partes but in the public interest, and, that being so, the court has a public function and duty to perform and is bound to perform it.

A There was an adjournment until July 31. By that time an order had been made in the Court of Appeal dismissing the appeal in the Louis Sherwood case with the consequence that the stay of execution had come to an end. The notice of opposition was withdrawn; what exactly that means I do not know. It may have been sufficient for the registrar to advise himself, but inasmuch as these cases are not to be decided inter partes, we would have liked to have had a more precise record of what was intended. B After that there are adjournments made, I suppose in consequence of some suggestions now made and recorded in an affidavit, that the debtor would be able to pay if certain ventures in which he was engaged ended satisfactorily. We are told now that the additional facts in respect of these two debts were stated to the registrar and that he was thus informed of them. Again, I think it would have been more useful, having regard to these additional facts being drawn to the attention of the court, if the note had C contained a statement that that information had been given. The matter was further adjourned on different dates, and finally until Dec. 24, when the situation, so far as one could see, had not changed, and the receiving order was made. From that receiving order an appeal was brought before this court, and counsel for the debtor was anxious to withdraw the appeal and only asked for a stay of the advertisement.

Having regard to the matters which were revealed in the course of this petition, we D were not satisfied to accede to that application without a further investigation. I hope that in future attention will be drawn to the importance both of proof of the debt and to a more ample and complete statement being made of the exact situation in respect of matters which are before another court, and that attention will be given as to whether or not the duty of the Bankruptcy Court in respect of the Moneylenders Act has or has not been complied with. Now that the matter has been cleared up I think there is no E sufficient ground for interfering with the registrar's decision and the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

[Chancery Division (Farwell, J.), October 31, 1935]

Lunatic—Intestate—Devolution of real property—Person who otherwise would have taken under former law illegitimate on Jan. 1, 1926—Legitimation on Jan. 1, 1927—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 23), s. 51 (2)—Legitimacy Act, 1926 (16 & 17 Geo. 5, c. 60), s. 3 (1).

The Administration of Estates Act, 1925, by s. 45 (1) abolished all pre-existing rules of descent of real and personal estate of persons dying after the commencement of the Act. By s. 51 (2), where a lunatic dies intestate, his or her real estate shall "devolve in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of this Act applicable to freehold land, and that law shall, notwithstanding any repeal, apply to the case."

A person of unsound mind died on Feb. 22, 1933, intestate, a spinster, without brothers or sisters of the whole blood. M. A. claimed to be the sole next of kin of the whole blood, and, therefore, by reason of the general law in force before the commencement of the Act of 1925 applicable to freehold land, to be the sole heir at law of the intestate and solely entitled to her freehold land. M. A. had, however, been born out of lawful wedlock, and by the law in force before the Act of 1925 was not entitled to inherit the property of any intestate. She contended that by reason of s. 1 (1) the Legitimacy Act, 1926, which came into force on Jan. 1, 1927, she had from that date become a legitimate person, her parents having married in 1900, and that, by s. 3 (1) of that Act, she became entitled to take any interest "in the estate of an intestate dying after the date of legitimation . . . in like manner as if" she "had been born legitimate," and, therefore, that under s. 51 (2) of the Act of 1925 she was entitled to the real property of the intestate under the old law as if she had been born legitimate.

Held: in order that M. A. should succeed she would have to show that the Legitimacy Act, 1926, must be construed as having repealed s. 51 (2) of the 1925 Act; it was, however, well settled that the court did not construe a later Act as repealing an earlier Act unless it was impossible to make the two Acts stand together, and there was no such inconsistency between s. 3 (1) of the 1926 Act and s. 51 (2) of the 1925 Act as would compel the court to hold that the 1926 Act impliedly repealed s. 51 (2) of the earlier Act; and, therefore, M. A. was not a person capable of taking under the general law in force before the commencement of the 1925 Act, and so was not entitled to the real property of the deceased.

Adjourned Summons

Elizabeth M. Berrey, a person of unsound mind, died on Feb. 22, 1933, intestate, a spinster without parents or brother or sister of the whole blood. Her nearest relatives surviving her were (i) Walter F. Berrey, the first defendant, and (ii) Mabel Allchurch, the second defendant. The first defendant was a brother of the intestate of the half blood, he having been the son of the second wife of the intestate's father, whereas the intestate was a daughter of her father's first wife. The second defendant was the sole surviving child of a deceased brother of the intestate of the whole blood.

The Administration of Estates Act, 1925, by s. 45 abolished all pre-existing rules of descent of real and personal estate of persons dying after the commencement of the Act, but the new rules of descent provided by s. 46 of the Act made no distinction between real and personal property, whereas the pre-existing rules had made that distinction. By the law in force before the commencement of the Act, including the provisions of s. 9 of the Inheritance Act, 1833, the second defendant, if she had been born in lawful wedlock, would, by reason of her descent being traced by the whole blood, have been entitled to the real estate of the intestate to the exclusion of the first defendant, who could only trace his descent by the half blood. By s. 51 (2) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, it was provided that where a lunatic died intestate his or her real estate should

> "devolve in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of this Act applicable to freehold land, and that law shall notwithstanding any repeal apply to the case."

The second defendant was born in 1885 out of lawful wedlock of her parents. Her parents married each other in 1900. By s. 1 (1) of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, which came into force on Jan. 1, 1927,

> "where the parents of an illegitimate person marry one another whether before or after the commencement of this Act, the marriage shall . . . render that person if living legitimate from the date of this Act or from the date of the marriage whichever last happens."

By s. 3 (1) of the same Act

> "a legitimated person and his spouse, children, or more remote issue shall be entitled to take any interest—(a) in the estate of an intestate dying after the date of legitimation . . . in like manner as if the legitimated person had been born legitimate."

By operation of the provisions of the above Act the second defendant became a legitimated person on Jan. 1, 1927. She claimed that, as she had become legitimate before the date of the death of the intestate in 1933, she was entitled to the real estate of the intestate by operation of s. 51 (2) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. On the other hand, the first defendant claimed that as s. 51 (2) of that Act provided that the intestate's real estate should devolve in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of the Act applicable to freehold land, and as there was included in such law the rule that no person born out of lawful wedlock was capable of inheriting any property of an intestate, the fact that the second defendant became legitimate by reason of a law passed subsequently to the commencement of the 1925 Act could not alter the fact that she was not entitled by the earlier law to inherit the intestate's estate, and, therefore, he (the first defendant) alone was entitled to the real estate.

This summons was taken by the administratrix of the intestate for the determination of the question whether the second defendant was capable of inheriting the real estate of the intestate.

FARWELL, J.—One Elizabeth Berrey died a spinster on Feb. 22, 1933, intestate. She was at the date of her death, and she had been for many years prior thereto, of unsound mind. The question has arisen in the administration of her estate, as to the persons entitled to the freehold property which belonged to her.

There are two claimants before me, the first defendant, who would have been the person entitled to that property apart from and prior to the coming into force of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, which came into force on Jan. 1, 1927, and, secondly, a lady, the second defendant, who claims that by virtue of that Legitimacy Act, 1926, she is entitled to the property. The question depends entirely upon the construction of two or three sections of each of those Acts. The second defendant was not legitimate at the time of her birth, but by reason of the subsequent marrying of her parents she became, as from Jan. 1, 1927, legitimated and having the rights of a legitimate person save and so far as those rights are curtailed by the provisions of the Act. She claims that under that Act she is entitled to the real estate of this intestate who died of unsound mind.

The Legitimacy Act, 1926, provides in s. 1:

> "Subject to the provisions of this section, where the parents of an illegitimate > person marry . . . whether before or after the commencement of this Act, the marriage shall . . . render that person, if living, legitimate from the commencement of this Act or from the date of the marriage, whichever last happens." A

Then sub-s. (3) recites:

> "The legitimation of a person under this Act does not enable him or his spouse, children or remoter issue to take any interest in real or personal property save as is hereafter in this Act expressly provided." B

Section 3 provides for the interests which such a person may take and one of those is this:

> "Subject to the provisions of this Act, a legitimated person and his spouse, children or more remote issue shall be entitled to take any interest . . . (c) by descent under an entailed interest created after the date of legitimation."

It is said on behalf of the second defendant: Here is a person who is entitled under that C section to take an interest in the estate of this intestate because she died after the date of legitimation, and, that being so, she is the person who is now entitled to the real estate. On the other hand, the first defendant relies upon s. 51 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. That Act came into operation on Jan. 1, 1926, and, by s. 51 (2), provides:

> "The foregoing provisions of this part of this Act do not apply to any beneficial interest in real estate (not including chattels real) to which a lunatic or defective living and of full age at the commencement of this Act, and unable, by reason of his incapacity, to make a will, who thereafter dies intestate in respect of such interest without having recovered his testamentary capacity, was entitled at his death, and any such beneficial interest . . . shall . . . devolve in accordance with the E general law in force before the commencement of this Act applicable to freehold land, and that law shall, notwithstanding any repeal, apply to the case."

It is said on behalf of the first defendant that under the law as it was before the passing of the Act of 1925 a person in the position of the second defendant could not have taken any interest in the property and that the provision that the property shall "devolve in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of this Act" can F only mean that the first defendant, who, by the law in force prior to the coming into operation of the Administration of Estates Act, was entitled to the real estate, is, therefore, the person entitled now.

One has to look back and see what it is that the Administration of Estates Act is dealing with in sub-s. (2) of s. 51. Looking at s. 45 it appears:

> "With regard to the real estate and personal inheritance of every person dying G after the commencement of this Act, there shall be abolished—(a) All existing modes rules and canons of descent, and of devolution by special occupancy or otherwise, of real estate . . ."

The effect of this provision in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, is to put an end to the descent of real estate which was in force prior to the coming into operation of that H Act. It is said that the words themselves "modes rules and canons of descent" only mean that the way of descent was put an end to and that when one comes to read s. 51 (2), it does not operate in such a way as to be inconsistent with s. 3 of the Legitimacy Act, 1926. If I gave effect to that argument I should, in truth, be disregarding altogether the last words of that subsection, that is the words

> "any . . . beneficial interest . . . shall . . . devolve in accordance with the general I law in force before the commencement of this Act applicable to freehold land, and that law shall, notwithstanding any repeal, apply to the case."

In my judgment, the true construction of these sections of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, is the same, apart from the general alteration that has been made, as to the rights of persons to real and personal estate, of a person who dies intestate and of unsound mind—that is to say, in the case of an intestate who dies of unsound mind the real estate of that intestate is to pass to the persons who would have taken it under the law as it was before the commencement of this Act.

That being the true view, except for the effect of the Legitimacy Act, it is quite plain that the second defendant would have no right at all. The law did not recognise persons born out of wedlock as capable of inheritance, and the property would have devolved upon the footing that the person who was not legitimate was not entitled to come in and claim at all.

Then one comes to the Legitimacy Act of 1926, and it is true that there appears the provision in that Act that:

> "Subject to the provisions of this Act a legitimated person . . . shall be entitled to take any interest in the estate of an intestate after the date of legitimation."

Those two sections would seem at first sight possibly not to be wholly consistent, but there is no such inconsistency as would compel me to hold that there is anything in the Legitimacy Act of 1926 which in any way repeals the provisions of the earlier Act. The rule is clearly settled now—that the court does not construe a later Act as repealing an earlier Act unless it is impossible to make the two Acts stand together and the later section can only be given a sensible meaning if it is treated as impliedly repealing the section of the earlier Act. It is not necessary for me to have resort to any such construction as that. The truth of the matter is that s. 51 is leaving the persons interested in the estate of an intestate who was of unsound mind at the time of her death and prior thereto in exactly the same position as though the Administration of Estates Act had not been passed. In my judgment, it is impossible to say that the subsequent Act has the effect of bringing in and adding to the persons who under that old law would be entitled to take, the person who is not entitled to take and only became entitled, if at all, by reason of the Legitimacy Act, 1926. I come to the conclusion, although the matter is not free from doubt, that the second defendant is not entitled to the real estate, and, accordingly, that the first defendant is the person so entitled.

Order accordingly.

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—"Tenant"—Short term credit under Agricultural Credits Act, 1928*—Charge by tenant to bank of farming stock and "other agricultural assets"—Whether bank a "tenant"—Agricultural Holdings Act,* 1923 (13 & 14 Geo. 5, c. 9), s. 16 (1), s. 57 (1)—Agricultural Credits Act, 1928 (18 & 19 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 5 (7).

A tenant of a holding under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, charged to a bank his farming stock and "other agricultural assets," as defined in s. 5 (7) of the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, under the provisions for agricultural short term credits in the Act of 1928. On a claim by the bank that they were "assigns of" or an "other person deriving title from" the tenant, and so were within the definition of "tenant" in s. 57 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, and, therefore, entitled to have their claim against the landlords determined by arbitration under s. 16 (1) of the Act,

Held: the bank were not assigns of or successors to the tenancy agreement, and so were not within the definition and not entitled to arbitration under s. 16 (1).

Notes. The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, has been repealed: provision for agricultural holdings is now made by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 63), s. 94 (1) of which is in the same terms as s. 57 (1) of the 1923 Act. Section 70 (1) of the 1948 Act makes similar, but wider, provisions than s. 16 (1) of the 1923 Act for the determination by arbitration of "any claim of whatever nature by the landlord or tenant of an agricultural holding against his tenant or landlord being a claim which arises (a) under [the 1948] Act, or any custom or agreement, and (b) on or out of the termination of the tenancy of the holding or part thereof."

Appeal by the bank from a decision of the county court on a Case Stated by an arbitrator purporting to act under s. 16 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923.

At the hearing of the arbitration in the above matter the following facts were proved and admitted:

(1) The Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England (hereinafter called "the landlords") are and were at all material times the landlords of an agricultural holding known as the Manor Farm in the parishes of Leighton Bromswold and Catworth in the county of Huntingdon. The holding was let by the landlords to one Bryan Nichols (hereinafter called "the tenant") from Oct. 11, 1926, from year to year at a rent of £480 per annum. He was, however, only in occupation of 368 acres, 3 roods, 12 poles, in the parishes of Leighton Bromswold and Catworth at the material time of the arbitration. On Oct. 7, 1932, the tenant served upon the landlords a notice to quit the said holding at Michaelmas, 1933, and in pursuance of the said notice quitted the same at Michaelmas (Oct. 11), 1933.

(2) By a charge under the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, dated April 29, 1933, the tenant charged in favour of the National Provincial Bank, Ltd. (hereinafter called "the bank"), his farming stock, and "other agricultural assets" as defined in s. 5 (7) of the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928. This charge was duly registered on May 5, 1933, and became a fixed charge on Oct. 14, 1933. The bank, by virtue of its powers under the said charge, appointed a receiver of the assets comprised in the charge.

(3) On Dec. 5, 1933, a receiving order was made against the tenant, and he was duly adjudicated bankrupt, and a trustee in bankruptcy was appointed. Neither the tenant nor the trustee in bankruptcy made any claim upon the landlords arising out of the termination of the tenant's tenancy.

(4) Within two months from the termination of the tenancy the bank made a claim to the whole of the sums due from the landlords to the tenant at the termination of the tenancy free from deductions. The landlords disputed the right of the bank to make the said claim and, in any event, claimed to deduct from any sums to which the tenant was entitled at his outgoing all sums due from him (a) in respect of arrears of rent, and (b) in respect of dilapidations for which the tenant was liable under his lease. Formal statutory claims were made and their sufficiency was not disputed.

(5) The arbitrator was appointed by both parties under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. At the opening of the hearing the landlords contended that the arbitrator had no valid appointment, and he agreed to state a case for the opinion of the court as to whether his appointment was valid or not, but it was agreed by both parties, in order to save expense, that he should continue with the hearing of the case without prejudice to the landlords' contention that there could be no arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, between the landlords and the bank.

(6) It was conceded by the landlords that if the bank was the tenant within the definition contained in s. 57 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, they were liable to account to the bank, subject to a set-off which they claimed, for certain sums which were payable by them in respect of tenant-right. The amount due to the landlords in respect of arrears of rent was admitted to be £321 9s. 6d., and it was further admitted by the bank that the landlords were entitled to have such sum set off against any amount found by the arbitrator to be due from the landlords to the bank. There was also a sum due to the landlords in respect of dilapidations, but the bank denied that there was any right in the landlords to have this sum or any part thereof. No question arose in the case as to figures.

(7) Clause 26 of the tenancy agreement provided for a set-off of claims as between landlord and tenant at the expiration of the tenancy. Further, it was proved before the arbitrator and admitted by the bank that it was a custom of the county of Huntingdon that where at the expiration of the tenancy of an agricultural holding there were claims and counterclaims between the landlord and the tenant the landlord deducted from the amount due to the tenant any sums due from the tenant in respect of arrears of rent or dilapidations and that the balance, if any, was the amount recoverable by the tenant from the landlord upon the tenant's outgoing.

(8) By cl. 11 of the tenancy agreement the tenant covenanted (i) that he would keep the premises in good and substantial repair during the term, and (ii) that he would leave the premises in good and substantial repair at the termination of the tenancy. The landlords took no steps under the provisions of the tenancy agreement to enforce the provisions of the aforesaid maintenance covenant during the period of the term of the lease and no claim in respect of dilapidations was made against the tenant until after the term had expired.

(9) Fields numbered 111, 6, 7, 16, 17, 19, and 21 in the schedule to the tenancy agreement which comprised the whole of the arable land of this holding were laid down by the tenant during his tenancy to temporary pasture. The holding was let as partly arable and partly pasture and the buildings were adapted to the use of the holding as a mixed farm. The land was at all material times during the last year of tenancy out of shift.

On the aforesaid facts the landlords' contentions were:

(a) That the bank was not the tenant of the holding within the definition of "tenant" in s. 57 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923.

(b) That the bank was not entitled under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, to appoint or concur in appointing an arbitrator under that Act.

(c) That the arbitrator's appointment was invalid and of no effect.

(d) That if there was a valid arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, and in any event, the landlords were entitled by reason of cl. 26 of the tenancy agreement and (or) by the custom of the county of Huntingdon to have deducted from the amount found due by the arbitrator from them to the bank in respect of the tenant's claim the amount of £321 9s. 6d. arrears of rent and the amount found due by the arbitrator from the tenant to them in respect of dilapidations, and that the amount, if any, recoverable by the bank from the landlords was the balance, if any, after such deductions were made.

(e) That the arbitrator had the power and that it was his duty to direct and award a set-off against the amount found due to the bank of the amounts due to the landlords for arrears of rent and for dilapidations or so much thereof as was sufficient to extinguish the amount found due to the bank.

(f) That if the bank were entitled to arbitrate under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, and if the amounts found by the arbitrator to be due from the tenant to the landlords exceeded the amount found by the arbitrator to be due from the landlords to the bank in right of the tenant the balance thereof should be awarded by the arbitrator against the bank in favour of the landlords.

(g) That in refraining from enforcing the maintenance covenant referred to in para. 8 of the case during the currency of the term they had not waived the breaches thereof, and were entitled to enforce such covenant at the termination of the term.

On the aforesaid facts the contentions of the bank were:

(a) That they were assigns of the tenant, or alternatively were persons deriving title from him, and as such were entitled to appoint or concur in appointing an arbitrator under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, and that the arbitrator's appointment was valid.

(b) That the landlords, having taken no steps before the expiration of the term to enforce the tenant's liability under his maintenance covenant, namely, to keep the premises in repair, must be deemed in making their claim for dilapidations to be relying solely upon the breach of the tenant's yielding-up covenant, namely, to leave the premises in repair; alternatively, to have waived the breaches of the maintenance covenant.

(c) That the tenant's liability for breach of his covenant to leave in repair arose after the date of registration of the bank's charge.

(d) Further, that if the landlord's claim to dilapidations could be made under the maintenance covenant the landlords could not in fact prove any debt to them in that respect prior to the date of registration of the bank's charge.

(e) That, conceding the existence of the custom proved and admitted before the arbitrator, the landlords were not entitled after registration of the charge to deduct as against the bank any sums in respect of breaches of covenant by the tenant for which the tenant's liability arose after the registration of the charge;

(f) That the arbitrator had no power and no duty to direct and award a set-off save in respect of the landlord's claim for arrears of rent.

(g) That notwithstanding that the tenant was in breach of his covenant under cl. 7 of the tenancy agreement he ought to make an allowance to the bank as assignee of the tenant for the laying down of temporary pasture in fields Nos. 111, 6, 7, 16, 17, 19, and 21.

The questions of law submitted for the opinion of the court were:

(1) Was the appointment of the arbitrator under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, valid?

(2) If his appointment was valid as an arbitrator under the Act, (a) were the landlords entitled by reason of cl. 26 of the tenancy agreement and (or) by the custom of the

A county of Huntingdon to have deducted from the amount found due by the arbitrator from them to the bank in respect of the tenant's claim the amount found due by the arbitrator from the tenant to the landlords in respect of dilapidations, and was the amount, if any, recoverable by the bank from the landlords the balance, if any, after such deduction, together with a deduction in respect of arrears of rent, was made?

(b) Had the arbitrator the power and was it his duty to direct and award a set-off B against the amount found due to the bank of the amounts due to the landlords for arrears of rent and for dilapidations or so much thereof as was sufficient to extinguish the amount found due to the bank? (c) And if the amounts found by the arbitrator to be due from the tenant to the landlords exceeded the amount found due by him from the landlords to the bank in right of the tenant was it his duty to award such balance against the bank in favour of the landlords, and if not, how was he to deal with such C balance, if any, in his award?

The county court judge decided that there was no valid submission to arbitration, as the bank never were "tenants" of the holding within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. The charge on which the arbitration was based in no way vested the land or the benefit of the contract of tenancy in the bank, and as s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1923 only provided for arbitration between landlord and tenant, it followed that the D appointment of the arbitrator was invalid. On the other issues stated by the case, consideration was reserved.

The bank appealed.

The Agricultural Credits Act, 1927, provided:

> Section 5: "(7) For the purposes of this Part of this Act . . . 'other agricultural assets' means a tenant's right to compensation under the Agricultural Holdings E Act, 1923, for improvements, damage by game, disturbance or otherwise, and any other tenant right."

The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, provided:

> Section 16: "(1) Any question or difference arising out of any claim by the tenant of a holding against the landlord for compensation payable under this Act, F or for any such sums claimed to be due to the tenant from the landlord for any breach of contract or otherwise in respect of the holding, or out of any claim by the landlord against the tenant for waste wrongly committed or permitted by the tenant or for any breach of contract or otherwise in respect of the holding, and any other question or difference of any kind whatsoever between the landlord and the tenant of the holding arising out of the termination of the tenancy of the holding or G arising, whether during the tenancy or on the termination thereof, as to the construction of the contract of tenancy, and any other question which, under this Act, is referred to arbitration, shall be determined, notwithstanding any agreement under the contract of tenancy or otherwise providing for a different method of arbitration, by a single arbitrator in accordance with the provisions set out in the Second Schedule to this Act."
> H Section 57: "(1) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . 'tenant' means the holder of land under a contract of tenancy and includes the executors, administrators, assigns, guardian, committee of the estate or trustee in bankruptcy of a tenant, or other person deriving title from a tenant."

GREER, L.J.—In this case the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., are entitled to a charge made under the provisions of the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, upon "the agricultural assets" of a farmer named Bryan Nichols, the tenant of a holding under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. "Other agricultural assets" are defined by s. 5 (7) of the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, in these terms:

> "'Other agricultural assets' means a tenant's right to compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, for improvements, damage by game, disturbance or otherwise, and any other tenant right."

There can be no doubt that either under the provisions of that Act, or apart from that Act, a farmer can pledge to his bank his agricultural assets as so defined by the Act of 1928; but it does not follow from that that the assignee of those agricultural assets becomes the "tenant" within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, so as to entitle him to arbitration: the convenient method of having a tenant's rights determined with reference to, amongst other things, tenant right, and his right to compensation under the provisions of the Act of 1923. That statute, in s. 57 (1), defines "tenant" in these terms:

> "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . 'tenant' means the holder of land under a contract of tenancy, and includes the executors, administrators, assigns, guardian, committee of the estate, or trustee in bankruptcy, of a tenant or other person deriving a title from a tenant."

I cannot regard that definition as including those who are merely assignees of the assets of a tenant and not assigness of his tenancy agreement. For these reasons, on the question which was by the consent of both parties propounded for the decision of the county court judge, the landlords were right and the bank were wrong, and this appeal, therefore, must be dismissed.

Then the question arises as to whether, under these circumstances, these proceedings from the very commencement were null and void. There was no jurisdiction in the arbitrator either to determine the facts or to state a case. There was no jurisdiction in the judge to come to a determination on the Case Stated. There is, therefore, no jurisdiction in this court to deal with the matter at all, but I think that the appellants in this case, who have appealed on this question, ought not to be allowed to take a point of that sort and deprive this court of the power to order them to pay the costs of the appeal. The order will be that the appeal is dismissed with costs.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case arises out of a tenancy of an agricultural holding granted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England to one Bryan Nichols, to hold from Oct. 11, 1926, from year to year. By a charge under the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, dated April 29, 1933, the tenant charged in favour of the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., who are the appellants here, his farming stock and "other agricultural assets" as defined in s. 5 (7) of the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928. The charge was duly registered on May 5 of that year, and by notice from the bank became a fixed charge on Oct. 14, 1933, and the bank on the same date appointed a receiver of the assets comprised in the charge. The tenant was in difficulties. On Dec. 5 a receiving order was made against him, he was adjudicated a bankrupt in due course and a trustee in bankruptcy was appointed. Within two months from the termination of the tenancy the bank under their charge made a claim to the whole of the sums due from the landlords to the tenant at the termination of the tenancy free from deductions. That claim has been disputed, and in particular the landlords claim to deduct arrears of rent and divers sums for dilapidations, for which the tenant was liable under his lease. An arbitrator was appointed under the Act by both parties. The matter comes before us on a special Case Stated by the arbitrator. It has been before the learned county court judge, who has decided that there was no valid submission to arbitration by reason of the fact that the bank never were "tenants" of the holding within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. That depends upon the definition of a "tenant" in s. 57 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. The word "tenant" is defined as meaning

> "the holder of land under a contract of tenancy"—that certainly does not include the bank—"and includes the executors, administrators, assigns, guardian, committee of the estate, or trustee in bankruptcy, of a tenant, or other person deriving title from a tenant."

To my mind there is not a single word in that part of the definition which begins with the words "and includes," which points to the conclusion that "tenant" is intended to include a person who is not in any true sense a tenant or the assign of a tenant in any ordinary meaning of the word, or that it includes either a mere assign of farming stock

A or agricultural assets or a person who happens to be an assign of a right to compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923.

There seems to me to be a number of difficulties in holding that, although the words do not point to a person or a company in the position of the bank, yet they ought to be held to include such a person. A tenant who is making a claim under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, against his landlord is, of course, liable to have all sorts of counter- B claims made against him, and s. 16 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, clearly points to the fact that any counterclaim, so to speak, by the landlord has to be referred to arbitration in just the same way as the claim of the tenant. I will not read the section, but almost every line of it shows that that is the case, and it is quite clear that the arbitrator has to decide by whom a sum on balance is to be paid. The object of the bank here in bringing their claim in the way in which they have, as assigns of the tenant, C without having the trustee in bankruptcy or the original tenant before the arbitrator, admittedly has been based on the hope that they will thereby be entitled to obtain by virtue of a charge on the right to compensation, payment of the amount due by the landlord without allowing the landlord to make the counterclaim which he is justified in making under s. 16 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. It is sufficient, as my lord has pointed out, to decide that such a person as the bank is not a "tenant" within the D meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, and is therefore not entitled to arbitrate in his own name, as he has sought to do. I will only add that I conceive there are the very greatest difficulties in holding that a person who may be only an assign of some portion of the right to compensation payable to the tenant is entitled to the alleged rights which he claims here, not suing in equity in the name of the tenant or his assign and not making the tenant or his assign a party to the proceedings. Supposing the E lease were assigned to one person and the charge of "agricultural assets" were vested in some other person, how, in the absence of both parties, including the person who really is either the tenant or his assign in the usual sense, could the suggested arbitration take place? It seems to me reasonably clear that the bank is not a "tenant" within the meaning of the subsection, and that, therefore, these proceedings will not lie. I will only add that if proceedings take place in reliance on an equitable assignment it will be F well for the bank to remember that an assignee of moneys to arise under a contract (and a tenancy is a contract) will only be entitled to them subject to the conditions of the contract itself; and the advisers of the bank will no doubt consider the judgment of the Privy Council in Newfoundland Government v. Newfoundland Rail. Co. (1); I agree that this appeal must fail, with the consequences mentioned by my lord.

G ROCHE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. The bank, who are appellants, were entitled to the benefit of an agricultural charge made under the short term credit provisions of the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928. The farmer who gave them the charge went bankrupt and also went out of the farm of which he was tenant. Certain of the assets situate on the farm had been charged in favour of the bank. Thereupon the bank preferred a claim which was, I will not say misconceived, because I dare H say the bank were quite aware of the difficulties that attended the making and prosecution of such a claim, that as they were entitled under their charge to the benefit of the agricultural assets of the tenant, which included his tenant right, therefore they could proceed, by way of arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, to assert in their own name, and without the concurrence of the tenant, a claim under the Act and otherwise through an arbitration independent altogether of the rights of the tenant, in I the sense that the bank claimed to take all the benefits to which the tenant might be entitled as an outgoing tenant from his landlord without giving credit for any of the outgoings or dilapidations to which the claim of the tenant would be subject.

For the reasons given by GREER and MAUGHAM, L.JJ., such a claim is, in my opinion, altogether untenable and no such arbitration by virtue of an independent right is open to the bank. I should be surprised indeed if in an arbitration, any more than in equity, the bank, or the persons entitled to the benefit of a charge, should get any such rights as were claimed in this action. I agree also as to the costs of the proceedings, because the effect of what was done was that all parties asked the arbitrator to do what he otherwise could not do, decide as a preliminary point the extent of his own jurisdiction, and asked that a case should be stated by the arbitrator for the consideration of the county court judge and ultimately for the consideration of this court. In those circumstances the proper order seems to be that those who have failed should pay the costs of the proceedings.

Appeal dismissed.

BROWN AND OTHERS v. MONMOUTHSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Slesser and Romer, L.JJ.), March 11, 1935]

Medical Practitioner—Midwifery—Medical assistance summoned by midwife—Doctor's right to fee—Midwives Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 14 (1).

Section 14 (1) of the Midwives Act, 1918, provided that in the case of an emergency a midwife should call to her assistance a registered medical practitioner, "and the local supervising authority shall pay to such medical practitioner a sufficient fee . . . according to a scale to be fixed by the [Minister of Health]."

Held: under the subsection the only power given to the Minister was a power to fix the scale of fees, and a direction to local supervising authorities in a circular issued by him that in specified cases no fee should be paid was ultra vires.

Notes. The Midwives Act, 1918, was repealed by the Midwives Act, 1951, s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1918 being substantially reproduced in s. 14 (1) and (2) of the Act of 1951.

As to the law relating to midwives, see 22 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 363 et seq., and for cases, see 34 DIGEST 564, 565. For Midwives Act, 1951, see 30 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 246.

Appeals from Newport (Mon.) County Court.

The plaintiffs, four doctors, had claimed in the county court fees in respect of services rendered to midwives who had called them in in cases of emergency. Section 14 (1) of the Midwives Act, 1918, provided that midwives should call in a doctor in the case of an emergency and that the local supervising authority should pay to him a sufficient fee with due allowance for mileage, according to a scale to be fixed by the Local Government Board and, later, the Ministry of Health. On Dec. 20, 1922, the Ministry sent out a circular containing what purported to be a scale of doctors' fees under the Act, cl. 8 of which provided that no fee should be payable by the local supervising authority, inter alia, where the doctor attended the patient under arrangement with the patient or any club, medical institute, or other association of which the patient or her husband was a member. In three cases there was an agreement under which the doctors concerned were retained by the Ebbw Vale Workmen's Medical Society to act as the doctors to that society. The plaintiff, Dr. Brown, had no written agreement, but attended persons who participated in a poundage system under which in certain circumstances they were entitled to the services of a medical man, which included midwifery attendance. The local supervising authority having refused to pay fees to the plaintiffs, the question arose whether cl. 8 was ultra vires the Minister of Health, and, therefore, under s. 14 a sufficient fee must be paid by the local supervising authority to the doctors. The county court judge decided in favour of the local authority on the ground that, if the

A local authority were satisfied, on considering what was a sufficient fee within the meaning of s. 14, that the plaintiffs had already been adequately remunerated in some other way, no fee should be payable because the quantum of remuneration had been ascertained and thus the question of sufficiency had been dealt with. The plaintiffs appealed.

H. C. Dickens for the appellants.

B R. G. Micklethwaite for the respondent council.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—These four cases involve a consideration of complex statutes and rules, and we have been assisted on both sides by a helpful argument. The problem that we have to determine is whether the circular letter which prescribes certain fees is in a certain part of it, namely, cl. 8, valid and intra vires.

The question arises upon certain facts which I must state. These are appeals by four C doctors who are appealing from a decision given by the learned county court judge in favour of the Monmouthshire County Council. Each of these doctors sought to recover certain fees outstanding and payable to him in respect of services he had rendered to midwives who had been faced with serious difficulties in attending upon mothers. The learned county court judge finds this, and I state it at once:

> D "In this case no question was raised as to the fact of an emergency not having arisen. It was admitted that in each of the cases the calling in of the doctor was proper, and that, if the claim of the plaintiffs was lawfully made, there would be no question at all about the amount or matters of that kind."

I must, therefore, state shortly why those findings are of importance. In 1902 there was a statute passed called the Midwives Act which was to secure the better training of E midwives and to regulate their practice. A plan was arranged under which they were to be certified, and there was to be a roll of those who were certified and rules were to be framed which, if approved by the Privy Council, were to be valid, and there was to be throughout the country a local supervision of midwives by means of the council of a county or a county borough. After that a further Act was passed, the Midwives Act of 1918, which further implemented the principle which had originally led to the passing F of the 1902 Act. I ought to have said that the Central Midwives Board was not constituted under the 1918 Act; it was amended, but was originally constituted under the Act of 1902. There were certain sections which dealt with the power of local supervising authorities to provide medical assistance in cases of emergency. I think the keynote of both these statutes is this, that it is to the interest of the State that a mother and her child should be so treated in the matter of child-bearing that the mother should G not be injured, but should be restored to health, and that the child should not suffer the disability which may arise by reason of parturition. That is the principle of it. Under s. 14 there is power for the midwife to obtain medical assistance in case of emergency. I will read the first subsection:

> "In case of any emergency, as defined in the rules framed under s. 3 (1) (e) of the [Act of 1902], a midwife shall call in to her assistance a registered medical practi-H tioner, and the local supervising authority shall pay to such medical practitioner a sufficient fee, with due allowance for mileage, according to a scale to be fixed by the Local Government Board."

That power of the midwife to call to her assistance a medical practitioner carries out the important and underlying feature of the Acts to which I have referred.

I In the present cases, in accordance with the passage I have read from the judgment, there was an emergency; there was a proper demand made by the midwives for the assistance of the doctors who rendered medical aid and who became entitled to the sums which were sued for by them. Dr. Brown sued for £21, Dr. Thom for 8 guineas, Dr. Partridge for 3 guineas and Dr. Buckley for 8 guineas as owing in respect of those services. Section 14 would seem to be explicit in its terms. There is a duty upon the midwife to call in the assistance of the medical practitioner, and, that assistance being rendered, there is a duty upon the local supervising authority to pay such medical practitioner a fee, a sufficient fee, with due allowance for mileage, according to a scale to be fixed by the Local Government Board, and a scale of fees for doctors called in by midwives was made. The circular I have before me—circular 358—is dated Dec. 20, 1922, and on the back of it it contains the scale: (1) Is a fee for all attendances of a doctor at parturition; (2) a fee for the attendance of a second doctor to give an anæsthetic; (3) a fee for suturing the perineum; (4) a fee for attendance at, or in connection with, an abortion or miscarriage; (5) a fee for visits to the mother and (or) child; (6) the usual mileage fee of the district to be paid for all attendances, and (7) fee for attendance on mother and (or) child at the doctor's residence or surgery. Clause (8) provides:

> "No fee shall be payable by the local supervising authority (1) where the doctor has agreed to attend the patient under arrangement made by or on behalf of the patient or by any club, medical institute or other association of which the patient or her husband is a member, or when the doctor is under obligation to give the treatment to the patient under the National Health Insurance Acts, 1911 to 1922; (2) where the doctor receives or agrees to receive a fee from the patient or her representative; (3) in respect of any services performed by the doctor on any date later than the tenth day from the date of his first attendance, unless he has reported to the local supervising authority that he considers, for reasons stated by him, that his further attendance is necessary."

It strikes one as curious that one should find a definite determination of certain cases where no fee is to be payable in a table which is prepared of the fees which are to be payable and the scale of which is to be fixed by the Local Government Board under s.14 (1). The local supervising authority is not of its own motion to determine that in certain cases no fee will be paid. What s. 14 demands of them is that they shall pay to a medical practitioner a sufficient fee in cases where they have been properly called in by the midwife, and that fee which shall be paid is one to be fixed by the Local Government Board, and was so fixed. Clause 8 seems to go on to determine other matters which do not properly belong, and ought not to be appended to, a mere scale of fees. It is quite true that sub-s. (4) of s. 14 gives the local supervising authority > "power to recover the fee from the patient or from the husband or other person liable to maintain the patient either summarily or otherwise as a civil debt, unless it be shown to their satisfaction that the patient or her husband or such other person is unable by reason of poverty to pay such fee."

It will be noted that the authority is given power to recover the fee, but the duty is not laid upon it in all cases to recover the fee. There is in the later portion of the subsection a prohibition against their suing and attempting to recover the fee where the person who would have been sued is unable by reason of poverty to pay such fee. Clause 8 seems by anticipation to determine matters which may be suitable for consideration when proceedings are taken under the power given by sub-s. (4) to recover the fee from the patient, but which ought not to be determined and cannot be determined beforehand and added to a scale of fees which, in the first instance, are definitely to be paid to the medical practitioner who has rendered assistance.

With regard to these four cases, in the first three of them it was suggested that there was an agreement under which the plaintiffs were retained as the doctors by the Ebbw Vale Workmen's Medical Society, an approved society, to act as doctors to that society and each to give, under cl. 2,

> "to all persons on his list who are for the time being entitled to obtain treatment from him such treatment as is of a kind which can consistently with the best interest of the patient be properly undertaken by a general medical practitioner of ordinary professional competence and skill."

I do not think it is necessary finally to determine the point, but, having regard to cl. 10 under which the doctor is to comply with and to be subject to the regulations and conditions prevailing under the National Health Insurance Acts, it appears to me that that agreement relates to such medical benefit as comes directly under the National Health Insurance Acts, because the last words of cl. 10 are "in respect of insured persons who are entitled to medical benefits from the society." "Medical benefit" is defined in s. 10 of the consolidating Act of 1924 and medical benefit under s. 12 is to be administered by and through the Insurance Committee. It is true that in some societies it is possible to have additional benefits beyond the medical benefits. It may be contended that by sub-s. (1) (e) of s. 10 one of the additional benefits which are catalogued in Sched. III may introduce the benefit of midwifery, because in that schedule sub-cl (14) says,

> "such other additional benefits being of the same character as any of those hereinbefore mentioned as shall be prescribed."

But I think, when one bears in mind the distinction between "medical benefit" and "additional benefit" and then turns to look at this typical agreement between the doctor and the approved society, it would seem that the agreement related to the medical benefit and not otherwise. This approved society can give the benefit of midwifery, but only allow the doctor a fee of not more than 10s. 6d. The learned judge has held that there would be the possibility of the doctors recovering from these patients whom they attended because these patients were persons who were entitled, as I understand, to benefit under the Act, and, therefore, he held, inasmuch as that was so, that the doctors would receive a sufficient fee, and he held that the word "sufficient" was interpreted as to whether or not there was some other source from which the fee could be obtained. I cannot accept that view. It appears to me that the "sufficient" fee there is only intended to lay down that in propounding the scale of fees for the doctors called in by midwives the doctors shall be properly remunerated for the services that they render and that it has no relation to another source from which a payment may be made.

In the case of Dr. Buckley he was not a person who had any agreement at all; his position was different. It was said he was a person who had no written agreement, but he attended to a number of persons who participated in a poundage system under which in given circumstances they were entitled to the services of a medical man, and that the poundage system included midwifery attendance. It was said that the evidence called before the learned county court judge justified a finding that under the poundage system Dr. Buckley would be entitled to be remunerated by the persons who adhered to the poundage system, and, therefore, that he came within the prohibition of the payment of a fee by a person under cl. 8, r. 1, because he was a doctor who had agreed to attend the patient under an arrangement made > "on behalf of the patient or by any club, medical institute or other association of which the patient or her husband is a member."

Curiously enough the learned county court judge did not give a separate judgment in the case of Dr. Buckley, and it is necessary in his case to determine, not merely what is the meaning of the word "sufficient," but also whether or not this prohibition in cl. 8, r. 1, does prevent his recovering.

For the reasons I have already given, I have come to the conclusion that cl. 8 is ultra vires. It forms no necessary part of the establishment of a scale of fees for the doctors; it seeks in advance to determine matters which may ultimately arise under sub-s. (4), and, in spite of the claim of counsel for the local authority that it stands good, I have come to the conclusion that cl. 8 is bad and ultra vires and cannot be supported, with the result that we have left the definite duty laid upon the local authority of paying to the medical practitioner a fee which is to be a "sufficient fee." What is a "sufficient fee" is laid down in the scale to which I have referred.

For these reasons the appeal must be allowed with costs and judgment must be entered in each case with costs for the sum for which the suit was brought.

SLESSER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it useful at the outset to state what I understand the learned county court judge to have decided. The learned county court judge seems to me to have come to a conclusion in favour of the local authority on a consideration of s. 14 sub-ss. (1) and (4) in particular, irrespective altogether of the conditions as to the scale of fees which have been prescribed by the central authority, the Ministry of Health. He refers to the fact that the statute provides for the payment of a "sufficient" fee, and continues:

> "If, when the local authority comes to consider what is a sufficient fee, they are satisfied that the medical gentleman concerned has already been adequately > remunerated in some other way, then no fee at all should be payable because the quantum of remuneration has been ascertained by reference to the poundage payments" A

—he might have added, "and also the agreements in the cases of the other doctors"—"and thus the question of sufficiency has been dealt with."

In my opinion, in coming to that conclusion, the learned judge was wrong. I do not think that the question of sufficiency is one which the local authority had any B power to determine at all. The only discretion under s. 14 (1) which is given to the local authority is with regard to the allowance for mileage; the sufficiency of the fee is determined, to quote the language of the statute, "according to a scale to be fixed by the Local Government Board." In this case, as my Lord has said, these registered medical practitioners had, on the findings of the learned county court judge, done everything which primâ facie gives them a right to be paid their fees, and the only question, there- C fore, which can arise is whether those fees are payable to them according to a scale to be fixed by the Local Government Board. So that the considerations which the learned county court judge allowed himself to consider on this head when regarding the sufficiency of the fee, that these gentlemen might be said to have been already remunerated under the arrangements which they had made with the patient or with the patient's husband, give no power, in my view, to enable him to find in favour of the local authority. D

But counsel for the authority is, of course, entitled to uphold the judgment which he has obtained on the grounds other than those which commended themselves to the learned county court judge. The learned county court judge appears to have agreed with counsel for the plaintiffs that the conditions on which counsel for the authority is otherwise forced to rely, if he cannot rely upon the judgment, are ultra vires, but counsel says that is wrong, and you must regard the conditions here as intra vires. Those E conditions are contained in cl. 8 of a circular letter that was sent to the local authorities, and is said to have an appended scale of fees which the Ministry of Health had prescribed for the payment by local supervising authorities to medical practitioners called in by midwives under s. 14 of the Midwives Act, 1918. We were not favoured with the original circular, but so far as I can understand from the prefatory memorandum on this circular of Dec. 20, 1922, it looks as if the third condition of cl. 8, namely, that the doctor F shall not be entitled to a fee in respect of any services performed by him

> "on any date later than the tenth day from the date of his first attendance unless he has reported to the local supervising authority" in a proper manner subject to certain conditions, was for the first time inserted in the circular of Dec. 20, 1922. The other two conditions which are material conditions in G this case, Nos. 1 and 2, to which my Lord has referred, appear to have been in the original circular. In my opinion, the learned judge was right if he came to the conclusion that those conditions were ultra vires, and whether he did or did not decisively so come to that conclusion I think they are ultra vires. Section 14 (1) gives power to the Local Government Board, now the Ministry of Health, to fix a scale of fees. I cannot see that it gives any other power at all. It is not suggested that there is any general H power of making regulations or conditions on which fees may or may not fall to be paid, but it is significant that in sub-s. (2) of s. 14 there is imposed by the statute in terms a condition. It says:

> "It shall be a condition of the payment of such fee that the medical practitioner so called in shall state in his claim to the local supervising authority the nature of the emergency." I

It is, of course, not conclusive, but it supports my view that the imposition of any other conditions to this scale is ultra vires, and that where the legislature has thought fit to make a condition of the payment of a fee it has so stated in terms.

For these reasons, I agree that this clause is ultra vires, and if the clause be ultra vires, and if the sufficiency of the fee be fixed by the clause, it follows that there is no ground except that of inconvenience which can be urged against the grammatical and natural construction of the section. It is said that these persons here paying may be called upon to pay twice over, but it is to be noticed that the obligation which is placed by the statute to call in the doctor is an obligation placed upon the midwife under the regulations of the Central Midwives Board. The midwife, in my opinion, is probably acting as the agent of the local supervising authority, constituted under s. 8 of the Act of 1902, and there is no contractual relation thereby constituted between the patient or the patient's husband and the doctor. Whatever arrangements they may or may not have thought fit to make by contract or any other system seems to me entirely outside this statutory obligation on the local authority to pay a doctor called in under the statute by their agent, the midwife, and, therefore, I do not think that the class of cases which deals with inconveniences and difficulties arising under the construction of a statute can be extended to cases where such inconvenience that may arise is one dealing with general policy or contractual arrangements outside the statute altogether. If arrangements are to be made, short of legislation altering the present position, they can be made by altering the contractual relations between these persons and the local clubs or associations or between the doctors and those people, and possibly, as my Lord is inclined to construe the agreement as it stands, by excluding midwifery altogether from such contracts.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree that cl. 8 of the Regulations made by the Ministry of Health in the scale of fees for doctors called in by midwives was ultra vires that Ministry, and I can state my reasons for arriving at that conclusion in comparatively few words. Section 14 (1) of the Act, as has been pointed out, provides that any registered medical practitioner who is called in for the assistance of a midwife in cases of emergency shall be paid by the local supervising authority a sufficient fee for his services. The subsection goes on to say "with due allowance for mileage according to a scale to be fixed by the Local Government Board." In my opinion, the Local Government Board, now the Ministry of Health, under that subsection can only prescribe a scale which will apply generally to every medical practitioner who is called in in pursuance of the liability imposed upon the midwife by the subsection. In my opinion, the Ministry of Health has no power when prescribing a scale to discriminate between one medical practitioner and another. It would have no power, for instance, to say that a medical practitioner who bears the degree of doctor of medicine shall be paid at a higher rate than a medical practitioner who has taken a lower degree. Still less can the Ministry of Health say that a doctor of medicine shall receive less than those of lower degrees because his general run of patients are a higher class than those of another medical practitioner and can afford to pay and do pay higher fees, so that the doctor of medicine can well afford to attend to these cases of emergency under the Act for a lesser fee.

In the present case it is said that the Ministry of Health has entered into an inquiry whether in certain cases the medical practitioner will not have been adequately remunerated from other sources, and that is why it has made this regulation in question. I would, however, venture to point out that the regulation is not in any way confined to doctors who have been inadequately remunerated. It is well known to everybody that there is no profession in the world that does so much work in numerous cases for no fees at all, and in other cases for wholly inadequate fees, as the medical profession. It would ill become me to make any comment upon the fees paid, say, by clubs, medical institutes or other associations to the medical men who attend to their members, but I can, at any rate, refer to the patients themselves, and in many cases when a doctor receives or agrees to receive a fee from the patient he is receiving or agreeing to receive a wholly inadequate fee. The Ministry, therefore, has not in this case made a regulation which only applies to doctors who have already been remunerated adequately from other sources. It has chosen to include in this regulation, and so exclude from the benefit of the provisions of this sub-s. (1) of 14, medical men who may have been wholly inadequately remunerated.

I would only add this in deference to the interesting argument we have had from counsel for the local authority. He says that, if we adopt this view as to the meaning of the section and the powers of the Ministry of Health, we shall be in effect deciding that in certain cases a medical man will be paid twice over for the services he has rendered. I do not myself see how that in strictness can be so. To take the case of a private patient, if a medical man is called in under s. 14, he is called in by the midwife and not by the private patient at all. Therefore he is entering into an implied contract with the midwife acting on behalf of the local authority, he is entering into no contract at all with the patient who is under no liability to make a payment to the doctor or anything. If the patient does agree to pay she is entering into an agreement for which there is no consideration. The doctor will not be paid by the patient in addition to the local authority, nor, indeed, will he be paid by the clubs or other associations mentioned in this clause, because it must be remembered that in all those cases the medical man is remunerated at a flat rate which covers all cases in which he is called in by the patients. He is not remunerated in respect of each time he is called in; he is paid so much in consideration for which he undertakes to respond to every reasonable call made by the contributor or person on his list. In these cases, as I have pointed out, when the medical man attends this urgent summons on the part of the midwife he is not summoned by the patient; she has nothing to do with the matter at all.

I would only add this. For the reasons that I have given, sub-clauses (1) and (2) of cl. 8 are ultra vires because the Ministry has sought to discriminate between one doctor and another, and under the subsection, in my opinion, it has no power to do that. But sub-cl. (3) is, in my opinion, still worse. Section 14 itself, as has been pointed out by SLESSER, L.J., does impose a condition upon the payment of the fee, that is to say, upon a doctor being able to recover his fee. Sub-s. (2) says:

> "It shall be a condition of the payment of such fee that the medical practitioner so called in shall state in his claim to the local supervising authority the nature of the emergency."

Clause 3 of this regulation purports to impose another condition under a power forsooth to prescribe a scale of charges. Clause 3 provides as follows:

> "In respect of any services performed by the doctor on any date later than the tenth day from the date of his first attendance, unless he has reported to the local supervising authority that he considers, for reasons stated by him, that his further attendance is necessary, or in respect of any services performed by the doctor after the expiry of four weeks from the day of birth"

he shall receive no fee. What right the Ministry of Health has to impose such a condition as that when the doctor has been called in on the arising of the second emergency, I cannot for the life of me see. It seems to me to be wholly ultra vires. For these reasons I agree that the appeals must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Farwell, J.), July 15, 1935]

[Reported [1906] Ch. 61; 105 L.J.Ch. 33; 154 L.T. 101; [1934–5] B. & C.R. 214]

Bankruptcy—Settlement—Voluntary settlement—Avoidance—Settlor's ability to pay debts at date of settlement—Power to raise larger sum than amount of debts—Power to revoke settlement with consent of trustees or Chancery judge—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 42 (1)—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 172 (1).

A settlor executed a voluntary deed of settlement, which was of such a nature that, if he became bankrupt within ten years of the date of the settlement, it would become void as against the trustee in bankruptcy under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (1), unless those entitled under the settlement could prove that "the settlor was at the time of the making of the settlement able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement." His debts at the date of the settlement amounted to about £80. By a clause in the settlement the settlor had power at any time without the consent of the trustees to raise the sum of £150. By another clause in the settlement absolute power was given to the settlor to revoke the whole of the trusts in the settlement with the consent either of the trustees or of a judge of the Chancery Division. Three years from the date of the settlement the settlor became bankrupt.

Held: (i) the words in s. 42 (1) "able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement" meant without the aid of the property which by the settlement passed to other people;

(ii) as the settlor had at the time of the settlement contracted debts amounting to less than £150, and had power under the settlement at any time to raise £150, he was, at the time of the making of the settlement, able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement within s. 42 (1) of the Act of 1914, and the settlement was not void under that subsection;

(iii) the settlement was not void under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 172 (1), as a settlement made to defraud creditors, because the clause whereby the settlor had absolute power to revoke all of the trusts subject to the consent of the trustees, or of a judge of the Chancery Division, was a general power exercisable by a trustee in bankruptcy, who, even if he did not obtain the consent of the trustees, would, in a proper case, obtain the consent of the judge, either to a complete revocation or to a revocation to the extent necessary to enable the debts to be paid, and so the trustee in bankruptcy would not be prevented from getting the benefit of whatever property there was available for the payment of the debts in a proper case.

Bankruptcy Motion

On March 19, 1932, the bankrupt executed a deed whereby he assigned to trustees all his reversionary interests under two wills. He also assigned: "All other, if any, the shares or interests to which the settlor is or may be or become in any manner entitled of and in the said estates or the investments and property representing the same or any part thereof to have and receive the same subject to the mortgages aforesaid unto the trustees absolutely upon the trusts hereinafter declared concerning the same." He further provided that: "The trustees shall stand possessed of the shares, interests and premises hereinbefore assigned and the investments for the time being representing the same (hereinafter called 'the trust fund') and of the annual income thereof upon the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions following (that is to say): (1) Upon trust during the lifetime of the settlor to apply the annual income of the trust fund for the maintenance support or otherwise for the benefit of all or any one or more exclusively of the other or others of the settlor and any wife and issue of his for the time being in existence and any persons who if he had died intestate would for the time being be entitled to the trust fund or the income thereof as the trustees in their absolute discretion without being liable to account for the exercise of such discretion think fit." Clause 5 provided that: "Notwithstanding any of the trusts hereinbefore contained the following provisions shall have effect. 1. The settlor shall have power without any consent at any time to raise for his own benefit by mortgage (at interest at any rate to which he may agree) of the trust fund or any part thereof any sum or sums not exceeding £150 and the trustees shall if required concur in any such mortgage to charge the trust fund with the repayment of the principal moneys and interest and other moneys secured thereon." Clause 2 (c) was as follows: "With the consent of the settlor any sum or sums up to the whole value of the trust fund and after payment thereout of all mortgages (if any) then affecting the trust fund or with the consent of the owners of such mortgage securities to pay or apply the said sum or sums in any manner to or for the benefit of all or any of them the settlor and his wife, children and remoter issue for the time being in existence and a decision of the trustees that the application of such sum or sums is for the benefit of all or some or one of such persons shall be binding on all persons interested in the trust fund." Clause 7 provided that: "It shall be lawful for the settlor at any time, with the approval of the trustees or of a judge of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, subject and without prejudice to any mortgages or charges which shall have been created under any of the powers hereinbefore contained by deed, to revoke or vary wholly or partially the trusts hereby declared and the powers and provisions herein contained and at his option and with such approval as aforesaid to substitute therefor new trusts, powers and provisions for the benefit of the settlor, his wife and issue if any or any of them or any other persons or purposes whatsoever."

At the date of the execution of the deed the settlor had incurred debts to the extent of about £80. After the date of the execution of the deed the settlor contracted further debts, and on Feb. 18, 1935, a receiving order was made against him on a petition of moneylenders. On Feb. 22, 1935, he was adjudicated bankrupt, and the applicant was appointed a trustee in bankruptcy. This application was made by the trustee in bankruptcy, and it asked for a declaration that the deed of March 19, 1932, was void as against the trustee in bankruptcy under s. 42 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, as a voluntary conveyance made within ten years of the bankruptcy, and that it was also void under s. 172 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, as being made with the intention of defrauding creditors.

FARWELL, J.—The question I have to determine is whether or not the settlement is void either under s. 42 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, or s. 172 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. Section 42 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act provides as follows:

> "Any settlement of property, not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage, or made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration, or a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife, shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy."

That event has not happened; the settlement was made in March, 1932, and the bankrupt did not become bankrupt until 1935, so the first part of the section does not apply at all. The second part of the subsection is the material part:

> "and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property passed to the trustee of such settlement on the execution thereof."

It is said in this case that at the date of the settlement the bankrupt was not in a position to pay his debts without the property which was settled, and that, since these reversionary interests passed to the trustee of the settlement, it is necessarily void under that section. It has to be borne in mind that when this section speaks of a person being "able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement," these words must be read with this limitation upon them. They must be read as meaning: "without the aid of the property which by the settlement passes to other persons." That is the result of the decision in Re Lowndes (1), which, it seems to me, I ought to follow, and, accordingly, I have to consider whether this bankrupt was in a position at the date of the settlement to pay his debts without the property which by virtue of the settlement passed to other persons. Further, it is said on behalf of the trustee in bankruptcy that the onus of proving that the settlor was at the time of making the settlement able to pay his debts without the aid of the settled property, is upon the persons who claim under the settlement, and that that onus has not been discharged, since there is no evidence, upon which I can properly act, that the whole of the debts owing by the bankrupt at the date of the settlement did not exceed £150. It is pointed out that the one person who would know certainly as to this is the bankrupt himself, and that he has given no evidence, the only evidence before the court being an affidavit by one of the trustees who was the solicitor who acted in the matter.

The contention that the onus of proof is on those supporting the settlement is, no doubt, well founded, but, having regard to the evidence in this case, including the evidence given by the bankrupt at his examination, there is, in my judgment, sufficient to justify me in holding that the persons claiming under the settlement have proved that the debts due at the date of the settlement did not exceed £150. If that be so, was the bankrupt at the date of the settlement in a position to pay his debts without the property which passed to other people under the settlement? In that connection it must be remembered that the settlement expressly provides that the settlor shall have the power at any time, without anybody's consent at all, to raise the sum of £150 out of the settled funds. That sum was more than sufficient to pay in full the debts which the settlor had at the date of the settlement, and, in my judgment, the true result of that is that the position is exactly the same as if the settlor had retained in his own hands a sum of £150 with a view to settling these debts if he thought fit to do so. If he had retained £150 in his own hands, it would be impossible for the trustee in bankruptcy to say he had not at the date of the settlement enough to discharge his debts, which amounted to less than that sum. He was in a position at any time to raise £150, and that money, which was his own money, could have been used by him if he had thought fit to pay his creditors. For these reasons, in my judgment, this settlement does not come within s. 42 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and is not void against the trustee in bankruptcy on the ground that the settlor was not in a position to pay his debts without the aid of the property at the time the settlement was made.

That being so, it remains for me to consider shortly whether, the settlement not being void under s. 42 of the Bankruptcy Act, it is voidable under s. 172 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925. That subsection provides as follows:

> "Save as provided in this section, every conveyance of property, made whether before or after the commencement of this Act, with intent to defraud creditors, shall be voidable, at the instance of any person thereby prejudiced."

The authorities establish that the question whether a particular settlement is voidable or not under that subsection is a matter which must be determined on the facts of the particular case. It may be that this settlement would have come within s. 172 had there been no such provision as is found in cl. 7. The settlor is settling the whole of his property upon certain trusts. Those trusts, apart from cl. 7 and except to the extent A of £150, take the property away from the bankrupt or his trustee in bankruptcy and put it in the hands of his trustees, who can deal with it in various ways adversely to him, and it may well be that apart from cl. 7 the settlement is one which might have resulted in defeating or defrauding creditors, and therefore might be voidable. But I cannot overlook the provision in cl. 7 of the settlement. That clause gives the settlor absolute power to revoke the whole of the trusts in this settlement with the consent either of the B trustees or of a judge of the Chancery Division. That is a general power which, in my judgment, is exercisable by a trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy, if he cannot obtain the consent of the trustees to a revocation of the settlement, either wholly or in part, is entitled to apply to a judge of the Chancery Division for his sanction, and in a proper case he would, no doubt, obtain the sanction of the judge either to a complete revocation or to a revocation to the extent necessary to enable the debts to be C paid. If the only revocation necessary was a revocation of a portion of the trusts for the purpose of enabling the debts to be paid, leaving the rest of the property in settlement, such an arrangement might well be very greatly to the benefit of the settlor. However that may be, this is a power which, in my judgment, the trustee in bankruptcy can himself exercise, of revoking the settlement with the consent either of the trustees or a judge of the Chancery Division. D

In the face of that it appears to me to be impossible to hold that this was a settlement executed with an intent to defraud creditors. One cannot conceive that a judge in the Chancery Division in a proper case would refuse the sanction of the court to the revocation of the settlement to the extent necessary for paying debts. I am not saying that there might not be circumstances in which the court might think it right to refuse its sanction, but that the court would refuse its sanction in a case which, if the sanction E was refused, would result in a fraud on the creditors, I cannot believe. In my judgment, this power, inserted in the settlement in this form, shows that, so far from intending to defraud the creditors, the whole object of this settlement was to protect the bankrupt against himself, without preventing a trustee in bankruptcy getting the benefit of whatever property there was available for the payment of the debts in a proper case. It appears to me impossible to come to the conclusion that the settlement was void under F s. 172 of the Law of Property Act. The result is that the applicant takes nothing by the motion, and it must be dismissed with costs.

Application dismissed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. RAMSAY

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Wright, M.R., Romer and Greene, L.JJ.), December 6, 1935]

[Reported 154 L.T. 141; 79 Sol. Jo. 987; 20 Tax Cas. 79]

Surtax—Deductions—Annual payments—Purchase of professional practice—Payment of purchase price by instalments—Instalments equal to twenty-five per cent. of annual net profits.

On Sept. 28, 1932, the taxpayer entered into an agreement to purchase the practice of a dentist in Wimpole-street, London. Clause 3 of the agreement stated that the primary price to be paid by the taxpayer should be £15,000, which sum was subject to increase or diminution as thereinafter provided. Under cl. 4, £5,000 was to be paid on the exchange of the agreement and the taxpayer was to pay to the vendor in respect of the balance of the purchase price (but without any interest thereon) each year for ten years from Aug. 16, 1932, such a sum as should be equal to 25 per cent. of the net profits of the practice, such sums to be paid to the vendor as capital sums in respect of the purchase price, and if the aggregate amounts paid during the ten years should be more or less than £10,000 the primary price of £15,000 was to be increased or diminished accordingly. By cl. 5 the balance of the purchase price for the time being remaining payable was charged on the goodwill, assets and profits of the practice into whosesoever hands the same might come, which, with the personal covenant of the taxpayer, was to be the primary security therefor, and £5,000, part of the balance of £10,000, was additionally secured by mortgage of a policy which was to be assigned by the taxpayer to the vendor to be re-assigned as soon as the vendor had received the £5,000. It was further provided that if the taxpayer should die before the full further sum of £5,000 should have been paid, the vendor should take the proceeds of the policy together with the sums already received by the vendor in respect of the balance of the purchase money in full satisfaction of such balance. One-fourth of the net profits for the year up to Aug. 16, 1933, amounted to £886 and the taxpayer paid that amount to the vendor in accordance with the agreement without deducting any tax. The taxpayer claimed to deduct that sum of £886 from his total income for the purposes of surtax for the year ending April 5, 1934.

Held: on the true construction of the agreement the practice was sold for a capital sum, part of which was payable by instalments in the circumstances mentioned, and, therefore, the £886 was a capital sum which was not an admissible deduction in computing the taxpayer's liability for surtax.

Appeal by the Inland Revenue Commissioners from an order of FINLAY, J., dated July 25, 1935.

By a Case under the Finance Act, 1927, s. 42 (7), and Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149, by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts it was stated:

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, held on Dec. 5, 1934, Mr. K. Paul Ramsay (hereinafter called the respondent) appealed against an assessment to surtax in the sum of £4,314 for the year ending April 5, 1934.

2. The respondent is a dental surgeon, and prior to the events hereinafter set out he was employed, under an agreement dated June 28, 1928, as assistant to Mr. Theodore Victor Smith in the latter's practice as a dental surgeon at 19, Wimpole-street, London.

3. It was provided by the said agreement of June 28, 1928, that in the case of the death of Mr. Theodore Victor Smith during the employment of the respondent under the said agreement the respondent would, if required by the personal representatives of the said Mr. Theodore Victor Smith, purchase the goodwill of the practice carried on by the said Mr. Theodore Victor Smith for a sum and upon terms therein mentioned and would also, if so required, purchase the dental equipment and materials used in connection with the said practice.

4. Mr. Theodore Victor Smith died on Aug. 21, 1931, having by his will appointed his widow, Mrs. Emma May Smith, to be the sole executrix thereof, and having devised and bequeathed to her all his residuary real and personal estate absolutely.

5. The respondent was not in a financial position to be able to pay a fixed sum for the said practice.

He received, however, a loan of £5,000 from a relative, and he effected a policy of assurance in his own name and on his own life in the Equitable Life Assurance Society for £5,000.

6. By an agreement made on Sept. 28, 1932, between the said Mrs. Emma May Smith (thereinafter called the vendor) of the one part and the respondent of the other part, it was agreed that the respondent should purchase from the vendor the goodwill of the said practice and the dental equipment and materials used in connection therewith on (inter alia) the following terms, which said terms were in substitution for the terms set out in the said agreement of June 28, 1928, referred to in para. 3 hereof:

(i) The said purchase should take effect as on and from Aug. 16, 1932.

(ii) The primary price to be paid by the respondent for the goodwill of the said practice and the said equipment and materials should be £15,000, subject to increase or diminution as thereinafter provided.

(iii) The respondent should, on the exchange of the said agreement, pay to the vendor £5,000 on account of the said purchase price and should, during a period of ten years to be computed from the said 16th August, 1932, pay to the vendor in respect of the balance of the said purchase price (but without any interest thereon) such a sum as should in each year during the said period be equal to 25 per cent. or one-fourth of the net profits of the said practice for each year, which said sums should be paid to and received by the vendor as capital sums paid in respect of the purchase price (the reference to the net profits of the said practice being for the purpose only of computing the capital sum to be paid in each year) and should be paid without any deduction.

(iv) The respondent should continue liable to pay the said capital sum in respect of each year of the said period of ten years notwithstanding that the sums so paid might in the aggregate amount to a greater sum than the balance of the said primary price, which in such case should be increased by the amount of such excess. And conversely, if the aggregate of the said capital sums paid during the said period of ten years should amount to a less sum than the balance of the said primary price the vendor should accept such sums in full satisfaction of such balance and the said primary price should be diminished by the amount of the deficiency.

(v) The balance of the purchase price for the time being remaining payable should stand charged on the goodwill assets and profits of the said practice into whosesoever hands the same might come, which, with the personal covenant or agreement of the respondent for the payment thereof, should be the primary security therefor. The sum of £5,000 part of the said balance should be additionally secured by a mortgage or charge on the said policy of assurance in the Equitable Life Assurance Society, which should be assigned by the respondent to the vendor by way of security therefor.

(vi) If the respondent should die before the full further sum of £5,000 should have been paid to the vendor, the vendor should take and receive the proceeds of the said policy together with the sums already received by the vendor in respect of the balance of the purchase money and together with the share of the profits accrued due up to the date of such death in full satisfaction and discharge of such balance and the goodwill of the said practice and the assets thereof should be taken by the personal representatives of the respondent as part of his estate without further payment.

7. The first accounts of the said practice purchased by the respondent were made up to Aug. 16, 1933, and 25 per cent. or one-fourth of the net profits thereof amounted to the sum of £886.

8. The respondent has paid to Mrs. Emma May Smith the said sum of £886 without deduction of tax in accordance with the terms of the said agreement of Sept. 28, 1932.

9. The respondent claims that the said sum of £886 is a proper deduction in computing his liability for the purposes of surtax for the year ending April 5, 1934.

10. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that:

(a) Upon the true construction of the terms of the said agreement of Sept. 28, 1932, the said practice was not sold for a fixed capital sum, but for £5,000 down and further yearly sums which varied according to the profits of the said practice and were in the nature of income payments.

(b) The commissioners were not bound by the description which the parties had chosen to give to the sums to be paid year by year under the agreement, but were entitled to consider whether that description was correct.

(c) The said sum of £886 was not an instalment of any capital sum but was an annual payment whereby the respondent's income was diminished during the year 1933–34; and was, therefore, an admissible deduction in computing his income for that year for surtax purposes.

11. It was contended on behalf of the Crown that:

(a) Under the terms of the said agreement of Sept. 28, 1932, the said sum of £886 was an instalment in the nature of capital of a fixed capital purchase price.

(b) The said sum of £886 was not an admissible deduction in computing the respondent's liability for surtax.

(c) The assessment under appeal should be confirmed.

12. Having considered the evidence and arguments adduced before them, the Commissioners held that upon the true construction of the said agreement of Sept. 28, 1932, the said practice was sold for a certain sum of £5,000 and in addition Mrs. Emma May Smith took an annual sum which was dependent in effect on the profits of the said practice, that is to say, she took something which rose and fell with the chances of the practice. The commissioners considered that the case was governed by the decision of Rowlatt, J., in Jones v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1).

They allowed the appeal and accordingly reduced the assessment to £3,428.

13. The appellants immediately after the determination of the appeal declared to the Commissioners their dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and in due course required them to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Finance Act, 1927, s. 42 (7), and Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149.

Finlay, J., agreed with the view of the Special Commissioners and dismissed the appeal.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Reginald P. Hills for the appellants.

J. N. Donovan for the respondent.

The arguments appear in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

LORD WRIGHT, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of FINLAY, J., who has A taken the same view as the Special Commissioners, which is that the respondent is entitled in making his returns of total income for the purposes of super tax to deduct therefrom a sum of £886 which he has paid in accordance with the contract dated Sept. 28, 1932, made between himself and Mrs. Emma May Smith. The question involved in the case is the question which has so often to be debated where property has been sold, namely, whether the consideration is a sum of money, though payable in instal- B ments, or whether it is an annuity. It is, of course, quite clear that for a lump sum of money the right to receive periodical payments may be purchased, and in that case if the transaction constitutes the purchase of an annuity and each one of these payments is in the nature of income in the appropriate hands and in the appropriate manner, it is taxable as such, but if that is not the case and the instalments are not annuities in the proper sense of the term, but are merely the method and the manner and the form in C which a lump sum is paid, then the position is different, and the sums in question are not to be deemed income but capital, and accordingly in the hands of the payer when he comes to make his returns for super tax cannot be deducted under the provisions of s. 27 of the Income Tax Act of 1918.

There have been a great many cases, to some of which we have been referred, in which that very difficult question has been debated. There are certain guides or signposts. D I may refer to Foley v. Fletcher (2), where the distinction was clearly drawn. POLLOCK, C.B., there said (3 H. & N. at p. 779):

> "These instalments" (that is, the payments then in question) "are payments of money due as capital; the Act has made no provision for such a case."

That case is a case in which the question at issue is the right of the payer to deduct E income tax, but the principle is the same.

> "It professes to charge profits only, and we cannot say that capital is liable to the income tax because found in company with profits."

Similarly in 1905, in Chadwick v. Pearl Life Insurance Co. (3), WALTON, J., stated the position in this way ([1905] 2 K.B. at p. 514): F

> "It is obvious that there will be cases in which it will be very difficult to distinguish between an agreement to pay a debt by instalments, and an agreement for good consideration to make certain annual payments for a fixed number of years. In the one case there is an agreement for good consideration to pay a fixed gross amount and to pay it by instalments; in the other there is an agreement for good consideration not to pay any fixed gross amount, but to make a certain, or it may G be an uncertain, number of annual payments. The distinction is a fine one, and seems to depend on whether the agreement between the parties involves an obligation to pay a fixed gross sum."

That same principle was given effect to in Secretary of State in Council of India v. Scoble (4), where the instalments also included in themselves a sum for interest. The pur- H chasers there of the railway had bought it at a price which they might pay at their option either all at once as a lump sum or by instalments, in which latter event the instalments had to be increased by an amount attributable to interest. LORD HALSBURY says ([1903] A.C. at p. 303):

> "I cannot disagree with what all the three learned judges of the Court of Appeal pointed out, that you start upon the inquiry into this matter with the fact of an I antecedent debt which has got to be paid; and if these sums, which it cannot be denied are partly in liquidation of that debt which is due, are to be taxed as if they were income in each year, the result is that you are taxing part of the capital."

That is a general test which may be, and has been, found very difficult to apply, and I do not wish to suggest that there are any hard-and-fast rules which can be applied as a matter of course to any case. For instance, it cannot, I think, be said as a general rule that, if the amount of the instalments is one which is to fluctuate during the period in which they are payable according to certain circumstances, that is necessarily in-

A consistent with these instalments being instalments of capital, and that it necessarily involves that they must be treated as annual payments or annuities. Jones v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1) contains a proposition to that effect by ROWLATT, J., in his judgment, but he was clearly there dealing with the facts of the case. There was a sale of property for a lump sum of £750 payable as to £300 by three instalments of £100 each and as to the balance of £450 by a royalty; and there was no question, as I follow the B case, that the whole of that £750 was treated as a capital sum. But there was a further clause

> "to pay by way of additional consideration a 'further royalty' of 10 per cent. upon the invoice price of all machines constructed under the said inventions and sold during a period of ten years,"

C and it was that latter sum, and that latter sum only, which was in question before ROWLATT, J., and about which he said, very naturally ([1920] 1 K.B. at p. 715):

> "The property was sold for a certain sum, and in addition the vendor took an annual sum which was dependent upon the volume of business done; that is to say, he took something which rose or fell with the chances of business. I think, when a man does that, he does take an income—that is what it is."

D In my judgment, the learned judge there was laying down that proposition with reference to the circumstances before him and did not intend, and I think could not rightly have intended, to state that as a universal proposition applicable to all cases of this character. The decision in any particular case can only be arrived at by considering what is the substance of the transaction in question, and what is the substance of that transaction can only be ascertained by a careful consideration of the contract which embodies E the transaction. That being so, in my judgment what has to be done here is to examine the particular clauses of the contract of sale, the agreement in question, and to see what is the appropriate conclusion, so far as relevant to this case, to be arrived at on the consideration of that agreement.

The agreement, as I have said, is dated Sept. 28, 1932, and the vendor is Mrs. Smith; she is the widow of a gentleman who carried on a practice as a dentist at 19, Wimpole-F street, in London, and the purchaser (the present respondent) is Mr. Kenneth Paul Ramsay, who is now carrying on, as I understand it, the same business at the same place. What he purchased was > "the goodwill of the practice, and the dental equipment and materials hereinafter mentioned for the sum and upon the terms and conditions hereinafter provided."

G The clauses particularly relevant in this case are cls. 3, 4, and 5, and it is in these clauses that it is possible to find what is the sum mentioned in the recital which I have just read, and what are the terms and conditions relating, among other things, to that sum as provided in the agreement. Clause 3 is, to my mind, the governing clause:

> "The primary price to be paid by the purchaser for the goodwill of the said practice and equipment and materials aforesaid shall be the sum of £15,000, which said sum > H shall be subject to increase or diminution as hereinafter provided."

Then come the provisions which determine whether or not the said sum shall be subject to increase or diminution and, among other things, specify certain circumstances which will determine when and how the sum is to be paid, but I conceive—and I shall indicate why in the sequel—that that sum of £15,000 is never lost sight of and is the purchase price from beginning to end of this agreement. Clause 4 deals with the mode of pay-I ment, and it deals with what was contemplated obviously as the probable course which would be followed in paying this sum of £15,000. The sum of £5,000 was to be paid on the exchange of the agreement. It appears, according to the findings, that the purchaser, the respondent, had been able to borrow that sum of money and was able to pay it in cash, but it also appears from the other terms of the agreement, and it was, indeed, only what one might reasonably anticipate might be often the case, that the respondent was looking to the profits of his carrying on the business as providing a fund out of which he might be able to pay the purchase price, and, indeed, apart from the sum of £5,000, it may well be that that was the only way in which the payment could be made.

Clause 4 accordingly spreads the period of payment over ten years, starting from Aug. 16, 1932, and in each year of those ten years, if everything goes on as contemplated, the respondent would pay to the vendor in respect of the balance of the said purchase price, that is to say, the £10,000 which is the balance, and the £5,000 which has been taken into account without interest,

> "such a sum to be secured and payable as hereinafter provided as shall in each and every year during the said period be equal to 25 per cent., or one-fourth, of the net profits of the practice," to be computed and ascertained as later provided in the agreement. The clause goes on to say that such

> "sums shall be paid to and received by the vendor as capital sums paid in respect of the purchase price."

That, of course, is not conclusive of anything, because whether they are capital sums or not must be determined by a consideration of the substance of the transaction—the terms of the contract; "and shall be paid without any deduction." That, it may be, is contrary to s. 23 of the Income Tax Act of 1918. Then the clause goes on:

> "The purchaser shall continue liable to pay such capital sum computed as aforesaid in respect of each year of the said period of ten years notwithstanding that the sums so paid may in the aggregate amount to a greater sum than the balance of the primary price" (that is to say, the balance of the £15,000) "which in such case shall be increased accordingly by the amount of such excess. And, conversely, if the aggregate of the capital sums paid during the said period of ten years shall amount to a less sum than the balance of the primary price the vendor shall take and accept such sums in full satisfaction of such balance, and the primary price shall be diminished by the amount of the deficiency."

Clause 4, therefore, contains a code which, if it operates during the whole ten years, will have this result, that the remaining debt of £10,000, which I regard it to be, shall be discharged, but discharged by the payment in the manner specified by a number of instalments which in the aggregate may amount to either more or less than the balance of £10,000.

It is to be noted that there is no question of income, and I cannot see why a creditor who has sold property for a particular price should not, in discharge of that price, agree to accept a fluctuating sum, if, as may be the case, and no doubt was the case here, there are sufficient reasons of convenience or other considerations, which make it desirable to adopt that method of payment. The mere fact that in the result the amount paid may be greater or less than what is called here the primary debt, that is to say, a specified balance, does not seem to me in itself to throw light on the position one way or the other. It will be noted that at the end of cl. 4 the language is: "The vendor shall take and accept such sums" (that is to say, either greater or less than the £10,000) "in full satisfaction of such balance"—that is to say, the £10,000—"and the primary price shall be diminished by the amount of the deficiency"—diminished, that is to say, as a result of what is paid. No further amount shall be claimable. Clause 4 obviously contemplates that the whole proceeding will go through conveniently, that the purchaser will not die or become disabled, or will not attempt to sell the business, and will not refuse to carry on the business from which these instalments, it is anticipated, will be forthcoming. I may say at once that as I read the contract, though there is no express obligation on the purchaser to continue to carry on the business for the period of ten years, yet, if he were to make default in that, he would commit a breach of his contract, because as I read the contract there is an implied term that he will not do some act or commit some default, which will disable him from fulfilling his contract; but there is no provision in terms for any of these events, except there is one provision which I shall refer to in a moment applicable to the case of his dying at a particular time. I may add that, as I read cl. 4, it is a clause personal to the purchaser, as, indeed, in a profession of this sort one would expect it to be, that is to say, it is he and he alone under cl. 4 who is to carry on the profession and to conduct the business; and that seems to be confirmed by cl. 9, which provides that the purchaser, that is to say the respondent, shall keep proper books of account at all times during the period of ten years.

Clause 5 is the next clause which fills up some of the gaps in cl. 4, and again, as I read it, it confirms the view that this contract is dealing with a definite purchase price. The beginning words are these:

> "The balance of the purchase price" (that is £15,000) "for the time being remaining payable shall stand charged on the goodwill assets and profits of the said practice into whosesoever hands the same may come, which, with the personal covenant or agreement of the purchaser for the payment thereof, shall be the primary security therefor."

You have there a mortgage or a charge, and you also have a personal covenant, and in each case the amount involved either in the mortgage or the personal covenant is fixed by a reference to the purchase price—that is, the amount fixed in cl. 3 of the contract—£15,000—and it is in respect of that specific amount that the particular rights involved are given to the vendor; she can enforce her security. I do not stop to consider what would happen if the business were sold to a purchaser for value without notice. That, I take it, might defeat the charge, but would be a breach of contract on the part of the purchaser, and then the purchaser would be liable on his personal covenant or agreement. There then follow certain specific provisions defining more narrowly what is to happen in particular events in which the contemplated procedure under cl. 4 has failed. Clause 5 provides that

> "The sum of £5,000, part of the said balance" (that is to say, part of the £10,000), "shall be additionally secured" (that is, in addition to the charge on the goodwill, and so on) "by a mortgage or charge of the said policy which shall be assigned by the purchaser to the vendor by way of security therefor, accordingly. If and when, during the life of the purchaser, the vendor shall have received the further sum of £5,000 on account of the purchase price" (that is to say, £10,000 in all) "the said policy shall at any time thereafter upon the request and at the cost of the purchaser be reassigned to him. If the purchaser shall die before the full further sum of £5,000 shall have been paid to the vendor, then and in such case the vendor shall take and receive the proceeds of the said policy together with the sums (if any) already received by the vendor in respect of the balance of the purchase money and together with the share of the profits accrued due up to the date of such death in full satisfaction and discharge of such balance."

That, again, is a further provision which would have the effect of diminishing the purchase price of £15,000. Then it goes on to say,

> "and the goodwill of the practice and the assets thereof shall be taken by the personal representatives of the purchaser as part of his estate without further payment."

There is still no provision made for certain eventualities which might occur, and which would be inconsistent with the due fulfilment of cl. 4, and would not fall within the special provision of cl. 5, to which I have just referred. For instance, the purchaser might die, after the payment of £10,000 has been made. He may break his agreement, as I think he would if he discontinued the conduct of the profession for which the payments were anticipated to be made, and as I say, there might be other contingencies. None of these is provided for in this contract, and the result is that the £15,000 would neither be increased nor diminished, because there would be no provision for the subsequent cl. 3 dealing with such increase or diminution applicable to these cases; and, therefore, the purchaser, or his estate, would have to make up the full purchase price which they have undertaken to do, because none of the qualifications attaching to that obligation specified in the contract would apply. That being so, the conclusion I have arrived at, with great respect to the learned judge, is that this is not the case of an annuity or a series of annual payments. It is a case in which a capital lump sum has been stipulated as the price of a piece of property, and it is none the less so because the payment of that sum is to be made by instalments, instalments at certain specific periods, no doubt, but not instalments of a fixed price. It is none the less, in my judgment, a capital sum because in the working-out of the transaction, and in the discharge of that capital sum, the vendor, according to the terms of the agreement, may have to be content with a lesser amount than the £15,000. The £15,000 is not an otiose figure; it is a figure which permeates the whole of the contract, and on which the whole contract depends. That being so, I think that the £886 in question was a sum in the nature of capital, and, therefore, that it was not competent for the respondent to deduct it in returning his total income. That being so, in my judgment the appeal should be allowed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. If a man has some property which he wishes to sell on terms which will result in his receiving for the next twenty years an annual sum of £500, he can do it in either of two methods. He can either sell his property in consideration of a payment by the purchaser to him of an annuity of £500 for the next twenty years, or he can sell his property to the purchaser for £10,000, the £10,000 to be paid by equal instalments of £500 over the next twenty years. If he adopts the former of the two methods, then the sums of £500 received by him each year are liable to income tax. If he adopts the second method, then the sums of £500 received by him in each year are not liable to income tax, and they do not become liable to income tax by it being said that in substance the transaction is the same as though he had sold for an annuity. The vendor has the power of choosing which of the two methods he will adopt, and he can adopt the second method if he thinks fit, for the purpose of avoiding having to pay income tax on the £500 a year. The question which method has been adopted must be a question of the proper construction to be placed on the documents by which the transaction is carried out. The only document with which we are confronted in the present case is this agreement of September, 1932, and, although I do not think that the draftsman of that agreement is to be congratulated on his efforts, I confess that, looking at it as a whole, I am satisfied that the vendor here has adopted the second of the two methods to which I have referred. In other words, that the vendor has in fact sold the property for a capital sum, part of which, in certain events, is payable by annual instalments. The agreement contains a recital to the effect that the purchaser has agreed to purchase the subject-matter of the agreement for the sum, and on the terms and conditions hereinafter provided. This document is, of course, executed by the purchaser, and therefore by that alone he becomes under a liability to the vendor to pay the sum for which he has purchased the business on the terms and conditions which are contained in the document. The sum is described in cl. 3 of the agreement, which is in these terms:

> "The primary price to be paid by the purchaser for the goodwill of the said practice and equipment and materials aforesaid shall be the sum of £15,000, which said sum shall be subject to increase or diminution as hereinafter provided."

It is a little awkwardly expressed, but I have not the least doubt that that means that, except in so far as under the conditions to be found in a later part of the document, the sum has increased or diminished, the purchase price to be paid, and which the purchaser has become under a liability to pay, is to be £15,000. Then we come to cl. 4, and I do not want to read the clause at length; it is sufficient to say that it provides that the purchase sum is to be paid by the purchaser as to £5,000 down. Then, as regards the balance, whatever that balance may be, the purchaser is given an option, or rather a concession is made to the purchaser, enabling him to pay it by annual instalments. There is this further concession made, that if, paying the annual instalments which are mentioned in the clause, at the end of the ten years those annual instalments, together with the £5,000, do not amount to £15,000, then the purchase money is pro tanto diminished. There is this compensating advantage to the vendor, however, that if during the ten years the sums paid, together with the £10,000, amount to more than the £15,000, the vendor is to receive pro tanto an increased purchase consideration. I do not think that cl. 4 in any way imposes on the purchaser any contractual obligation to carry on business during the ten years. I think the clause is meant as a concession to him, and as a conditional concession. If he carries on business during the ten years, and makes the annual payments out of the profits that are therein mentioned, then in certain circumstances the purchase money may be reduced, and he will be entitled in any event to pay the balance of the purchase money, whatever it may be, by annual instalments, instead of having to pay it down at the time of the execution of the agreement, or the completion of purchase. I say that I do not think that the purchaser is under any implied obligation to carry on the business for ten years, because, when one comes to cl. 5, it is apparent that the parties contemplated that the purchaser might assign the practice, and the other things that he had purchased under this agreement, to a third party, and thereupon it is provided that the vendor shall have a charge on the property transferred for the purpose of securing the balance of the purchase money. If after, say, two years of carrying on the business, the purchaser, instead of selling it to a third party, ceases to carry on the business altogether, in my opinion he becomes at once liable to pay the £15,000, so far as it has not already been paid by way of the first instalment of £5,000 and the share of profits handed over in respect of the first two years. In other words, he will not have performed the condition on which the concession was made to him. Throughout it seems to me that the parties have contemplated, and have arranged the transaction on the footing that there is to be a lump sum in respect of the purchase money. That lump sum may, in certain circumstances, be discharged by annual instalments, and they have also provided that in that event, that is to say, of its being discharged by annual instalments, the purchase money may be increased or may be diminished. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion, with all respect to Finlay, J., that this appeal should be allowed.

GREENE, L.J.—I agree, but out of respect for the opinion of the learned judge, I would like to add my reasons in a few words. The argument for the respondent is based on the view that the sum of £15,000 mentioned in the contract has no real existence at all, in this sense, that the contract would be exactly the same if all reference to that sum were omitted. That argument I am quite unable to accept. When cl. 3 is examined it is quite clear, in my opinion, that the primary obligation is the obligation to pay a sum of £15,000; that is the immediate obligation; and it only falls to be varied and the payment only falls to be postponed in so far as the provisions of cl. 4 are brought into operation. Under cl. 4 the purchaser covenants to pay certain sums each year for a period of ten years, and the only circumstances in which the vendor is willing to accept and is bound to accept a sum less than £15,000 are the circumstances mentioned at the conclusion of cl. 4, that is to say

> "if the aggregate of the capital sums paid during the said period of ten years shall amount to a less sum than the balance of the primary price the vendor shall take and accept such sums in full satisfaction of such balance."

In view of those words it appears to me quite impossible to say that the sum of £15,000 has no real existence for the purposes of the present question. That sum remains, and the purchaser cannot compel the vendor to accept anything less unless the conditions at the end of cl. 4 come into operation. That paragraph in cl. 4 is contemplating that the purchaser will continue to carry on the business for a period of ten years, and it is in the event of the payments during the ten years amounting to less than the balance of £15,000 that the vendor agrees to accept the less sum. If the purchaser were at the end of seven years at a time when, let me say £12,000 only had been paid, to decline to continue to carry on the business and were to close it down, the condition on which the vendor agrees to accept a reduction of the £15,000 would not have come into effect and, therefore, the original obligation to pay the £15,000 (less what had been paid) would, in my opinion, remain. It seems to me that the same result would follow if the purchaser failed to carry out his covenant to make annual payments, because the sum of £15,000 is only to be increased or diminished "as hereinafter provided." That imports a reference to the purchaser's covenant to make the annual payments, and unless the purchaser acts in strict accordance with cl. 4, he does not, in my opinion, get the twofold benefit of, first of all, a postponement of the payment of the purchase price, and, secondly, the possibility of diminution in the purchase price ultimately enuring to his benefit, coupled with, on the other side, the risk of an increase. It seems to me that, so far from the sum of £15,000 being mere surplusage in this agreement, it performs a very important and, indeed, essential task in the structure and operation of the agreement. With regard to the last submission that Mr. Donovan made, that with regard to this particular tax year you cannot correlate the payment made with any principal sum, in my opinion that argument cannot be sustained. The principal sum, the purchase price, is £15,000 unless and until certain events have happened, and the true statement to make with regard to that £886 is that it is in diminution of the purchase price, in part payment of the purchase price of £15,000, and that is so notwithstanding that in events which may happen in the future the full sum of £15,000 may be either diminished or increased. I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

H.M. POSTMASTER-GENERAL v. BIRMINGHAM CORPORATION

[COURT OF APPEAL (Slesser and Roche, L.JJ., and Swift, J.), July 25, 26, 1935]

[Reported [1936] 1 K.B. 66; 105 L.J.K.B. 10; 153 L.T. 405; 99 J.P. 361; 51 T.L.R. 581; 79 Sol. Jo. 592; 33 L.G.R. 395]

Telegraphs—Level of street altered by highway authority under town planning scheme—Liability for cost of removal and re-erection of telegraph lines thereby necessitated—Telegraph Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 112), s. 15—Telegraph Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 76), s. 7 (3).

A highway authority, in carrying out town planning schemes authorised by the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Acts, 1909 and 1919, altered the level and width of certain streets, and so made it necessary to take down and re-erect the telegraph poles and lines therein. On the question whether s. 7 (3) of the Telegraph Act, 1878, which authorises the Postmaster-General to recover the expenses of such telegraph work "where provision is not otherwise made by enactment" applied, or whether it was excluded by s. 15 of the Telegraph Act, 1863, which provides that "in case the body having the control of any street . . . hereafter resolves to alter the line or level of any portion of such street . . . in, upon, over, along . . . which any work of the company . . . is placed, the company shall be bound . . . at their own expense to remove such work and to replace the same."

Held: (i) the authority were a body having "the control of [a] street or public road" and had resolved "to alter the line or level of any portion of such street or road," and, therefore, they were entitled to call upon the Postmaster-General to pay the expenses of the alterations to the telegraph lines under s. 15;

(ii) since s. 15 applied, provision was "otherwise made by enactment" and so s. 7 (3) did not apply.

QUÆRE, whether a body other than a highway authority (e.g., a non-county borough as regards a road for which the county council are highway authority) can rely on s. 15 when doing work on a highway under their town planning powers.

Notes. Section 15 of the Telegraph Act, 1863, has been repealed; see now the Public Utilities Street Works Act, 1950, Part II, Sched. 4 and Sched. 5. The relevant Town and Country Planning legislation is now contained in ss. 49 (under which orders to stop up or divert highways are made) and 117 (2) (4) (application of s. 7 of the Act of 1878) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, as modified by Sched. 5 and Part II of the Act of 1950.

As to the liability of the Postmaster-General under s. 15 of the Telegraph Act, 1863, see 32 Halsbury's Laws (2nd Edn.) 18, para. 22; and as to alterations of a telegraph line involved by work done in the execution of an undertaking authorised by statute, see 32 Halsbury's Laws (2nd Edn.) 27–28, para. 33. For the Telegraph Act, 1863, s. 15, and the Telegraph Act, 1878, s. 7, see 24 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 971, 1018. For the Public Utilities Street Works Act, 1950, Part II, Sched. 5, see 29 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 345–352, 373–374, 376. For the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, ss. 49, 117 (2), (4), see 25 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 558, 634.

Appeal from the decision of Goddard, J., on a special case for the argument of a point of law, set down under R.S.C., Ord. XXV, r. 2. The Corporation in the course of carrying out two town planning schemes widened and altered the level of certain streets in their area, and this necessitated the taking down and subsequent re-erection of a number of telegraph posts and lines, at a cost of £916 15s. 9d. The question in dispute was whether this cost had to be borne by the Postmaster-General or the Corporation.

The Telegraph Act, 1863, s. 15, provides:

> "In case the body having the control of any street or public road at any time hereafter resolves to alter the line or level of any portion of such street or road under, in, upon, over, along, or across which any work of the company constructed either before or after the passing of this Act is placed, the company shall from time to time be bound . . . at their own expense to remove such work and to replace the same. . . ."

It was not disputed that the Postmaster-General was to be treated as "the company" for the purposes of the above cited section. The Telegraph Act, 1878, provides: Section 2:

> "The expression 'Act of Parliament' means any Act of Parliament whether public, general, local and personal, or private, and includes the order confirmed by any such Act. . . . The expression 'undertaking' means the works or undertaking of whatever nature the execution of which is authorised by an Act of Parliament as above defined. . . . Section 7: Where any work proposed to be done in the execution of an undertaking authorised by an Act of Parliament involves . . . an alteration . . . in any telegraphic line of the Postmaster-General, and provision is not otherwise made by enactment agreement or otherwise with respect to such alteration . . . the following enactments shall apply . . . (3) if the Postmaster-General . . . states that it is his intention himself to make such alteration, it shall be lawful for such Postmaster-General . . . to make the same, and the undertakers . . . shall pay to the Postmaster-General all the expenses incurred by him of and incidental thereto. . . ."

Goddard, J., held that the expenses of the taking down and re-erection of the posts and lines arose out of work for which provision was "otherwise made by enactment" within the meaning of s. 7 of the Telegraph Act, 1878, and must therefore be borne by the Postmaster-General.

The Postmaster-General appealed.

SLESSER, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Goddard, J., giving judgment on a special Case Stated between the Postmaster-General, the plaintiff, and the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of the City of Birmingham, the defendants. The question which has to be determined is whether the Corporation of Birmingham can or cannot require the Postmaster-General to carry out certain alterations to telegraph lines at his own expense. The question arises in the following way. Under the provisions of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909, as amended by the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919, there is power given to a local authority in the circumstances stated in those Acts to execute certain works in their area. It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to consider the provisions of that Act generally, because there is no question here but that in the two schemes which we have to consider everything was validly done. By s. 55 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1909,

> "The Local Government Board"—now the Ministry of Health—"may prescribe a set of general provisions . . . for carrying out the general objects of town planning schemes, and in particular for dealing with the matters set out in the Fourth Schedule to this Act."

In the Fourth Schedule are set out,

> "matters to be dealt with by general provisions prescribed by the Local Government Board."

Paragraph 1 is: "Streets, roads, and other ways, and stopping up, or diversion of existing highways." Power is also given to the Local Government Board, by s. 55 (2) of the Act of 1909, to define the area to which the scheme is to apply, and the authority who are to be responsible for enforcing the observance of the scheme, and for the execution of any works which under this scheme are to be executed by a local authority. The local authority, as defined by s. 65 (1), includes the council of any borough, urban, or rural district. The Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919, amending the 1909 Act, does not contain any amendment which is material, in my view, to any matter which has to be considered in this case. Acting under those two statutes, or, more exactly, acting under the Act of 1909 in the case of one scheme, and under the Act of 1909 as amended by the Act of 1919 in the other scheme, two town planning schemes were ordered in the county borough of Birmingham. Those schemes, as finally approved, are annexed to the case. Having recited in the case of the Birmingham (South) Town Planning Scheme, and in the case of the Quinton, Harborne, and Edgbaston Town Planning Scheme, that the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of the city of Birmingham have prepared town planning schemes, the schemes are approved. The Corporation is designated as the authority under cl. 2 of the scheme. New streets are defined in cl. 4 of the Birmingham scheme, and in cl. 4 of the Quinton scheme, as streets which are to be constructed or altered in accordance with these schemes.

It became necessary in the execution of those schemes to alter the positions of certain telegraph lines, and the question arises, at whose expense must those alterations be made. It is that

> "each of the widenings stated in para. 3 of the special case was carried out by them in pursuance of a resolution passed by the city council of Birmingham to carry out the work and in conformity with and for the purpose of carrying into effect the Birmingham (South) Town Planning Scheme and the Quinton, Harborne, and Edgbaston Town Planning Scheme. But the Corporation had power to carry out such widenings apart from the provisions of the scheme under the Birmingham Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1883, the Highways Act, 1835, and the Public Health Act, 1875."

Later, the case says:

> "The construction of such new streets was carried out by the Corporation in pursuance of a resolution passed by the city council of Birmingham to carry out the work and in conformity with, and for the purpose of carrying into effect," the schemes.

In my opinion that is a finding in the case that the city Corporation of Birmingham, in carrying out this work involving expenditure on the telegraph lines, were carrying it out in pursuance of a resolution under the Housing, Town Planning Acts, and in no other way. The case points out that had the Corporation wished, they could have carried out these widenings under other Acts, but I think the finding is one that they did in fact purport to act under the Housing, Town Planning Acts. In those circumstances the question arises under which statute is this work to be covered. Is it under the Telegraph Act, 1878, or is it under the Telegraph Act, 1863?

Section 7 of the Telegraph Act, 1878, provides that:

> "Where any work proposed to be done in the execution of an undertaking authorised

> A by an Act of Parliament involves or is likely to involve an alteration either temporarily or permanently in any telegraphic line of the Postmaster-General, and provision is not otherwise made by enactment, agreement, or otherwise with respect to such alteration, or to giving notice to the Postmaster-General thereof, or to the expenses of or incidental thereto,"

B certain enactments shall apply. It is not suggested in the case that an agreement was made for any special provision for the alteration. If the provisions of the Act of 1878 do apply, then by sub-s. (3) of s. 7 it is provided:

> "If the Postmaster-General by his counter-notice states that it is his intention himself to make such alteration, it shall be lawful for such Postmaster-General by himself or his agents to make the same, and the undertakers or their agents shall C pay to the Postmaster-General all the expenses incurred by him of and incidental thereto, and the amount of any loss or damage sustained by him in consequence thereof."

In the present case it is argued by the Postmaster-General that, there being work proposed to be done in the execution of an undertaking authorised by an Act of Parliament, namely, this town planning scheme, of widening or altering these roads, which D involves or is likely to involve an alteration in the telegraph line of the Postmaster-General, there is a duty upon the Birmingham Corporation to pay to the Postmaster-General the expenses incurred by him of and incidental thereto.

On the other hand the Birmingham Corporation wish to take advantage of the words of s. 7, "and provision is not otherwise made by enactment." They say that provision has been otherwise made by enactment with regard to this work proposed to be done in E the execution of an undertaking authorised by an Act of Parliament, and they say that the enactment which so provides is to be found in an earlier Act dealing with telegraphs, an Act which was passed before the telegraphs came under the control of the Post Office at all, when they were still in the powers of private companies. Section 15 of the Telegraph Act, 1863, which really is the critical section for our consideration, is to the following effect:

> "In case the body having control of any street or public road at any time hereafter resolves to alter the line or level of any portion of such street or road under, in, upon, over, along or across which any work of the company constructed either before or after the passing of this Act is placed, the company shall from time to time be bound, on receiving one month's notice of such intended alteration, and at their own G expense, to remove such work and to replace the same . . . as may be required by such body."

There is no question here but that the Birmingham Corporation, as the highway authority for Birmingham, the urban authority under the Public Health Acts, are in control of the streets and public roads herein affected, but certain questions arise for consideration in order to decide whether or not they can take advantage of s. 15 of the Act of 1863. H If they can, they can call upon the Postmaster-General, who is the legal successor of the companies, to do the work at his own expense.

The two matters which have to be considered are as follows: First, the Postmaster-General contends that the language of s. 7 of the Telegraph Act, 1878, is not appropriate to deal with the case of any other general Act at all. He puts the case in this way: It is true that the earlier part of s. 7 refers to an undertaking authorised by an Act of I Parliament, but when the section goes on to say, "and provision is not otherwise made by enactment," the particular enactment which deals with a specific alteration of works authorised is indicated, and unless such provision is made in the particular enactment, the undertakers—that is, the corporation—are liable for the expenses. Now here it is not suggested by the Birmingham Corporation that there are any particular provisions made as to the expenses being paid by the Postmaster-General in the particular Act, and if they are to succeed they must have recourse to general legislation, other than this particular Act, empowering them to do the works. As a matter of fact they are not here empowered by an Act: they are empowered by a scheme under the Act, which, under the Housing, Town Planning Acts, it is said, has to be read as if it were part of an Act of Parliament. The definition of an Act of Parliament in s. 2 of the Act of 1878 includes an order confirmed by any such Act. So no question can arise on that point. In my opinion, and it is an opinion in confirmation of the view of GODDARD, J., it is not possible so to limit the language of s. 7 of the Act of 1878. I think that the words "provision is not otherwise made by enactment" mean what they say, and that the language is general in its application. GODDARD, J., says this ([1935] 1 K.B. at p. 411):

> "In spite of the powerful argument of counsel for the Postmaster-General I do not think that I should limit the meaning of the word 'enactment' in the way that is suggested. If that had been the intention of the legislature it could have been made much clearer by s. 7; I think that the proviso to s. 7 means that if there is an enactment with respect to 'such alteration'—that is to say, the alteration involved in the carrying out of this work—then that enactment is to apply and not s. 7; and, as this work alters the line or level of the portion of the street or road, I hold that it falls within s. 15"

—that is, s. 15 of the Act of 1863.

In those circumstances all I can say is that I entirely agree with the view expressed by GODDARD, J.. Counsel for the Corporation, apart from relying upon the unqualified language of this provision, points out another reason why we should take the view which the language itself on the face of it suggests. He points out that in the closing words of s. 7 of the Act of 1878 occurs this language:

> "And where under s. 8 of the Telegraph Act, 1863, any body to or by whom any such pipe as in that section mentioned belongs or is used require that the position of any telegraphic line of the Postmaster-General or any part thereof should be altered, the enactments of the present section shall apply, and for such purposes any such body shall be deemed to be 'undertakers.'"

Under the Act of 1863 there is a provision made for the powers of the company, as it then was, and among others under s. 8 it is provided:

> "In the exercise of the aforesaid powers, the company shall also be subject to the following restrictions: (1) They shall cause as little detriment or inconvenience as circumstances admit to the body or person to or by whom any pipe for the supply of water or gas belongs or is used; (2) before they alter the position of any such pipe they shall give to the body to whom the same belongs notice of their intention to do so."

In such a case, therefore, it is clear that at that time, under s. 15 of the Act of 1863, the expenses had to fall upon the company and, moreover, under sub-s. (4) of s. 8, the one dealing with pipes, there is this specific provision:

> "The company shall pay all reasonable expenses to which such body may be put on account of such superintendence,"

one of the matters required under sub-s. (3) is that there shall be superintendence. Were it not, therefore, for the provisions in the Act of 1878, the company—now the Postmaster-General—would continue to be liable for the expenses stated in s. 8 of the Act of 1863, but it is in terms provided that the enactment of the present section (s. 7) shall apply, and the enactment of the present section, as I have pointed out, puts the expense upon the persons incurring the work. Counsel for the Corporation argues, and I think the argument is a very persuasive one, that this dealing specifically with the pipes in a particular way, leaving other expenses incurred untouched, points to the generality of this legislation and does not deal with any specific provision in a particular Act as such. Again, in another argument he points out that the definition of an Act of Parliament in s. 2 of the Act of 1878 "means any Act of Parliament whether public, general, local and personal, or private," and that indicates again the generality of the provision.

I have come to the conclusion, therefore, without any doubt that on this point counsel for the Corporation is right, and that if he can point to any enactment which contains provisions for doing the work proposed to be done in the execution of an undertaking authorised by Act of Parliament, he is entitled to say he is outside the ambit of s. 7 of the Act of 1878. The Act on which he relies is the Telegraph Act, 1863, and the whole case resolves itself into this question, whether he can or cannot bring himself within the ambit of s. 15 of that Act? If he cannot, however general the provisions of s. 7 of the Act of 1878, he still comes within it for want of finding any specific enactment to take him out of it.

The difficulty which I have felt in this case is as follows: this section, in my opinion, contemplated at the time of its passing that the body having the control of the street or public road would in most cases resolve to alter the line or level, if such resolution was to be made at all, in its capacity as such a body, that is to say, the highway authority. Counsel for the corporation points out that the powers of a highway authority to alter the line or level of a street are entirely statutory. With regard to the power of widening it is not necessary to go back to the earlier Acts of the eighteenth century. It is sufficient to say that by the Highways Act, 1835, specific powers are given to the highway authority to widen highways and also in regard to the alteration of level. At the time of the passing of the Act of 1863 there was specific power given to alter the level of highways. Therefore the powers which existed in 1863 were statutory powers. Now in the present case, in my view of the finding in this case, the works which are to be executed are not executed by the highway authority under its highway powers at all. The Corporation could, on the finding in the case, have executed them under the Highways Act, but as I read it they have not done so. They have done it in pursuance of their powers under the Housing, Town Planning Acts, but nevertheless the Corporation of Birmingham is a highway authority for all purposes in Birmingham.

As I indicated in the course of the argument, in the case of a non-county borough difficulties might arise which do not arise in this case. In the case of a non-county borough, by the operation of Part III of the Local Government Act, 1929, particularly s. 31, the county council are the authority with respect to classified roads. A classified road means a road classified by the Minister of Transport under s. 17 (2) of the Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, and may include a road in a non-county borough, which non-county borough nevertheless may be a local authority under the Housing, Town Planning Acts for the purpose of altering the highway under the general provisions of those Acts. In certain cases, therefore, difficulties may arise. It may have to be considered hereafter whether it can properly be said that a non-county borough, in so far as it is dealing under its housing and town planning powers with a road of which the county council are the highway authority (of which road, therefore, it may, in my view, be said that the county council are the body having control of the street), is within the ambit of s. 15 of the Act of 1863 at all. In such a case it may be that a telegraph pole which is moved in a street which does come within the control of the non-county borough falls within s. 15, with consequent expense to the Postmaster-General, and that a telegraph pole moved in a street which is not under the control of the non-county borough may come to be paid for under the later Act by the local authority. I do not think in this case it is necessary to consider that problem. It may well be that the Ministry of Health, who are the central authority under both Acts, may make provision when housing and town planning schemes are to be undertaken by non-county boroughs, that they shall not have the power to deal with highways which are not under their control without the concurrence of the county council.

However that may be, I have come to the conclusion that, in so far as the Birmingham Corporation are in any view a body having the control of the street, and as they have resolved to alter the line of that street, it does not matter for the present purpose whether they acted under the Housing, Town Planning Acts, or whether they acted under the Highways Act. I think the finding that they can act under the Highways Act if they wish to do so is an important one, and may distinguish such a case from the case of a non-county borough, an urban district council, or a rural authority exercising power under the Housing, Town Planning Acts. The case of the rural authority could scarcely now arise because, for the most part, they have no control over roads at all under the Local Government Act, 1929. However that may be, I think that the Birmingham Corporation in this case satisfy the conditions of s. 15 of the Act of 1863.

They are the body having control of the street; they have resolved to alter the line or level of the street under their statutory powers and obligations under the town planning schemes, and being, therefore, a body which is so authorised, they can exclude themselves from the provisions of the statute of 1878. They fall within s. 15 of the earlier Act, and in consequence I think that the case must be answered in favour of the Corporation, and that they are entitled to call upon the Postmaster-General to pay the expenses of the alteration to these telegraph lines.

The appeal, therefore, will be dismissed.

ROCHE, L.J.—I agree in thinking that the judgment of GODDARD, J., is right, and that this appeal should be dismissed. My Lord has stated the facts and relevant enactments so fully that it is unnecessary for me to do more than to express compendiously my grounds for agreeing with his conclusion.

The matter presents itself to me as follows: The effect of the Telegraph Act, 1863, is in substance this: It gave the company, whose successor is the Postmaster-General, power under certain conditions to construct works in or under roads or streets. It provided that if the line or level of the roads or streets had to be altered, the owners of the telegraph lines should make any consequential removal or replacement of their works at their expense. The Act of 1878 would enable the Postmaster-General to recover the sums in question unless the Act of 1863 applied to make them payable by himself as owner of the telegraph lines. In my opinion it does apply, and I am unable to accept the ingenious argument that the enactment, in s. 7 of the Act of 1878, refers to special or ad hoc enactments dealing with specific works and does not refer to general enactments such as that of 1863. No such limitation upon the word "enactment" is expressed, and, in my judgment, none can or should be implied. On the contrary, I regard the observations of counsel for the Corporation as to the matter of water- and gas-pipes as very weighty. The Act of 1878 (see s. 7) expressly dealt with provisions of the earlier Act of 1863 by way of variation or exclusion. If it had been intended to vary or exclude from operation the road or street provision, one would certainly have expected similar express language to be employed. In reference to the capacity in which the Corporation altered the line and level of these streets, a body having the control of a street or road requires statutory authority to alter the line or level of any street or road. That authority may be derived from a general or special Act. In the present case the authority came from the Housing, Town Planning Acts and the schemes made thereunder. In my judgment, the resolve of the Corporation to alter the line and level of the streets was the resolve of a body which had the control of those streets, none the less because the resolve was due to and was justified by the Town Planning Acts and the schemes made thereunder.

For these reasons in my opinion the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

SWIFT, J.—I agree, and I do not wish to add anything to the reasons which have been given by my Lords, or the result at which the court has arrived.

Appeal dismissed.

THE NJEGOS

[Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (Sir Boyd Merriman, P.), October 31, November 1, 7, 8, December 19, 1935]

Shipping—Bill of lading—Incorporation of charterparty—Law governing bill of lading—Interpretation of charterparty according to English law—Exceptions clause—No express statement as to law of interpretation—Arbitration clause not incorporated in bill of lading.

By a charterparty in the form of the Chamber of Shipping River Plate "Centrocon" Charterparty, 1914, entered into in London on May 19, 1932, between an English company as agents for the shipowners and the English branch of a French company as agents for the charterers, a company incorporated under the laws of Argentina, the Yugoslav ship N. was chartered to load a cargo of grain at Rosario and Buenos Aires and proceed to ports in Europe. After the N. had loaded part of her cargo at Rosario, she proceeded to Buenos Aires, and while she was there fire broke out on two occasions in her port bunker. The fires were extinguished, but water damaged part of the cargo. The damaged cargo was discharged into lighters and sold. On arrival at the Scandinavian ports to which the vessel was bound it was found that the cargo was short, and the plaintiffs, as indorsees of the bills of lading, claimed from the Yugoslavian shipowners damages for the short delivery. The plaintiffs alleged that the fires were due to heating of the bunkers through insufficiency of ventilation or through the shipowners or their servants having permitted them to become damp, and that the ship was, therefore, unseaworthy and unfit for the reception or carriage of the cargo. The defendants, while denying that the N. was unseaworthy, claimed that they were protected by an exceptions clause in the charterparty which, they said, was incorporated in the bills of lading. By an amended defence the defendants pleaded that the law governing the bills of lading contracts was the law of the flag, i.e., Yugoslavian law, under which, provided that the shipowners had exercised due diligence to keep their ship seaworthy, the exceptions in the charterparty would apply without the warranty of seaworthiness which was to be implied under English law. On the hearing of a preliminary issue as to what law was applicable to the bills of lading the defendants admitted that the proper law of the charterparty was English law.

Held: there was no necessary presumption that the law of the flag applied; the incorporation in a bill of lading by reference to whatever in a charterparty was germane to the receipt, carriage, or delivery of the cargo or the payment of the freight did not offend against the rule that the doctrine of constructive notice had no application to commercial documents; where it was proper, according to mercantile usage, to tender as one of the shipping documents a bill of lading incorporating by reference provisions of an English charterparty in the customary form, the true inference was that the sensible business man must be assumed to intend that the bill of lading should be read with the English interpretation which admittedly attached to the charterparty, although that interpretation was nowhere expressly stated, but was to be inferred from indications scattered throughout the charterparty and notwithstanding that one of the indications—namely, an arbitration clause in the usual English form—was not included among the provisions incorporated in the bill of lading; and, therefore, the law governing the bill of lading was not that of the kingdom of Yugoslavia, but was English law.

Preliminary Issue tried on an agreed statement of facts, the question being whether the law governing the contracts of affreightment in the bills of lading for River Plate grain cargoes in the Yugoslavian steamship Njegos was or was not the law of the flag.

The plaintiffs were the Norwegian and Danish receivers of certain quantities of maize and pollards shipped at Rosario and Buenos Aires in May and June, 1932, on board the steamship Njegos. The defendants, the Yugoslavenski Lloyd, a.d., incorporated under the laws of Yugoslavia, with their head office at Zagreb, were the owners of the Njegos.

By a charterparty in the form of the Chamber of Shipping River Plate "Centrocon" Charterparty, 1914, entered into in London on May 19, 1932, between Baburizza & Co., Ltd., a company registered in England, as agents for the defendants, the shipowners, and Louis Dreyfus & Co., the English branch of Louis Dreyfus et Cie, of Paris, as agents for the charterers, Sociedad Anonima Comercial de Exportacion e Importacion (Louis Dreyfus y Cia) Limitada, of Buenos Aires, a company incorporated under the laws of the Republic of Argentina (hereinafter referred to as "the Sociedad"), the Njegos was chartered to load a full cargo of maize and pollards at Rosario and Buenos Aires. The Njegos commenced loading at Rosario on May 31, 1932, and there took in a part cargo of yellow maize. On June 6 she proceeded to Buenos Aires to complete her loading, and arrived there on June 7. On June 10 and before any cargo had been loaded in the Njegos at Buenos Aires, a fire broke out in the vessel's port bunker. This was extinguished and on the same day the Njegos commenced to load a cargo which included 2,396 bags of pollards. In the afternoon of June 11 a second fire broke out in the port bunker and part of the cargo was damaged by water used to extinguish the fire. The damaged cargo, which consisted partly of the maize taken in at Rosario and partly of a portion of the parcel of 2,396 bags of pollards shipped at Buenos Aires, had to be discharged and sold. On July 9, having finished loading the cargo originally intended for her at Buenos Aires, and also a further quantity of maize and pollards to replace the cargo which had been damaged, discharged, and sold, the Njegos proceeded on her homeward voyage. She discharged her cargo at three ports in Norway and one in Denmark, the discharge being completed on Sept. 6, 1932.

A Two bills of lading, dated respectively May 31 and June 6, 1932, had been signed by the master in respect of the yellow maize shipped at Rosario, and he had also signed another bill of lading dated June 10, 1932, in respect of the parcel of pollards loaded at Buenos Aires. These bills of lading acknowledged the shipment in good order and condition of various quantities of the said goods by the Sociedad at Rosario and Buenos Aires,

> "for carriage to a port as ordered and delivery in the like good order and condition unto Louis Dreyfus et Cie or their assigns."

The Sociedad sold the goods to the plaintiffs on the terms of the London Corn Trade Association contracts.

In November, 1934, the Njegos, having for the first time since the occurrences here in C question come to British waters, was arrested at Hartlepool and a writ was issued against her. She was subsequently released on bail being given on behalf of the defendants.

The plaintiffs, the indorsees of the bills of lading, to whom the property in the goods represented by the bills of lading had passed by reason of the indorsement of the bills of lading, claimed damages against the defendants for the breach of the contracts contained in the said bills of lading by reason of the short delivery of some 251,000 kilos of D the said yellow maize shipped at Rosario and of 9,784 kilos of pollards loaded at Buenos Aires. According to the statement of claim, which alleged that two fires had broken out before the vessel loaded at Buenos Aires and that, by the fire brigade's accumulation of water, cargo had been damaged, a large quantity of cargo was discharged into lighters and sold by the shipowners' agents at Buenos Aires, who retained the proceeds. The plaintiffs alleged that the steamship was damaged and that an average agreement in E Lloyds form was signed in London and the sum of £1,750 deposited thereunder by Louis Dreyfus & Co. for the plaintiffs, and that on Dec. 7, 1932, £750 was paid to the shipowners out of the deposit without prejudice to the plaintiffs' liability in general average. They said that the fire was due to heating of the bunkers through insufficiency of ventilation or through permitting them to become damp, and that the steamship was, therefore, unseaworthy and unfit for the reception or carriage of the cargo.

F The case for the defendants was that the bills of lading incorporated all the terms and exceptions, including the negligence clause of a charterparty dated in London May 19, 1932, and made between the defendants and the Buenos Aires branch of Louis Dreyfus et Cie, of Paris. Clause 29 of the said charterparty provided as follows:

> "The steamship shall not be liable for loss or damage occasioned by . . . perils of the sea . . . fire from any cause or wheresoever occurring . . . or any latent defects G in . . . appurtenances . . . even when occasioned by the negligence default or error of judgment of the . . . master, mariners or other servants of the shipowners or persons for whom they are responsible (not resulting, however, in any case from want of due diligence by the owners of the steamer or by the ship's husband or manager). . . ."

The defendants said that, if there were short delivery, the short delivery was due to H one of the excepted causes included in the above cl. 29 of the charterparty. After setting out the circumstances of the fires at Buenos Aires and their extinction by the local fire brigade, the defendants in their particulars said that by reason of the said fires it was necessary to discharge the cargo from the spaces where the fires had broken out and (or) into which water had percolated in order to separate the sound from the damaged cargo and to preserve the sound cargo. The sound cargo was subsequently re- I loaded and the damaged cargo was sold at Buenos Aires and the defendants said that they had given credit to the plaintiffs in general average in the sum of £254 0s. 8d. in respect of the proceeds of the sale. The defendants denied that the Njegos was unseaworthy or unfit as alleged by the plaintiffs, and in the alternative they said that if the vessel was unseaworthy the defendants were not liable for any part of the alleged short delivery by reasons of the provisions contained in the charterparty. By an amended defence, the defendants further said that the law governing the bills of lading was Yugoslavian law, that they had complied with the regulations of Yugoslav law in respect of the Njegos, and that such compliance was deemed under Yugoslav law to constitute the exercise of due diligence to make the ship seaworthy. In Yugoslav law that was enough, as, under that law, an absolute condition precedent of seaworthiness was not implied in contracts of affreightment and there was no liability upon them such as was required of a common carrier under English law.

The arguments of counsel and the cases relied on by them respectively are set out or referred to with sufficient particularity in the judgment of the President.

Sir Robert Aske, K.C., and Harry Atkins for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19. SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., read the following judgment. This is an argument of a point of law on an agreed statement of facts. The plaintiffs claim, as indorsees of the bills of lading, in respect of the short delivery of a certain quantity of maize and pollards which were damaged as the result of a fire on board the defendants' vessel Njegos, in which the goods were shipped. The plaintiffs alleged that the fire was caused by the unseaworthiness of the vessel. The defendants pleaded that the bills of lading incorporated all the terms, conditions and exceptions, including the negligence clause, of the charterparty made between themselves and the shippers, and counterclaimed for a general average contribution. In their reply and defence to counterclaim, the plaintiffs relied on the allegation of unseaworthiness in answer to the negligence clause. Up to this point, therefore, it was the defendants who were relying on the incorporation of the charterparty in the bills of lading, and the issue in effect was whether the damage was or was not caused by the unseaworthiness of the vessel. By an amendment of the defence, however, the defendants alleged that the law governing the bills of lading was Yugoslav law. It was agreed between the parties that this issue should be tried as a preliminary point of law. The assumption is that, if it is established that Yugoslav law governs the contract of affreightment, the exceptions would apply without any implied warranty of seaworthiness and that the defendants, therefore, would not be liable on the claim and would recover on the counterclaim. But it is not to be taken that it was proved or admitted that this would necessarily be the effect of Yugoslav law. By a convenient arrangement a statement of facts was agreed, and this statement must be taken to be incorporated in this judgment. It is only necessary for me to add, by way of summary, that the law of the flag of the ship was Yugoslav; that the charterparty was made in England, in an English form and in the English language, between an English company, as agents for the Yugoslav owners, and the English branch of a French company, as agents for Argentine shippers; that the bills of lading were in an English form and in the English language; and that the destination of the goods were ports in Norway and Denmark respectively. It was also assumed, though it was not expressly stated, that the receivers of the goods were Norwegian or Danish nationals and that the shipping documents were to be taken up in those countries respectively. I was also informed that the bills of lading were in the common form adopted for this particular trade as long ago as 1914. As appears from the agreed statement, the charterparty was in the "Centrocon" form. This means, as the charterparty itself shows, the Chamber of Shipping River Plate Charterparty, 1914 (Homewards), in the form arranged and agreed with the Centro de Cereales of Buenos Aires and adopted by the Documentary Council of the Baltic and White Sea Conference. Counsel for the defendants expressly admitted that the proper law of that contract was English. I may just add that I have not failed to observe that the form as given to me was as amended in the 1934 edition. The charterparty in this case was of 1932.

This summary of the position shows that the choice of laws governing the contract of affreightment, in accordance with recognised principles, is almost as wide as it can be. The parties, however, themselves confined the choice of laws governing the contract to two alternatives. Counsel for the plaintiffs argued that the contract was governed by English law and his opponent that it was governed by the law of the flag, that is to say, by Yugoslav law. The point is an interesting one and was admirably argued on both sides.

Before dealing with the main argument, I will dispose of a subsidiary point raised, not very hopefully, by counsel for the plaintiffs. The charterparty contains the usual English arbitration clause. A well-known line of authorities lays down that this, taken by itself, may be regarded as decisive as to the application of English law to the contract: see Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery (1) and N. V. Kwik Hoo Tong Handel Maatschappij v. James Finlay & Co., Ltd. (2). He argued that this clause was incorporated, among others, in the bills of lading, with the result that English law would automatically apply to them also. I am of opinion that this point is unsound. The principle underlying the cases governing the incorporation of the terms of a charterparty in bills of lading, to some of which I shall have to refer later, seems to me to be inconsistent with the incorporation of the arbitration clause as such: see, for example, Thomas v. Portsea Steamship Co., Ltd. (3). Both counsel agreed, and their experience in these matters is unrivalled, that since the adoption of this form of bill of lading in 1914, attempts made in chambers, under the bill of lading to enforce the arbitration clause in the charterparty had uniformly failed, and that no one had been hardy enough to test the matter in court. I stopped counsel for the defendants in his argument upon this point and I decide it against the plaintiffs.

This brings me, however, to what, stated in various forms in the course of an interesting argument, is really the kernel of the matter. Counsel for the defendants argued that it was the existence of the arbitration clause alone which made English law the proper law of that contract. If, therefore, it was decided that this clause was not incorporated in the bill of lading, it followed that such clauses of the charterparty as were incorporated in the bill of lading were to be written into it without, as it were, any label or indication that they were to be interpreted by English law. The material words in the bills of lading are > "to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of 'as ordered' unto Louis Dreyfus & Cie, or their assigns, they paying freight for the said goods in accordance with the charterparty dated London, May 19, 1932. All the terms, conditions and exceptions of which charterparty, including the negligence clause, are incorporated herewith."

The real crux of the matter is whether cl. 29 of the charterparty, the material words of which are set out in the defence, which clause, as usual, is labelled marginally "Exceptions," is to be taken to be incorporated in the bills of lading verbatim, but entirely isolated from its context and with no indication of the proper law governing the contract from which it is taken, or whether it is to be taken to be incorporated as an extract from a contract to which English law is known to be applicable.

I do not agree with counsel for the defendants that the arbitration clause is the sole test of the nationality of the charterparty. I think there are several indicia all pointing the same way—for instance, the English language and the English form of these clauses which are admittedly incorporated and which include what GREER, L.J., described in A/S August Freuchen v. Steen Hansen (4) as "many old friends"; the fact that the freight is payable in sterling; that the measurements of capacity and the guarantee of grain space are in English measures; and not least important, the exceptions clause itself. Even so, however, counsel urges that the point remains the same. Only so much of the charterparty as is actually covered by the words I have quoted is to be incorporated into the bills of lading. The rest is to be ignored completely, and that which is incorporated carries with it no label of nationality derived from that which is to be ignored. It is not disputed, however, that the exceptions clause as a whole is included.

Both counsel start with the principle that the question, what law governs the contract, must be decided by the intention, actual or presumed, of the parties to the contract: see DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS (5th Edn.), p. 628, and CHESHIRE'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, pp. 182 to 185. But, to quote PROFESSOR DICEY at p. 666:

> "Here, as in other branches of law, an inquiry into the intention of the parties is really an inquiry, not into the actual intention of X. and A., for it possibly never had any real existence, but into the intention which would have been formed by sensible persons in the position of X. and A. if their attention had been directed to contingencies which escaped their notice."

Counsel for the defendants relies on the well-settled principle that, as between shipowners and shippers, the charterparty alone forms the contract, and the bills of lading are nothing but an acknowledgment of the shipment of the goods: Rodoconachi v. Milburn (5), per Lord Esher, M.R. (18 Q.B.D. at p. 75). But the contract in issue here, as he points out, is not the charterparty, but the contract between the shipowners and the ultimate receivers arising from the indorsement to them and the acceptance by them of the bills of lading in accordance with commercial usage. The bills of lading are the record of this contract: Leduc v. Ward (6). But as a matter of commercial practice the receivers can have no means of knowing the terms even of the bills of lading until the moment when, under their obligation to their sellers, they take up the shipping documents. I gather from a document which was put in as a typical contract of sale, that the receivers are in fact sub-purchasers of part of a quantity of unascertained goods not specified as being loaded in any particular ship, which had been sold by the shippers to the Norwegian State Grain Monopoly, and that this sale contract was governed by English law. But even when they take up the shipping documents the receivers have no means, in practice, of acquainting themselves with such terms of the actual charterparty as must be taken to be incorporated by the very terms of the bills of lading by which they are bound. Although, therefore, the receivers bind themselves, unseen, by the terms of the bills of lading, provided always that these are in a form usual and proper for the trade: see Burstall v. Grimsdale (7), (11 Com. Cas. at p. 290) and although these terms include such terms, conditions and exceptions of the charterparty as are held to be incorporated in the bills of lading, there is no room, it is argued, for any implication from these unseen terms as to the law by which the contract is to be governed.

I entirely agree with counsel for the defendants that the doctrine of constructive notice has no application to commercial documents: see Manchester Trust v. Furness (8); but it seems to me that there is all the difference in the world between an attempt, such as was made in the case cited, to import from a charterparty into a bill of lading contract, by constructive notice, an abnormal provision which was not germane to the payment of freight or the other conditions to be performed on the delivery of the cargo, and importing, with those clauses of the charterparty which are undoubtedly incorporated, the proper law by which they are governed, when it must be recognised that the charterparty will necessarily have a proper law, and that this will probably appear, expressly or by inference, on its face. There is no suggestion in the judgments in the Court of Appeal in Manchester Trust v. Furness (8) that the incorporation by reference of whatever in the charterparty is "germane to the receipt, carriage, or delivery of the cargo or the payment of the freight" (to quote the words of Lord Atkinson in Thomas v. Portsea Steamship Co., Ltd. (3) ([1912] A.C. at p. 6); and see Lord Gorell, ibid., at p. 8) offends the rule against applying the doctrine of constructive notice to commercial transactions. Indeed, Lord Lindley ([1895] 2 Q.B. at p. 545) recognises that this is the effect of the reference to a charterparty in a bill of lading.

In the absence of any expressed intention as to the law governing the contract, I am, as Professor Dicey points out, confronted with the difficult, but not unfamiliar, problem of deciding what that hypothetical person, the sensible business man, must be taken to intend when he is content to be bound by a contract in writing of which, by commercial usage, he is unable to see the actual terms beforehand, and with which, in practice, he does not really trouble himself in the least.

The charterparty in this case, as I have already said, is in the standard form adopted by the trade in 1914. When, therefore, a sensible business man contracts on the terms of bills of lading in a form also adopted by the trade in the same year, it seems to me, even if I am not permitted to suspect that he would actually know that the charterparty therein referred to would probably be in the "Centrocon" form and would, therefore, be governed by English law, that it is pressing too far the well-recognised principle that everything in the charterparty that is insensible must be rejected: see, for example, Hogarth Shipping Co. v. Blyth, Greene, Jourdain, & Co. (9); Fort Shipping Co. v. Pederson (10) and Vergottis v. Robinson David & Co. (11); to argue that the proper law of the charterparty is to be ignored when incorporating the material provisions in the bills of lading. I do not myself profess to understand how anyone contracting on the basis that the liabilities of the shipowner in connection with the receipt, carriage, and delivery of the cargo are subject to the exceptions contained in a separate document can know the terms on which he is contracting, unless and until he informs himself as to the system of law by which those exceptions are governed. It is not improbable that by this time the warranty of seaworthiness is implicit, unless it is expressly excluded, and that some other systems of law differ in this respect.

If, therefore, negotiations could take place between the shipowner and the receiver as to the incorporation in a bill of lading contract in English of certain specific clauses extracted from a charterparty in English, including an exceptions clause in the well-known English form, sensible business men would naturally wish to ascertain whether it was proposed that the contract should be read with the English implication or not. Otherwise, the exceptions to the liabilities of the shipowner would not be clearly defined. But even if this would be too much to expect with regard to a warranty which is read into the exceptions by implication, one would suppose that, at any rate, they would wish to define by what system of law the expressed exception of negligence was to be measured. If nothing was said to the contrary, I should assume that the intention was that the contract should be interpreted in light of the law by reference to which its clauses were drawn.

What, then, is the proper inference when the exigencies of commerce preclude any antecedent negotiations, and in the absence of any expressed intention? Provided always that it is proper, according to mercantile usage in the circumstances of the case, to tender as one of the shipping documents a bill of lading incorporating by reference certain provisions of an English charterparty in the customary form, I think that the true inference is that the sensible business man must be assumed to intend that the contract shall be read with the English interpretation which admittedly attaches to the charterparty as such, though that interpretation is nowhere expressly stated, but is to be inferred from several indications scattered throughout the charterparty, and, notwithstanding that one of the indications, namely, the arbitration clause, is not included among the provisions incorporated in his contract.

On the basis, however, that the incorporated provisions of the charterparty afforded no guide as to the proper law of the contract, counsel for the defendants argued that there were only four possible alternatives as to the proper law, namely, the lex loci contractus, the lex loci solutionis, the law of the flag, or that law which best gives efficacy to the contract. Of these he maintained that in connection with the contract of affreightment it is settled that the law of the flag should be preferred: Lloyd v. Guibert (12). Of these possibilities he asked me to reject the lex loci contractus and the lex loci solutionis. I agree with him, but I think that the reason why I was invited to reject these alternatives is worth noticing. The lex loci contractus with regard, for example, to some of the bills of lading would be Oslo, for it was there that the shipping documents were to be taken up; but as counsel pointed out, the place might have been anywhere in the Baltic, according as the bills of lading were indorsed to a national of one country or another. For the same reason the lex loci solutionis might be a port in one of several Baltic states. And, however willing the receiver might be to be bound by the law of his own State, there was, he said, no reason why the shipowner should be supposed to be ready to leave it to chance by what law he was to be bound.

I will refer in a moment to the authorities relating to the law of the flag, but in passing I would point out that there seems to be no particular business reason why the parties to this contract should wish to be bound by the law of the flag. The shipowner has already discarded the law of the flag in connection with the charterparty, though his own law. The receiver has actually bound himself to take the usual shipping documents by a contract which gave him no guidance whatever as to what the law of the flag might be expected to be. But counsel argued that there were only four reported cases in which the law of the flag had been ignored in connection with a contract of affreightment. They are A/S August Freuchen v. Steen Hansen (4), where GREER, J., preferred the English law of the charterparty for the sake of uniformity; the Adriatic (13), in which LANGTON, J., while not wholly convinced by the argument of uniformity, rejected A the law of the flag on the ground that none of the parties was in the least concerned with the nationality of the ship; in Re Missouri Steamship Co. (14), where the lex loci contractus, which incidentally was the law of the flag, was rejected in favour of English law on the ground that the contract of affreightment was in the English form and contained an exceptions clause valid in English law but invalid in the United States of America, where the contract was made (cf. Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery, (1)); and, finally, the B Industrie (15), where the Court of Appeal laid special stress on the English form of the charterparty. LORD ESHER's judgment in this last case seems to me to be particularly valuable as showing what are the real limits of the presumption in favour of the law of the flag in connection with a contract of affreightment. It seems quite plain that, in connection with such contracts as the master may be driven to make by necessity in the course of the voyage, the law of the flag should prevail, for it is that law which C governs his relations with his owners; but that, as is pointed out by LORD ESHER, M.R. ([1894] P. at p. 76), is by no means inconsistent with the proper law of the contract of affreightment being a different law.

In my opinion, all these cases show very clearly that, as regards the contract of affreightment as a whole, there is no necessary presumption that the law of the flag applies. I can well imagine that if the parties in this case had been in a position to form D an actual intention as to the law to govern their contract, the sensible shipowner would almost inevitably have stipulated that his rights and obligations in connection with the receipt, carriage and delivery of the cargo or the payment of the freight, should be the same in the two contracts formed respectively by the charterparty itself and by the bills of lading incorporating the relevant clauses of the charterparty. Nor, in the circumstances of this case, can I see any valid reason which would have induced the indorsees E of the bills of lading to dissent from that proposal.

Both on what, I think, should be presumed to be the intention of the parties and on the ground of business efficacy, I am prepared to hold that the law of the kingdom of Yugoslavia is not the law governing this contract. I am not expressly invited to say what the proper law is; but in case it may be of assistance to the parties if I express my opinion, and I have not already made it plain what that opinion is, I say that I think F the proper law of the contract is English law. The plaintiffs will have the costs. I have decided the preliminary point of law in the plaintiffs' favour, and given them the costs. I am not pronouncing any ultimate judgment in the case.

Decision on preliminary point.

Re BRINE AND DAVIES'S CONTRACT

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Farwell, J.), January 24, 25, 1935]

Sale of Land—Possessory title—Need to disclose in contract—Disclosure in abstract—Objection to title out of time.

A vendor and a purchaser entered into a contract for the sale of the vendor's registered freehold house. The contract was subject to the National Conditions of Sale (12th Edn.), Condition 4 of which provided that, if the purchaser did not take any objection to the title within fourteen days of the delivery of the abstract, he should be deemed to have accepted it. The abstract of title disclosed that the property had been registered with only a possessory title. Twenty-seven days after the delivery of the abstract the purchaser objected to the possessory title as not being sufficient.

Held: on the true construction of the contract the purchaser was entitled to assume that the abstract would show an absolute title; if the vendor could give only a possessory title, he should have stated that fact in the contract; as he had not done so the contract was misleading; and, therefore, the vendor was not entitled to rely on the fact that the objection to the title was not taken within the stipulated time.

Notes. As to disclosure of defects of title, see 29 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 256 et seq., and as to time for objections, see ibid., 285 et seq., and for cases, see 40 DIGEST 86 et seq., and 134 et seq.

Adjourned Summons

By a contract dated July 11, 1934, Archibald John Brine agreed to sell to Herbert Walter Davies a registered freehold house and premises known as 74, Ivy-road, Old Southgate, in the county of Middlesex. The property was sold subject to the National Conditions of Sale (12th Edn.). The date of completion was Aug. 11, 1934. An abstract of title was delivered to the purchaser's solicitors on July 12, 1934. From the abstract it appeared that the property had been registered merely with a possessory title. By s. 2 of condition 4 of the National Conditions of Sale, it is provided as follows:

> "The purchaser shall deliver his objections and requisitions (if any) in respect of the title and of all matters appearing in the abstract particulars or conditions of sale at the office of the vendor's solicitors within fourteen days from the actual delivery of the abstract . . . and in default of such objections and requisitions (if any) the purchaser shall be deemed to have accepted the title."

Before the delivery of the abstract the purchaser had reason to believe that the contract was for sale with an absolute title. On Aug. 8, 1934, that is to say, twenty-seven days after the delivery of the abstract of title, the purchaser's solicitors wrote to the vendor's solicitors and asked to be supplied with an earlier title, giving as their reason for such request that a possessory title was not sufficient. The vendor's solicitors failed to supply any title other than a possessory one, but they claimed that, as the purchaser had not delivered his objections or requisitions within the fourteen days required by condition 4 of the National Conditions, he must be deemed to have accepted the title in accordance with the provisions of that condition. The vendor did not bring any action for specific performance of the contract, and the purchaser took out a summons in which he asked for a declaration that the vendor had not shown a good title to the property in accordance with the contract and for the return of the deposit.

T. K. Wigan (R. M. Formoy with him) for the purchaser.
C. R. D. Richmount for the vendor.

FARWELL, J. [after stating the facts, continued:] The question to be decided is: What is the true meaning of the contract? In my judgment, anyone reading it would be entitled to assume that the abstract to be supplied would show an absolute title. If the vendor could give only a possessory title, he should have stated the fact in the contract. He did not do so, and, consequently, the contract is misleading, since the vendor represented that he could give an absolute title on the register, whereas, in fact, he had only a possessory title. If that be so, the vendor must be taken to have contracted to sell the property registered with an absolute title. The statutory declaration does not constitute such a title. In those circumstances, is the vendor entitled to rely on the fact that the objection to title was not taken within the time stipulated? In my judgment, he is not. The test in such a case is whether or not the court, in the circumstances, would grant the vendor specific performance of the contract, and, in my opinion, the answer to that question must be in the negative. The vendor here offers to the purchaser something substantially different from that which the purchaser contracted to purchase, and the vendor, therefore, cannot rely on "Condition 4." In the result the purchaser is entitled to the declaration which he seeks, and the vendor must pay the cost of the summons.

A will, dated June 27, 1927, ended with the words: "I hereby declare that this will is made in contemplation of marriage." On Nov. 7, 1927, the testator married the defendant and on Nov. 17, 1934, he died.

Held: to bring into effect s. 177 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, so as to prevent s. 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, from operating to revoke a will made before a testator's marriage there must be an express reference in that will to a marriage, and afterwards a solemnisation of that marriage; in the present case there was merely a general declaration of contemplation of marriage; and, therefore, the will was revoked by the subsequent marriage.

Probate Action

The plaintiffs, Muriel Ceinwen Sallis and Irene Sylvania Evans (who were daughters of the testator Evan Jones, who died on Nov. 17, 1934), propounded a will of the testator dated June 27, 1927, under which they were the executrices and residuary legatees. The defendant, Mrs. Annie Jones, claimed that the will was revoked by the marriage of the testator to her on Nov. 7, 1927.

The will, under which there were specific legacies of land to the testator's daughters (the plaintiffs), left the residue to them in equal shares as tenants in common, and ended with the following words: "And I hereby declare that this will is made in contemplation of marriage." It was stated in evidence that the first wife of the testator died on Feb. 28, 1927. In June, 1927, the testator told one of his daughters that he was going to marry the defendant, but that he would make a will which would put his daughters in a secure position. Later in the same month he made the will, and in August, 1927, he proposed marriage to the defendant and was accepted. Other material facts are stated in the judgment.

By s. 18 of the Wills Act, 1837:

> "Every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage. . . ."

By s. 177 of the Law of Property Act, 1925:

> "(1) A will expressed to be made in contemplation of a marriage shall, notwithstanding anything in section 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, or any other statutory provision or rule of law to the contrary, not be revoked by the solemnisation of the marriage contemplated."

F. S. H. Bryant (Clifford Mortimer with him) for the plaintiffs.—The will comes within the operation of the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 177 (1) because it can be deduced from the surrounding circumstances that the testator contemplated this particular marriage. The fact that the testator mentioned the name of his intended wife to the solicitor who drafted the clause in contemplation of the marriage was sufficient evidence that it was his coming marriage to her that was contemplated.

P. B. Morle for the defendant.—An inevitable requirement of the section is that the name of the intended spouse should be mentioned in the will. The will has to be made specifically in contemplation of an intended marriage, not, as in this case, in contemplation of marriage generally. In the only reported case on this section in the Probate Division, Pilot v. Gainfort (1), the woman who, after the will was made, became the wife of the testator was clearly identified in the will. The present case does not come within the operation of s. 177.

BENNETT, J.—The plaintiffs have proved that the will which they propound was executed by the testator in accordance with the requirements of the Wills Act, 1837, but the defendant, who is the widow of the deceased, defends the action and resists the claim to have the will admitted to probate on the ground that it was revoked by the marriage of the testator to her on Nov. 7, 1927. The only question which I have to decide is whether the defendant's marriage to the deceased in November, 1927, revoked the will of June 27, 1927.

Before the year 1926, when the Law of Property Act, 1925, came into operation, the case would have been clear. Section 18 of the Wills Act, 1837 provided, without qualification, that subject to an exception as to a will made in exercise of a power of appointment in certain circumstances. The will in this case is not within that exception, and before the Act of 1925 came into effect the will would plainly have been revoked by the marriage of the testator. But s. 177 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, restricts in certain circumstances the operation of s. 18 of the Wills Act, 1837. [His Lordship recited the terms of s. 177 and continued:] The will which the plaintiffs propound ends with this sentence: "And I hereby declare that this will is made in contemplation of marriage." There has been evidence in this case which I admitted de bene esse and there has been some conflict as to what the position of the testator with regard to the lady who became his wife in November, 1927, was on June 27, 1927, when he made his will. Evidence has been called by the plaintiffs for the purpose of proving that at that date the testator had in mind marriage with the defendant. The evidence consisted of statements said to have been made by him before June 27 to his brother-in-law, his sister, and a daughter, statements to the effect, according to the evidence, that the testator had in mind marriage with the defendant. On behalf of the defendant, evidence has been called which quite plainly establishes that, whatever the testator may have had in mind, he had not proposed to the defendant or been accepted by her until some date in August, 1927, after the will was made.

> "every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage"

I accept the evidence of the defendant that she never promised to marry the testator until some date in August, 1927, and then only on the terms that the marriage was not to take place until twelve months from the death of his first wife. The terms which were arranged between the testator and the defendant were modified because the plaintiff Mrs. Evans, who had lived with her father, the testator, had married, and when she married she left her father's home. I do not think it is necessary for me to decide, having regard to the view which I take of the section, whether or not the evidence is admissible.

It is plain, in my judgment, that, in order that the operation of s. 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, may be excluded and prevented from operating to revoke a will made before a testator's marriage, there must be in that will an express reference to a marriage and there must afterwards be a solemnisation of that marriage. It is plain, in my judgment, that, on the strict construction of s. 177, it has no operation unless there is found in the will something more than a declaration or a reference to marriage generally. All that is found in the will which the plaintiffs are propounding is a declaration that the will is made in contemplation of marriage and nothing more. In my judgment, that is not a declaration that the will is made in contemplation of a marriage followed by the solemnisation of that marriage. Accordingly, the will propounded by the plaintiffs was revoked by the subsequent marriage of the deceased and I pronounce against the will.

VAN DEN BERGHS, LTD. v. CLARK (INSPECTOR OF TAXES)

[House of Lords (Lord Atkin, Lord Tomlin, Lord Russell, Lord Macmillan and Lord Wright), March 4, 5, 7, April 8, 1935]

Income Tax—Income—Payment of lump sum for termination of profit-sharing agreement.

In 1908 V.D.B., Ltd., entered into an agreement of an elaborate character with a Dutch company to share their respective profits and losses and to regulate their respective activities. By one of a series of supplemental agreements regulating the relations between the parties, it was agreed that the original agreement should continue in force until 1940. During the war of 1914–18, the agreements could not be operated, and after that period further agreements were made in order to render workable the original agreement, which was still in force. A dispute arose between the parties as to the adjustments to be made between them in respect of profits earned during the war period, and, after arbitration proceedings had been continuing for some two years, on Sept. 24, 1927, the parties entered into a further agreement. This agreement recited that the Dutch company had expressed to V.D.B., Ltd., a desire to determine the existing agreements, and that V.D.B., Ltd., had agreed thereto in consideration of the payment of £450,000 to them by the Dutch company as "damages." By the operative part of the agreement of 1927, (i) the parties agreed that the earlier agreements should be determined as from Dec. 31, 1927, and each party released the other from all claims thereunder; and, (ii) the Dutch company undertook to pay to V.D.B., Ltd., £100,000 immediately and to hand them promissory notes for £350,000. In fact the total sum of £450,000 was paid in cash before the end of 1927. The Crown claimed to take that sum into account in computing the profits of V.D.B., Ltd., for 1927 and in assessing V.D.B., Ltd., to income tax for 1928–1929.

Held: the £450,000 was a capital receipt and not liable to income tax because the payment was made in respect of the cancellation of agreements which were not mere commercial agreements relating to the disposal of the products of V.D.B., Ltd., or the engagement of employees or agents, but related to the whole structure of the profit-making apparatus of V.D.B., Ltd., and were fundamental to their activities.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HANWORTH, M.R., SLESSER and ROMER, L.JJ.) (151 L.T. 435) on a Case stated by the Commissioners for the A general purposes of the Income Tax Act for the City of London pursuant to s. 149 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the opinion of the High Court of Justice.

The Case stated as follows:

1. At a meeting of the said commissioners held at Gresham College, Basinghall-street, in the said city, on Dec. 14, 1931, Van den Berghs, Ltd., an incorporated company having its registered office at Unilever House, Blackfriars, E.C. 4 (hereinafter called B
"the appellants"), appealed against an assessment to income tax made upon them under the rules applicable to Sched. D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and subsequent amending Acts, for the year ending April 5, 1929, in the sum of £650,000.

2. The question for the determination of the commissioners was whether or no a sum of £450,000 forming part of the said assessment was an income or trade receipt of the appellants for the year ended Dec. 31, 1927, that being the preceding year by reference C to which the company's profits were computed for the year 1928–1929. No question was raised before us as to the exact amount of the assessment, it being agreed that the above-mentioned assessment should be adjusted in any event.

3. The appellants were incorporated on March 9, 1895, as a company with a capital of £950,000 divided into 90,000 £5 preference shares and 100,000 ordinary shares of £5 each. D

The objects of the company as contained in its memorandum of association comprised (inter alia) the following:

> "(B) To carry on business as manufacturers of margarine, oleo margarine, and other substitutes for butter, butter merchants, merchants, dealers, brokers or factors in all kinds of provisions, either wholesale or retail; importers and dealers of E > oil and other oleaginous or fatty matters, seed crushers and merchants, farmers, dairy produce dealers, and dealers in condensed milk, cow-keepers, graziers, cattle breeders, shipowners, charterers or brokers, carriers, forwarding agents, warehousemen, wharfingers, lightermen, and any other business which the said Messrs. Van den Berghs may have been engaged in or connected with ancillary to their principal business of margarine manufacturers and merchants, or which may be in the opinion F > of the company conveniently carried on in conjunction with any of the businesses aforesaid, or calculated directly or indirectly to enhance the value of or render profitable any of the company's property or rights. . . .
> "(D) To enter into partnership or into any arrangement for sharing profits, union of interest, co-operation, joint adventure, reciprocal concession, or otherwise, with any person or company carrying on, or engaged in, or about to carry on, or G > engage in any business or transaction which this company is authorised to carry on, or to engage in any business or transaction capable of being conducted so as directly or indirectly to benefit this company, and to take and otherwise acquire and hold, sell, reissue, or otherwise deal with shares or stocks in or securities or obligations of and to subsidise or otherwise assist any such company and to guarantee the principal and (or) interest of any such securities or obligations and (or) the capital and (or) H > dividends of any such shares or stock."

4. At the date of the assessment now under appeal the capital of the company was £3,575,000 divided into 90,000 cumulative 6 per cent. preference shares of £5 each, 1,000,000 cumulative 6 per cent. B preference shares of £1 each, 1,000,000 cumulative 7 per cent. C preference shares of £1 each, 3,750,000 15 per cent. preferred ordinary shares of 5s. each and 750,000 ordinary shares of 5s. each. The capital was later further I increased. The general voting power of the company was confined to the holders of ordinary shares. Of the said ordinary shares members of the Van den Bergh family held 260,000 and through a subsidiary company held a further 152,000, so that the control of the voting power of the company was vested in the Van den Bergh family. The bulk of the remaining capital, namely, the preferred ordinary and preference share capital, was held by the public.

5. The appellants had for many years been in keen business competition with another firm of margarine manufacturers, Anton Jurgens Vereenigde Fabrieken of Holland

A (hereinafter referred to as the Dutch company), and in the year 1908 these two companies thought it would be to the advantage of their respective trades and of the companies controlled by them to enter into an agreement for profit sharing and other purposes, and accordingly made the agreement next hereinafter mentioned. Within the various groups of companies controlled by the appellants and between the said controlled companies there were other pooling agreements. These agreements, however, B were not of the same type as the agreement next referred to: they related to the regulation of prices.

6. By an agreement dated Feb. 13, 1908 (which with the agreements referred to in paras. 7 and 9 hereof are hereafter referred to as the "pooling agreements"), and made between the Dutch company of the first part, the appellants of the second part, and certain directors and managers of the third and fourth parts, after reciting (inter alia) C that the companies (the appellants and the Dutch company) carry on margarine business (which expression includes the business of manufacturing, buying, selling, exporting, importing and dealing in margarine and other butter substitutes), and in addition thereto carry on certain other businesses (therein referred to as the "outside businesses"), and that the companies are desirous of working in friendly alliance on the terms therein set forth, it was agreed (inter alia) as follows:

> "(1) 'The five-year period' means the period comprised in the years 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906.
> "(2) As between the two companies this agreement is to be treated as having come into operation on the first day of January, 1908, and is to continue in force until it is determined as hereinafter provided, that is to say, until the expiration of E one and a half years after one of the two companies shall have given to the other notice in writing determining this agreement, but so that such notice shall not be capable of being given before the first day of July 1926, or until it is determined under cl. 28.
> "(3) The two companies shall during the continuance of this agreement work in friendly alliance and shall as regards each year commencing with the year 1908 F share the profits and losses made or sustained in their respective margarine businesses in proportion to the yearly average amount of the profits (as ascertained in accordance with the regulations contained in cl. 4), of their respective margarine businesses during the five-year period. [Then follow certain provisions dealing with the case of one company making a loss.]
> "(4) The profits of the margarine business of each of the two companies made G during the five-year period shall be ascertained as follows, that is to say:
> "(1) The profit of 1902 and 1903 shall be taken to be as follows:—
> "Of the Dutch company for 1902, £67,533.
> "Of the Dutch company for 1903, £84,120.
> "Of the English company for 1902, £81,249.
> "Of the English company for 1903, £143,656.

H

> "(2) The amount of the profits of each of the two companies, and of the scheduled companies under their control, of their respective margarine businesses for 1904, 1905 and 1906 respectively, shall be ascertained and certified in writing by two firms of accountants, one to be appointed by each of the two companies upon the execution hereof and the joint certificate in writing of such accountants is to be made and signed within two calendar months from the date hereof or within such enlarged I period as the two companies shall in writing agree on, and such certificate may be absolute or may be conditional that is to say: If any differences shall have arisen between the two accountant firms which shall not have been settled the certificate may be made subject to the determination of such differences, and in such case the differences shall be specified in the certificate and shall be treated as differences between the two companies and shall be referred to an arbitrator to be appointed by the two accountant firms, or if they do not make the appointment forthwith, then to an arbitrator to be appointed by the two companies, and if the certificate is not made within the period or enlarged period aforesaid then the amount of the profits aforesaid shall be considered a matter of difference between the two companies, and such difference shall be referred to arbitration as hereinafter provided. . . .

"(5) At the conclusion of the year 1908, and at the conclusion of each subsequent year during the continuance of this agreement, the profits of the margarine business of each of the two companies and the scheduled companies under their control shall be ascertained and certified by two firms of accountants, one to be appointed by each of the two companies, and para. 2 of cl. 4 hereof shall apply as if the same were here repeated mutatis mutandis. . . .

"(g) The income, dividends, or profits from the investments specified in the Fourth Schedule hereto are to be treated as profits divisible under this agreement apportioned for the period. . . .

"(i) On all increased capital introduced, employed or appropriated after Dec. 31, 1906, in respect of the margarine businesses, or to provide funds for the purchasing of any investments, the profits or income from which is, or shall be, treated as profits divisible under this agreement, whether introduced, employed, or appropriated as share capital, appropriation of profits to reserve funds, or profits unappropriated into or by either or both of the two companies or any or all of the scheduled companies, there shall be allowed as a debit in the respective profit and loss accounts interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum.

"Except that this clause shall not apply to any capital for which either of the two companies or any or all of the scheduled companies are under contract to pay a fixed rate of interest. In such cases the actual rate of interest paid shall be deducted from the profit or added to the loss as the case may be.

"(j) On all diminutions of capital after Dec. 31, 1906, by either one or both of the two companies, or any or all of the scheduled companies, there shall be added to the profits or deducted from the losses, as the case may be, in the respective profit and loss accounts, interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum.

"(6) When and so soon as the profit or loss of both of the two companies of any year shall have been ascertained and certified as aforesaid the two accountant firms or arbitrator shall then ascertain what sum on either side has to be paid for adjusting the rights of the two companies under cl. 3 hereof and shall certify accordingly, and a copy of such certificate shall be sent to each of the two companies, and the company which under such certificate has to pay any sum to the other company shall within thirty days of the date of the two accountancy firms' certificate or of the arbitrator's award make payment thereof accordingly either in Dutch currency or in sterling.

"(11) During the continuance of this agreement neither of the two companies shall enter into or permit or suffer any of the scheduled companies in which it is interested or any other company for the time being under its control to enter into any working or pooling arrangement or any arrangement relating to contract or selling prices or any other arrangement with any other company or companies, firm or firms, person or persons, which may by either of the two companies be deemed inimical to the interest of the two companies under this agreement, and each of the two companies shall be true and loyal to the other of them and shall do all in the power of such company to promote the commercial, technical, pecuniary, buying and selling, and other interests of the parties hereto in relation to the margarine business, and if any difference shall arise under or in relation to the provisions of this clause such difference shall be referred to arbitration, and if it shall be determined by any means that either party has acted in contravention of this agreement, such party shall pay to the other party as and by way of liquidated damages and without references to the actual damage (if any) sustained the sum of two shillings in respect of every kilogram of margarine bought, sold, manufactured, or dealt in in contravention of such provision. . . ."

7. By an agreement in writing, dated July 17, 1913, and made between the Dutch company of the one part, and the appellants of the other part, supplemental to the said agreement of Feb. 13, 1908, after reciting that the Dutch company had discovered a process of hardening oils and that the parties were desirous of formulating a scheme for the merger of assets or unification of financial and commercial interests of the respective parties hereto and their subsidiary companies, and for the regulation and allocation of the turnover, but no such scheme can at the present time be fully elaborated to the satisfaction of both parties hereto and it is desirable to regulate their mutual relations in the meantime and to modify and extend the principal agreement in the manner hereinafter appearing, it was agreed (inter alia) as follows:

> "(1) This agreement is to be for a period of one year from Jan. 1, 1913, until Dec. 31, 1913, except where otherwise provided. . . .
> "(6) The provisions of the principal agreement relating to the ascertainment and sharing of profits and losses shall continue in force until Dec. 31, 1940, subject to the following modifications:
>> "(a) There shall be included in the profits and losses to be shared all profits and losses made or sustained by the respective parties hereto from all sources whatsoever subject to sub-cl. (e) of this clause, including (among other things) all profits or losses made or sustained by them respectively from the acquisition or exploitation of any process or patent for hardening oil or from or in connection with the hardening of oils for any purpose but excluding any profits or losses made or sustained by the English company in connection with any condensed milk or bacon business carried on by them or in which they may be interested and (in the event of the sale before Sept. 30, 1913, contemplated in the proviso to cl. 4 (b) hereof), excluding any profits or losses made or sustained by the English company in connection with the manufacture and sale of soap prior to the date of such contemplated sale.
>> (b) All profits and losses shall be shared by the parties hereto equally instead of in the proportions mentioned in cl. 3 of the principal agreement. . . .
> "(7) A committee shall be formed consisting of two persons to represent the Dutch company and two persons to represent the English company for the purpose of endeavouring to devise and, if thought advisable, by and subject to the consent of both parties hereto agreeing upon a scheme for the merger of the assets or unification of the financial and commercial interests of the parties hereto and their subsidiary companies and for the regulation and allocation of their turnover.
> "(8) Should the parties hereto fail to agree before Dec. 15, 1913, the scheme contemplated in the last preceding clause they will cause to be prepared and executed a contract whereby the provisions hereof then in operation (particularly cl. 6 hereof) and the provisions of the document set forth in the Second Schedule hereto (particularly with regard to diversion of profits from the pool) shall be confirmed and extended for the period from Jan. 1, 1914, to Dec. 31, 1940."

8. Each company carried on its business independently, but in general the parties observed the terms of the said agreements for each of the years 1908 to 1913 and the profits of the two companies were accounted for for those years. Payments were in fact made by and to the appellants under the said agreements in these years. Such payments when made to the Dutch company were deducted as an expense, and when made by the Dutch company were brought in as a receipt in making up the appellants' profit and loss accounts for the years in which the payments were made or received. In computing the appellants' income tax liability for the said years the amount of such payments or receipts were deducted or brought into the taxable profit respectively and the income tax paid accordingly. It was also agreed by the appellants when liability for income tax and excess profits duty was under consideration for years subsequent to 1913 that the results of working the said agreements should be charged to income tax and excess profits duty as trading receipts and payments.

From the commencement of the war in 1914 down to 1919 the two companies did not communicate and were unable to compute their profits owing to the various difficulties caused by the war, so that it was found desirable that a fresh agreement should be entered into in an endeavour to make the above-mentioned agreements (which were then running and would not terminate until 1940) workable. In the result the agreement next hereinafter referred to was entered into.

9. By an agreement in writing dated Oct. 15, 1920, and made between the Dutch company of the one part and the appellants of the other part supplemental to the said agreement of Feb. 13, 1908, and the said agreement of July 17, 1913, reciting that some of the provisions of the principal agreement and the 1913 agreement had proved to be obsolete or impracticable it was agreed (inter alia) as follows:

> "1. The principal agreement should remain in full force and effect except as amended or added to by this agreement until Dec. 31, 1940. . . .
> "3. The provisions of the principal agreement relating to the ascertainment and sharing of profits and losses shall continue in force until Dec. 31, 1940, subject to the following modifications.
>> "(A) There shall be included in the profits and losses to be shared all profits and losses made or sustained by the respective parties hereto from all sources whatsoever (subject to sub-cl. (e) of this clause) including in particular the profits and (or) income less losses, if any, and losses less profits and (or) income, if any, of the two companies and (or) the scheduled companies and the profits and (or) income and (or) loss derived sustained or accruing by or to either or any of them from any further companies or businesses or investments of any kind in which either or both of the two companies or any of the scheduled companies is now or at any time may have been or hereafter may be interested (unless excluded under sub-cl. (e) of this clause) and including the income and (or) profits and (or) losses derived from the investments specified in the fourth schedule to the principal agreement but excluding any profits or losses made sustained or accruing by or to the English company in connection with any condensed milk or bacon business carried on by it or in which it may now be or at any time have been or hereafter may be interested or by any scheduled companies or any businesses or investment so far as it relates to condensed milk or bacon in which the English company may now be or may at any time have been or hereafter may be interested. The accountants shall for the purposes of cl. 5 of the principal agreement as amended by sub-cl. (f) of this clause have regard to the amount of capital and (or) borrowed money employed in relation to any such condensed milk or bacon business or investment as aforesaid. The accountants shall also ascertain what amount shall be credited to the English company on account of increased capital (including therein 'goodwill') introduced owing to the bringing into the pool of the results of the Naamlooze Vennootschap Vereenigde Zeep-Fabrieken of Zwijndrecht.

9. In the event of any dispute of whatsoever nature arising out of or in connection with this agreement the same shall be decided by arbitration in accordance with the B provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

10. In the year 1919 the appellants had endeavoured to estimate what they considered was due to them under the pooling agreements, and they decided with the assistance of their auditors on the sum of £715,000, and took credit in their profit and loss account for the four-and-a-half years ended June 30, 1919, for that amount, a corresponding amount being included in the balance sheet under the heading "sundry C debtors." In 1920 it was considered necessary that a fresh estimate should be made and as a result of the said estimate the amount of £715,000 was debited in the profit and loss account, and in lieu of that figure a sum of £380,665 was credited in the profit and loss account for the year ended Dec. 31, 1920, and a corresponding amount was included in the balance sheet under the heading of debtors. In the profit and loss account for the year ended Dec. 31, 1921, as a result of further estimate a further D amount of £55,060 was credited, and at that date the total (£435,725) was included in debtors in the balance sheet (£380,665 plus £55,060), and finally in 1922 calculating interest on the said £435,725 the appellants raised the figure estimated as due under the agreements to £449,042, at which figure it continued in the balance sheets included under the heading "sundry debtors" until 1927. These amounts were not admitted to be due by or on behalf of the Dutch company and were excluded by the appellants E in computing their profits for income tax purposes for the relevant years. The Dutch company in fact claimed that on balance the appellant company was indebted to it.

11. The said companies being unable to agree as to the construction of the said agreements and their respective rights thereunder, in particular as to the computation of profits 1914 to 1924 for the purpose of sharing under the agreements, it was agreed in the year 1925 that the matter should be referred to arbitration. The arbitration proved F an extremely complicated matter, the differences involved being very considerable. On the one side the Dutch company claimed £1,073,000 from the appellants, and on the other side the appellants claimed £1,408,000 from the Dutch company. Three arbitrators in all were appointed; the points in dispute in the arbitration covered the period from 1914 to 1924. In the year 1927 the arbitration being still far from finished, and the delay and expense already being prodigious and no accounts for the years 1925 G to 1927 having as yet been taken, the parties in contemplation of a merger of interests negotiated with a view to settling the dispute. The Dutch company had refused to admit that any payment was due to the appellants under the pooling agreements, while the appellants on the other hand insisted that at any rate the sum of £449,042 which had been included in their own accounts for profit and loss and balance sheet purposes must be paid to them under these agreements. The appellants also alleged that the H capital of the Dutch company between the years 1919 to 1927 had been increased by £13,847,000 as against an increase of £4,848,000 in the appellants' capital, and they produced a table of such increases. They contended that as the profits on the capital in the business in excess of five per cent. (and in fact these profits largely exceeded five per cent.) belonged equally to the Dutch company and the appellants, the surrender of the thirteen years which the pooling agreements still had to run would be to their I disadvantage. The appellants intimated that £449,042 was the minimum sum for which they would agree to cancel the old agreements, because if they did not receive at least that amount their balance sheets would be incorrect and unjustified. They tried to get more, but could not upon the figures available to them substantiate their claim to more. Finally a sum of £450,000 was paid. This sum was credited as to £449,042 to the Dutch company's account in the appellants' books, and the balance of £958 was credited in the appellants' profit and loss account for the year ending Dec. 31, 1927.

12. The settlement arrived at as above stated was carried out by the three agreements next hereinafter mentioned, all dated Sept. 24, 1927.

"(a) By the first agreement the members of the Jurgens family and the members of the Van den Bergh family agreed to consolidate their respective interests in a Dutch holding company and an English holding company on the terms therein mentioned.

"(b) By the second agreement after reciting that the said arbitration was not yet concluded, but the expense thereof was continuing, and that the parties had been advised by their legal advisers that there was every probability that the said arbitration might be indefinitely prolonged, it was agreed as follows:—

> "(1) Each party withdraws all claims against the other party under the pooling agreements for the years 1914 to 1927 inclusive and both parties mutually discharge each other from any liability arising under these contracts before Dec. 31, 1927.
> "(2) Each party undertakes to do all things necessary to put an end to the said arbitration.

"(c) By the third agreement after reciting pooling agreements whereunder parties had agreed to divide between them the results of their respective businesses as therein provided until Dec. 31, 1940, and that the Dutch company had expressed to the English company a desire to determine the said agreements contrary to the provisions therein contained, and that the English company had consented hereto in consideration of the payment by the Dutch company to the English company of the sum of £450,000 as damages, it was agreed—

> "(1) The said agreements as between the parties hereto are hereby determined as from Dec. 31, 1927, and each party hereto releases the other party from all claims thereunder.
> "(2) The Dutch company shall forthwith pay to the English company the sum of £100,000 in cash and shall forthwith hand over to the English company promissory notes (carrying interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum from Jan. 1, 1928) for a further amount of £350,000, such promissory notes falling due as follows: As to £150,000 on Sept. 1, 1928, and as to £200,000 on Sept. 1, 1929."

In fact, the full amount of £450,000 was paid in cash in the year ended Dec. 31, 1927, and this sum was taken into account in arriving at the estimated assessment to income tax now under appeal.

13. The directors' reports for the years 1919 and 1926 referred to the outstanding questions which had arisen due to the war and which were unsettled, including (inter alia) the dispute with the Dutch company, but the existence of the pooling agreements was at no time disclosed to the shareholders owing to the clause in the pooling agreements requiring secrecy. In the report on the year to Dec. 31, 1927, the directors stated that the last of the outstanding items had been satisfactorily settled. This last report referred to the dispute with the Dutch company set out above. The auditors' reports for the said years referred to the estimates of sums due to the company as having been reasonably made, but stated it had not been possible to verify such estimates. This referred (inter alia) to the dispute with the Dutch company, but the nature of the claims was not specified.

14. For the appellants it was contended:

(1) That the said sum of £450,000 was paid to the appellants as compensation for surrendering their future prospects under the pooling agreements, which had thirteen years to run.

(2) That a sum paid as compensation for loss of anticipated future profits is not an income receipt at all but is capital.

(3) That the £449,042 was merely the measure applied by the appellants to arrive at the amount of compensation to be paid thereon.

(4) That the pooling agreements were not contracts which it was usual for the company to make in the course of its trade as sellers of margarine, but were in the nature of partnership agreements with the Dutch company.

(5) Alternatively that if the sum of £450,000 was to be regarded as payment of amounts due on income account, namely, sums due to the appellants as their share of profits under the pooling agreements for the years 1914–1922, such profits or share of profits formed no part of their profits and gains for the year ended Dec. 31, 1927, and ought not to be included in the computation of their profits for assessment for the year 1928–1929.

(6) That the £450,000 should be excluded from computation of the appellant's profits chargeable to tax for the year under appeal.

15. For the Inspector of Taxes it was contended:

(1) That any amounts received by the appellants under the pooling agreements were receipts of their trade to be brought into account in computing the balance of profits and gains for income tax purposes.

(2) That the sum of £450,000 was a sum paid in settlement of all the appellants' claims and rights under the pooling agreements and was a receipt of the appellants' trade for the year ended Dec. 31, 1927.

(3) That even if the said sum was wholly or partly paid to cancel the pooling agreements for the future it was a receipt of the trade and not capital.

(4) That the pooling agreements do not create a partnership or any relationship in the nature of partnership between the Dutch company and the appellants.

(5) That the said sum of £450,000 was rightly brought into the computation of profits for the year ended Dec. 31, 1927, and consequently the assessment for 1928–29 was correct in principle and should be confirmed in figures to be agreed.

16. The following cases were referred to: Chibbett v. Joseph Robinson & Sons (1), Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Northfleet Coal and Ballast Co., Ltd. (2), Burmah Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (3), Dailuaine-Talisker Distilleries, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (4), Mills v. Jones (5), Constantinesco v. R. (6), Short Brothers, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (7), Newcastle Breweries, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (8), Sterling Trust, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (9), Glenboig Union Fireclay Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (10), Hart v. Hart (11), and Isaac Holden & Sons v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (12).

The commissioners held that the £450,000 was paid in respect of the pooling agreements and must be brought in for the purpose of arriving at the balance of profits and gains of the appellants for the year ending Dec. 31, 1927.

The appellants thereupon expressed dissatisfaction at the decision of the commissioners as being erroneous in point of law and required them to state a case for the opinion of the High Court of Justice.

The Court of Appeal held, reversing the decision of FINLAY, J., that the agreements were not entered into for the purchase of a capital asset or for the discharge of a capital asset, and the proper method to determine the question was to decide whether the money was received into the fixed or circulating capital of the appellant company; the appellant company received it as circulating capital, therefore the claim of the Crown to have it taken into account for the purposes of computing the profits or gains of the appellant company for income tax purposes was right. Van den Berghs, Ltd., appealed.

Sir William Jowitt, K.C., Latter, K.C., and Cyril L. King for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Reginald P. Hills for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8. LORD ATKIN.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend LORD MACMILLAN. I agree with it, and have nothing to add.

LORD TOMLIN.—I also have had an opportunity of reading the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD MACMILLAN, and I concur in it in all respects and have nothing to add.

LORD MACMILLAN.—In the year 1927 the appellants received payment of a sum of £450,000 from Anton Jurgens Vereenigde Fabrieken of Holland (whom I shall call "the Dutch company") pursuant to the terms of an agreement between the appellants and the Dutch company dated Sept. 24, 1927. The question is whether this sum ought to be taken into account in computing the balance of the profits or gains of the appellants' trade for the year 1927 on which they are chargeable to tax for the year 1928–29 under Sched. D of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The appellants say that the £450,000 was a capital receipt and ought not to be reckoned as forming part of the profits arising from the carrying on of their trade. The Crown says that the £450,000 was a trade receipt which ought to be included in the computation of the appellants' profits or gains for income tax purposes.

The circumstances in which the appellants received the payment which has now to be examined are set out in the stated Case, from which I select the salient facts. The appellants were incorporated as a limited company in this country in 1895 and have since carried on the business of manufacturing and dealing in margarine and similar products on a very extensive scale both here and abroad. They had as their keenest competitors the Dutch company, which was engaged in the same business in Holland. On Feb. 13, 1908, the two companies entered into an agreement whereby they bound themselves for the future to "work in friendly alliance" and to share their profits and losses in conformity with an elaborate scheme detailed in the agreement. Each of the two companies had a controlling interest in a number of other companies and they undertook that, if either of them or any of the companies which they controlled should acquire an interest in any other margarine concern, the fact should be communicated to the other party, who should have an option to require such interest to be brought within the operation of the agreement. Both companies further undertook on behalf of themselves and of their controlled companies not to enter into any pooling or price arrangements with third parties which might be deemed inimical to the interests of the two companies under the agreement. The directors and managers of the respective companies were parties to the agreement and bound themselves for twenty years not to engage in any margarine business other than that of the two companies. Provision was also made for the setting up of a representative joint committee which was empowered to make arrangements with outside companies and firms as to the selling and buying prices of margarine and the limitation of areas of supply. It was further comprehensively agreed that > "each of the two companies shall be true and loyal to the other of them and shall do all in the power of such company to promote the commercial, technical, pecuniary, buying and selling, and other interests of the parties hereto in relation to the margarine business."

It is not necessary to set out the detailed provisions of the agreement, but its elaborate character is sufficiently indicated by the fact that it consists of thirty-five articles (with numerous sub-heads) and five schedules, and extends to twenty-two pages of print in the case before your Lordships.

A supplemental agreement was entered into between the parties on July 17, 1913, which recited that the Dutch company had acquired rights in a process for hardening oils and that the parties were desirous of formulating a scheme for the merger of their assets or the unification of their financial and commercial interests and for the regulation and allocation of their turnover, but that such a scheme could not at present be fully elaborated to their satisfaction, and it was desirable in the meantime to regulate their mutual relations and modify and extend the principal agreement in the manner provided in the supplemental agreement. By this second agreement the parties modified the original basis of ascertaining and sharing profits and subject thereto agreed to continue in force the relative provisions of the principal agreement until Dec. 31, 1940. Provision was made for the formation of a committee to endeavour to devise the scheme of merger or unification mentioned in the recital, and, failing agreement upon such a scheme by Dec. 15, 1913, the parties bound themselves to execute a contract confirming and extending to Dec. 31, 1940, the provisions of the supplemental agreement and of a scheduled document setting out agreed alterations in their existing pool contract.

According to the stated Case

> "each company carried on its business independently but in general the parties observed the terms of the said agreements for each of the years 1908 to 1913 and the profits of the two companies were accounted for for those years. Payments were in fact made by and to the appellants under the said agreements in these years. Such payments when made to the Dutch company were deducted as an expense and when made by the Dutch company were brought in as a receipt in making up the appellants' profit and loss accounts for the years in which the payments were made or received. In computing the appellants' income tax liability for the said years the amount of such payments or receipts were deducted or brought into the taxable profit respectively and the income tax paid accordingly. It was also agreed by the appellants when liability for income tax and excess profits duty was under consideration for years subsequent to 1913 that the results of working the said agreements should be charged to income tax and excess profits duty as trading receipts and payments."

During the war the two companies did not operate the agreements, and after peace was restored they found it desirable to enter into a fresh agreement in an endeavour to render workable the two previous agreements which were then running and would not terminate till 1940. This third agreement, which was dated Oct. 15, 1920, recited that some of the provisions of the previous agreements had become obsolete or impracticable. It then proceeded to provide that, subject to the amendments and additions thereby effected, the principal agreement should remain in force till Dec. 31, 1940. Further provision was made for the mutual communication of information relating to manufacturing processes, the basis of the ascertainment and division of profits was modified, the branches of business embraced were extended and various other matters were regulated. As in the case of the two previous agreements, all disputes were referred to arbitration.

Meantime the appellants had been endeavouring to estimate the sum which they believed had accrued due to them by the Dutch company over the war period. After various tentative calculations they brought out in 1922 a sum of £449,042, which they alleged was owing to them. The Dutch company disputed this figure and claimed that on the contrary the appellants were on balance indebted to them. The matter went to arbitration in 1925. The proceedings dragged on inconclusively at "prodigious" expense, until in 1927 the parties came to an arrangement which was embodied in three agreements all dated Sept. 24, 1927.

By the first of these agreements the members of the Jurgens family and the members of the Van den Bergh family agreed to consolidate their respective interests in a Dutch holding company and an English holding company on the terms therein mentioned.

By the second of these agreements each party withdrew all claims against the other party under the agreements of 1908, 1913, and 1920 for the years 1914 to 1927 inclusive, and both parties mutually discharged each other from any liability arising thereunder before Dec. 31, 1927. Each party further undertook to do everything necessary to put an end to the arbitration.

The third of these agreements recited that the Dutch company had expressed to the appellants a desire to determine the agreements of 1908, 1913, and 1920 contrary to the provisions therein contained, and that the appellants had consented thereto in consideration of the payment to them by the Dutch company of £450,000 "as damages." The agreement consists of two articles only. By the first article the parties agreed that the three agreements of 1908, 1913, and 1920 should be thereby determined as from Dec. 31, 1927, and each party released the other party from all claims thereunder. By the second article the Dutch company undertook forthwith to pay to the appellants a sum of £100,000 and to hand to them promissory notes for a further sum of £350,000 payable as therein stated. In point of fact the total sum of £450,000 was paid in cash by the Dutch company to the appellants before the expiry of the year 1927. This is the sum in dispute in the present appeal.

The Special Commissioners held that > "the £450,000 was paid in respect of the pooling agreements and must be brought > in for the purpose of arriving at the balance of profits and gains of the appellants for the year ending Dec. 31, 1927." A

That is their sole finding; it is not informative, for everyone agrees that the sum in question was paid "in respect of the pooling agreements," but there can be no doubt, if regard be had to the contentions submitted to them, that the commissioners' view was that the sum in question was an income receipt. B

FINLAY, J., reversed the determination of the Special Commissioners, and held that the agreements which were cancelled were "a capital asset" of the appellants, and that the £450,000 was "not an income receipt at all." The Court of Appeal unanimously reversed this judgment and restored the determination of the Special Commissioners, holding that the sum was not received by the appellants in consideration of the surrender of a fixed capital asset, but arose from a transaction attributable to circulating capital, and was consequently an income receipt. C

The problem of discriminating between an income receipt and a capital receipt and between an income disbursement and a capital disbursement is one which in recent years has frequently engaged your Lordships' attention. In general the distinction is well recognised and easily applied, but from time to time cases arise where the item lies on the borderline and the task of assigning it to income or to capital becomes one of much refinement, as the decisions show. D The Income Tax Acts nowhere define "income" any more than they define "capital"; they describe sources of income and prescribe methods of computing income, but what constitutes income they discreetly refrain from saying. Nor do they define "profits or gains"; while as for "trade," the "interpretation" section of the 1918 Act only informs us, with a fine disregard of logic, that it "includes every trade, manufacture, adventure or concern in the nature of trade." E Consequently it is to the decided cases that one must go in search of light. While each case is found to turn on its own facts, and no infallible criterion emerges, nevertheless the decisions are useful as illustrations and as affording indications of the kind of considerations which may relevantly be borne in mind in approaching the problem.

The reported cases fall into two categories, those in which the subject is found claiming that an item of receipt ought not to be included in computing his profits and those F in which the subject is found claiming that an item of disbursement ought to be included among the admissible deductions in computing his profits. In the former case the Crown is found maintaining that the item is an item of income; in the latter, that it is a capital item. Consequently the argumentative position alternates according as it is an item of receipt or an item of disbursement that is in question, and the taxpayer and the Crown are found alternately arguing for the restriction or the expansion of the conception of income. G

I propose to refer first to British Insulated and Helsby Cables, Ltd. v. Atherton (13). This case has been generally recognised as the leading modern authority on the subject, though I fear that ROMER, L.J., was unduly optimistic when he said that it "placed beyond the realms of controversy" the law applicable to the matter (Anglo-Persian Oil Co. v. Dale (Inspector of Taxes) (14) ([1932] 1 K. B. at p. 145)). The facts were that the H appellant company claimed to deduct in the computation of its trade profits a sum which it had provided to form the nucleus of a pension fund for its employees. The Crown argued that the sum ought to be debited to capital on the ground that it "was not in its nature recurrent but was made once for all" and that it was a case of the "provision of a capital sum which will for ever after relieve the company from making any further payment whatsoever." This argument prevailed. LORD CAVE, L.C., ([1926] A.C. at p. 213) found in the decisions "considerable authority" for the view which he I recommended to the House to adopt, namely, that > "when an expenditure is made, not only once and for all, but with a view to bringing into existence an asset or an advantage for the enduring benefit of a trade . . . there is very good reason (in the absence of special circumstances leading to an opposite conclusion) for treating such an expenditure as properly attributable not to revenue but to capital"

LORD ATKINSON ([1926] A.C. at p. 222) indicated that the word "asset" ought not to be confined to "something material," and, in further elucidation of the principle, ROMER, L.J., has added that the advantage paid for need not be "of a positive character" and "may consist in the getting rid of an item of fixed capital that is of an onerous character" (Anglo-Persian Oil Co. v. Dale (Inspector of Taxes) (14) ([1932] 1 K.B. at p. 146)).

If the numerous decisions are examined and classified, they will be found to exhibit a satisfactory measure of consistency with LORD CAVE'S principle of discrimination. Certain of them relate to excess profits duty and not to income tax, but for the present purpose this distinction is immaterial. A sum provided to establish a pension fund for employees, as has already been seen, is a capital disbursement (British Insulated and Helsby Cables, Ltd. v. Atherton (13)), so is a sum paid by a coal merchant for the acquisition of the right to a number of current contracts to supply of coal (John Smith & Son v. Moore (15)); so is a payment by a colliery company as the price of being allowed to surrender unprofitable seams included in its leasehold (Mallet v. Staveley Coal and Iron Co., Ltd. (16)). Similarly a sum received by a fireclay company as compensation for leaving unworked the fireclay under a railway was held to be a capital receipt (Glenboig Union Fireclay Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (10)).

On the other hand a sum awarded by the War Compensation Court to a company carrying on the business of brewers and wine and spirit merchants in respect of the compulsory taking over of its stock of rum by the Admiralty was held to be a trade or income receipt (Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Newcastle Breweries, Ltd. (8)); so was a sum paid to a shipbuilding company for the cancellation of a contract to build a ship (Short Brothers, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (7)); so was a lump sum payment received by a quarry company in lieu of four annual payments in consideration of which the company had relieved a customer of his contract to purchase a quantity of chalk yearly for ten years and build a wharf at which it could be loaded (Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Northfleet Coal and Ballast Co., Ltd. (2)); so was a sum recovered from insurers by a timber company in respect of the destruction by fire of their stock of timber (Gliksten & Son, Ltd. v. Green (17)). Conversely, where a company paid a sum as the price of getting rid of a life director, whose presence on the board was regarded as detrimental to the profitable conduct of the company's business, the payment was held to be an income disbursement (Mitchell v. B. W. Noble, Ltd. (18)); so was the payment made in the case of the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. v. Dale (Inspector of Taxes) (14) in order to disembarrass the company of an onerous agency agreement. There are further instances in the reports, but I have quoted enough for the purposes of illustration.

With the guidance thus afforded I now address myself to the question whether the £450,000 received by the appellants in the circumstances already narrated can properly be described as an item of profit arising or accruing to them from the carrying on of their trade, which ought to be credited as an income receipt. It is important to bear in mind at the outset that the trade of the appellants is to manufacture and deal in margarine, for the nature of a receipt may vary according to the nature of the trade in connection with which it arises. The price of the sale of a factory is ordinarily a capital receipt, but it may be an income receipt in the case of a person whose business it is to buy and sell factories.

The learned Attorney-General stated that he was content to take the agreements of 1927 as meaning what they say. The sum of £450,000 is accordingly to be taken as having been paid by the Dutch company to the appellants in consideration of the appellants consenting to the agreements of 1908, 1913 and 1920 being terminated as at Dec. 31, 1927, instead of running their course to Dec. 31, 1940. If the payment had been in respect of a balance of profits due to the appellants by the Dutch company for years 1914 to 1927, different considerations might have applied, but it is agreed that it is not to be so regarded.

Now what were the appellants giving up? They gave up their whole rights under the agreements for thirteen years ahead. These agreements are called in the stated Case "pooling agreements," but that is a very inadequate description of them, for they did much more than merely embody a system of pooling and sharing profits. If the appellants were merely receiving in one sum down the aggregate of profits which they would

A otherwise have received over a series of years the lump sum might be regarded as of the same nature as the ingredients of which it was composed. But even if a payment is measured by annual receipts, it is not necessarily itself an item of income. As LORD BUCKMASTER pointed out in Glenboig Union Fireclay Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (10) (1922 S.C. at p. 115):

> B "There is no relation between the measure that is used for the purpose of calculating a particular result and the quality of the figure that is arrived at by means of the test."

The three agreements which the appellants consented to cancel were not ordinary commercial contracts made in the course of carrying on their trade; they were not contracts for the disposal of their products or for the engagement of agents or other employees necessary for the conduct of their business; nor were they merely agreements as C to how their trading profits, when earned, should be distributed as between the contracting parties. On the contrary, the cancelled agreements related to the whole structure of the appellants' profit-making apparatus. They regulated the appellants' activities, defined what they might and what they might not do, and affected the whole conduct of their business. I have difficulty in seeing how money laid out to secure, or money received for the cancellation of, so fundamental an organisation of a trader's D activities can be regarded as an income disbursement or an income receipt. Counsel for the respondent very properly warned your Lordships against being misled as to the legal character of the payment by its magnitude, for magnitude is a relative term and we are dealing with companies which think in millions. But the magnitude of a transaction is not an entirely irrelevant consideration. The legal distinction between a repair and a renewal may be influenced by the expense involved. In the present case, however, E it is not the largeness of the sum that is important but the nature of the asset that was surrendered. In my opinion that asset, the congeries of rights which the appellants enjoyed under the agreements and which, for a price they surrendered, was a capital asset.

I have not overlooked the criterion afforded by the economists' differentiation between fixed and circulating capital which LORD HALDANE invoked in John Smith & Son v. F Moore (15), and on which the Court of Appeal relied in the present case, but I confess that I have not found it very helpful. Circulating capital is capital which is turned over and in the process of being turned over yields profit or loss. Fixed capital is not involved directly in that process, and remains unaffected by it. If this is to be the test, I fail to see how the appellants could be said to have been engaged in turning over the asset which the agreements in question constituted. The agreements formed the fixed frame- G work within which their circulating capital operated; they were not incidental to the working of their profit-making machine but were essential parts of the mechanism itself. They provided the means of making profits, but they themselves did not yield profits. The profits of the appellants arose from manufacturing and dealing in margarine.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed with costs and the judgment of FINLAY, J., restored.

H

LORD WRIGHT.—I am in full agreement with the opinion which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend LORD MACMILLAN, and I have nothing to add.

LORD ATKIN.—I am asked by my noble and learned friend, LORD RUSSELL, to say that he has read the opinion which has just been delivered, and that he agrees with it.

Re MACIVER'S SETTLEMENT. MACIVER v. RAE

[Chancery Division (Farwell, J.), October 17, 1935]

Settlement—Income—Preference shares held by trustees—Dividends in arrear—Ordinary shares transferred to preference shareholders on waiver of right to arrears.

Trustees under a settlement held preference shares in a company. The dividends of the preference shares had for several years fallen into arrears, and, under a scheme approved by the ordinary shareholders and sanctioned by the court, the ordinary shareholders surrendered part of their holdings of ordinary shares and transferred the same to the preference shareholders, who on their part agreed to waive their rights to the arrears of dividends on the preference shares held by them.

Held: that the ordinary shares thus received by the trustees should be treated as income of the tenant for life.

Notes. Considered: Re Smith's Will Trusts, Smith v. Melville, [1936] 2 All E.R. 1210.

As to income of a tenant for life, see 29 Halsbury's Laws (2nd Edn.) 644 et seq., and for cases, see 40 Digest 654 et seq.

Originating Summons.

The summons was taken out by the trustees of the settlement at the request of Mrs. Rae, who was the tenant for life under the settlement made by her late father, and it asked whether a block of 5,365 ordinary shares received by the trustees under the scheme in lieu of the dividends of their holding of preference shares should be treated as capital or income of the settled shares of Mrs. Rae under the settlement (or whether they ought to be apportioned in any or what way between income and capital).

Harold Brown for the plaintiffs.

J. B. Lindon for the tenant for life.

FARWELL, J.—The plaintiffs are the trustees of a settlement dated Aug. 12, 1916, made by Mr. E. E. MacIver under which certain shares were settled on trust to pay the income to the settlor's daughter, the defendant Mrs. Rae, during her life, and in the event of her dying in her husband's lifetime to her husband for life, and subject thereto for the benefit of the children of the marriage, and in the event of her surviving her husband for Mrs. Rae absolutely. Mr. and Mrs. Rae are still living, and there are three children of the marriage who are infants. The shares which were the original subject-matter of the settlement have been sold, and part of the proceeds invested in 3,000 cumulative preference shares of Richard Thomas & Co., Ltd. That company has an authorised capital of £9,000,000, of which £4,000,000 consisted of 6½ per cent. cumulative preference shares of £1 each and the balance ordinary shares.

By the articles of association of the company the preference shares are to be paid off in full in priority to the ordinary shares in the event of a winding-up, but have no right to any further share in the assets. For the seven years ending March 31, 1934, no dividends on the preference capital were paid, with the result that by that time the preference dividends were over £1,800,000 in arrears. It was decided by the Court of Appeal in Re Wakley (1) that preference shareholders have no absolute, but only a conditional, right to arrears of dividend, but that, if and when a company acquires assets sufficient to pay off the arrears and declare a dividend, that dividend belongs to the persons who are then the registered holders of the preference shares.

In the present case Richard Thomas & Co., Ltd., arranged to discharge all liability for unpaid dividends by a scheme which was approved by the shareholders and subsequently sanctioned by the court. Under that scheme the preference shareholders waived their conditional right to arrears of dividend; the ordinary shareholders surrendered the equivalent of 1,800,000 shares which had been subdivided so as to reduce the value of the ordinary shares from £1 to 6s. 8d. each; and the shares so surrendered were distributed among the preference shareholders in consideration of their consenting to the wiping out of all arrears of their dividends.

The scheme was approved by the court early in 1935. The result was that the preference shareholders agreed to sell their claim to arrears of dividends and in consideration thereof to receive ordinary shares provided by the ordinary shareholders, who gave up two-thirds of their holdings. In pursuance of that scheme the trustees received a large holding of ordinary shares of the company.

It is quite plain that, if the company had been in a position to pay dividends sufficient to wipe out the arrears, the whole of the sum so paid would have belonged to the tenant for life. The question is whether it makes any difference that the trustees, instead of receiving cash, received ordinary shares. There is nothing in the scheme by which the company capitalised any moneys. It is said that this Case is covered by a decision of Eve, J., in Re Tedlie (2), but that is quite a different case. On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the ordinary shares so allotted to the preference shareholders must be treated as income and not as capital, and, therefore, belong to the persons who would have been entitled to the arrears of preference dividend if they had been paid in cash. The costs of all parties will be paid out of the fund.

STUART v. HAUGHLEY PAROCHIAL CHURCH COUNCIL

[Chancery Division (Bennett, J.), February 28, March 1, 5, 1935]

[Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Romer and Maugham, L.JJ.), July 16, 17, 1935].

Ecclesiastical Law—Representation of laity—Lay electoral commission—Appeal against removal of name from church electoral roll—Grounds stated in writing by church council considered, but neither vicar nor council heard by commission—Representation of the Laity Measure, 1929 (19 & 20 Geo. 5, No. 2), Sched., r. 18 (1) (b).

The court will not interfere with the decision of a lay electoral commission which has not acted in a way contrary to natural justice.

Rule 2 (1) of the Rules for the Representation of the Laity contained in the schedule to the Representation of the Laity Measure, 1929, provides for the representation of the laity in parochial church councils, ruridecanal conferences, diocesan conferences, and the House of Laity. By r. 3 (1) there shall be a church electoral roll in every parish, and by r. 18 (1): "There shall be a right of appeal by any person aggrieved against . . . (b) the removal of any name, or the refusal to remove any name, from the roll of a parish." By r. 18 (3) a lay electoral commission shall be constituted in every diocese, and any appeal shall be considered and decided by such two or more members of the commission as the commission shall appoint, and their decision shall be final.

The plaintiff's name was removed by the parochial church council of H. from the electoral roll, and he appealed to the electoral commission against the removal. The commission requested, and obtained, from the parochial church council a statement of the grounds on which the council had removed the plaintiff's name from the electoral roll, but they did not hear the vicar, or the secretary, or any member of the council. Having considered the statement of the council, the commission decided that the plaintiff's name had been wrongly removed from the electoral roll and they directed his name to be restored to it. The parochial church council failed to comply with these directions, and the plaintiff brought an action for a declaration that he was entitled to have his name reinstated in the roll and an injunction restraining the council from preventing him attending and voting at church parochial meetings.

Held: the commission in coming to their decision had acted honestly and in good faith, and there was nothing contrary to natural justice in the way in which they had dealt with the appeal, and, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to vary or set aside their decision, and the name of the plaintiff must be restored to the roll.

Maclean v. The Workers' Union (1), [1929] 1 Ch. 602, applied.

Notes. The Representation of the Laity Measure, 1929, is repealed by the Representation of the Laity Measure, 1956, the Schedule, rr. 2 and 27 of which replace rr. 2 and 18 of the 1929 Measure.

As to the electoral roll, see 13 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn.) 163. For Representation of the Laity Measure, 1929, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 86, and for the Representation of the Laity Measure, 1956, see 36 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn.) 282.

Case referred to:

(1) Maclean v. The Workers' Union, [1929] 1 Ch. 602; 14 L.T. 83; 45 T.L.R. 256; 43 Digest 101, 1046.

Action for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to have his name re-instated in the church electoral roll of the parish of Haughley, and for an injunction.

The following statement of the facts is taken from his Lordship's judgment:

The parties to this action are as plaintiff Mr. Edmund Cuthbert Stuart and as defendants the parochial church council of the parish of Haughley, the Reverend Walter Grange White, who is the vicar of that parish, and Mr. Frederick Harper and Mr. John W. Nunn, the first of whom has been, and the second is, the secretary of the parochial church council of the parish of Haughley. The action is brought by the plaintiff for the purpose of establishing his right to be on the church electoral roll of the parish of Haughley and to have attended the parochial church meeting of that parish which was held on Feb. 1, 1934. The rights which the plaintiff is asserting are not without importance to those persons who desire to exercise the rights which Parliament has conferred upon them of taking their part as laymen in the affairs of the Church of England.

The plaintiff's rights depend upon the provisions of the Representation of the Laity Measure, 1929, a measure passed by the National Assembly of the Church of England, in the schedule to which are stated the rights conferred upon laymen in regard to their representation in matters of ecclesiastical government. Rule 2 (1) of the schedule provides:

> "The laity shall meet in parochial church meetings and be represented in—(i) parochial church councils; (ii) ruridecanal conferences where such conferences exist; (iii) diocesan conferences; and (iv) the House of Laity, by representatives of either sex (in these rules referred to as 'lay representatives') who are actual lay communicant members of the Church of England of twenty-one years of age and upwards."

Rule 3 provides by sub-r. (1) that:

> "There shall be a church electoral roll (in these rules referred to as 'the roll') in every parish."

By sub-r. (2):

> "The persons entitled to have their names entered upon the roll of a parish shall be lay members of the Church of England of either sex, of eighteen years of age and upwards, who—(a) are baptised and declare that they are members of the Church of England and that they do not belong to any religious body which is not in communion with the Church of England; and (b) are resident in the parish or (whether or not so resident) have habitually attended public worship in the parish during a period of six months prior to enrolment; and (c) have signed the form of application for enrolment set out in appendix I to these rules."

By sub-r. (3):

> "No person shall be entitled to be upon the roll of more than one parish in the same diocese."

Sub-r. (4):

> "The roll shall, until a parochial church council (in these rules referred to as 'the council') has been constituted in a parish, be formed and revised by the minister and churchwardens (if any), and shall, after a council has been constituted, be kept and revised by the council."

Sub-r. (5):

> "The names of persons who are entitled to have their names entered upon the roll of a parish shall, subject to the provisions of these rules, be from time to time added to the roll by or under the direction of the council."

Sub-r. (6):

> "The names of persons who have ceased to be entitled to be upon the roll of a parish, or who have signified in writing their desire that their names shall be removed from the roll, may, subject to the provisions of these rules, be at any time removed from the roll by or under the direction of the council."

Sub-r. (7):

> "The roll of a parish shall be revised annually by or under the direction of the council, such revision being effected pursuant to a public notice in the form set out in appendix II to these rules (or in a substantially similar form), given not less than fourteen days before the commencement of the revision. The revision shall be completed not less than fifteen days or more than twenty-eight days before the annual parochial church meeting."

Sub-r. (8):

> "Upon every revision all enrolments or removals from the roll which have been effected since the date of the last revision (or since the formation of the roll if there has been no previous revision) shall be verified, and such further enrolments or removals from the roll as may be required shall be effected."

Sub-r. (9):

> "After the completion of the revision the roll as revised (or the roll as originally formed in any case where there has not been any revision thereof) shall, together with a list of the names of the persons removed from the roll since the last revision, be published by being exhibited continuously for not less than fourteen days before the annual parochial church meeting on or near to the principal door of the church in such manner as the council shall appoint, and no name shall be entered upon or removed from the roll during the period in any year between the completion of the revision and the annual parochial church meeting."

Sub-r. (10):

> "Any person desiring to continue upon the roll of a parish after he has ceased to be resident in that parish, and being qualified by habitual attendance at public worship, shall make a fresh application for enrolment in the form set out in appendix I to these rules."

Those are the provisions with respect to the church electoral roll. Rule 5 provides for the annual parochial church meeting. By sub-r. (1) of that rule it is provided:

> "In every parish there shall be held annually not later in the year than in Easter week or in the following week the annual parochial church meeting of all persons whose names are entered upon the roll of the parish (in these rules referred to as 'the annual meeting')."

Then there are provisions for the convention of the parochial church meeting and the chairman of it, and r. 8 specifies the business to be transacted at the annual parochial church meeting. That rule provides:

> "(1) The annual church meeting shall receive from the council, and shall be free to discuss—(a) a copy or copies of the roll; . . . (2) The annual meeting shall elect parochial lay representatives—(a) to the diocesan conference, unless the diocesan conference shall otherwise determine; (b) to the ruridecanal conference, when it exists; and (c) to the council of the parish, subject to and in accordance with the rules hereinafter contained relating to such elections respectively. . . ."

It is apparent from these provisions that the right to take part in the affairs of the Church of England has as its basis the fact that a person has his name on the church electoral roll. The importance of that fact is, I think, recognised by r. 18, which provides by sub-r. (1):

> "There shall be a right of appeal by any person aggrieved against—(a) any enrolment, or refusal of enrolment, on the roll of a parish; (b) the removal of any name, or the refusal to remove any name, from the roll of a parish; (c) the allowance or disallowance of any vote given or tendered under the foregoing rules; and (d) the result of any election held or purporting to be held under the foregoing rules."

Sub-r. (2):

> "Notice of any such appeal shall be given in writing to the rural dean, or if there be no rural dean, to the archdeacon. Such notice shall be given—(a) in the case of an appeal against an enrolment or a refusal of enrolment, or in the case of an appeal against the removal of any name or the refusal to remove any name from the roll, not later than seven days after the date of the annual meeting next following such enrolment or refusal of enrolment, or removal or refusal to remove; (b) in the case of an appeal against the allowance or disallowance of a vote, within seven days after the date of such allowance or disallowance; and (c) in the case of an appeal against the result of an election, within seven days after the result thereof has been announced."

Sub-r. (3):

> "A lay electoral commission shall be constituted in each diocese by the diocesan conference, and any appeal shall be considered and decided by such two or more members of the commission as the commission shall appoint, and their decision shall be final."

Sub-r. (4):

> "For the purpose of such consideration and decision, the members of the commission so appointed shall consider all the relevant circumstances, and shall be entitled to inspect all documents and papers relating to the subject-matter of the appeal, and to be furnished with all information respecting the same which they may require."

Before the year 1932 the plaintiff's name was on the electoral roll of the parish of Haughley, and in the revision, which took place, of that roll by the defendant council in January, 1932, his name was removed from it. On Jan. 28 he and other persons whose names had been removed from the electoral roll of the parish gave notice of appeal to the rural dean of Stow, in accordance with the provisions of r. 18 in the schedule to the Representation of the Laity Measure, 1929. The lay electoral commission thereupon had to decide, as between the plaintiff and the other persons concerned and the parochial church council of the parish, whether the parochial church council had rightly removed their names from the parochial church roll. The lay commission who were entrusted to determine the matter were Mr. Singleton Cooper, who, as well as being secretary, was a member of the commission, and two others, and on Feb. 9, 1932, Mr. Singleton Cooper, as secretary of the lay electoral commission, wrote to the secretary of the parochial church council a letter in these terms: "Dear Sir,—I have received a protest from the under-mentioned parishioners of Haughley in regard to the removal of their names from the electoral roll. I have also ascertained that their names are on no other electoral roll. As in consequence of their appeal we have to hold a commission, I shall be glad to have the reasons of the church council for removing the said names. You are doubtless aware that it is very difficult when names are once on the roll to remove them so long as those to whom the names belong still remain in the parish. I should like your observations as soon as possible." There follows a list of ten names including the name of the plaintiff. To that letter the defendant Harper, who was then the secretary of the parochial church council, replied on Feb. 10, 1932: "Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge your letter re electoral roll dated Feb. 9, which I received from the Reverend White to-day. I wish to state that your letter shall be brought before the church council at their next meeting. Unfortunately for its consideration the church council held its first meeting of the year last night, Feb. 9, otherwise if it had arrived a day sooner it could have been dealt with then. As secretary of the church council last year I should like to state that the electoral roll was revised before a full council and was passed at the annual meeting without one objection. Yours truly (signed) F. Harper, Sec. C.C."

On Feb. 12, Mr. Singleton Cooper replied again to Mr. Harper: "Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 10th inst., I cannot see why there is any reason for you to wait for a meeting of your church council. I want to know the reasons for taking off the names of these electors previously mentioned to you from your electoral roll. You do not need to have another meeting of the church council in order to be able to tell me this. The secretary of the council is the officer responsible for keeping the church roll and also for attending to official correspondence. It is not fair to the people in question to keep them waiting for a considerable time, and therefore I must ask you to be good enough to let me have at your early convenience the reasons for the action of your council. At the same time you might let me know whether any notice was sent to the people in question calling their attention to the fact that their names had been removed from the roll. Yours very truly (signed) H. E. Singleton Cooper."

To that letter the following answer was written: "Dear Sir,—In answer to your letter of Feb. 12, I cannot comply with your request until the church parochial council have met. Yours truly (signed) F. Harper, Hon. Sec., Church Council." The next thing that happened was that the lay electoral commission met on Feb. 25, 1932, for the purpose of considering the appeal of the ten persons who had given notice of appeal to the rural dean of Stow, and the minute book of the lay electoral commission records that on that date the commission decided that Mr. Singleton Cooper should write to the secretary of the parochial church council to the effect set out in the following letter, which Mr. Singleton Cooper wrote on the same day, namely: "Dear Sir,—With reference to the appeal of some parishioners in Haughley, the commission met at Ipswich this morning and I am instructed to point out to you that the commission is entitled to be furnished with all the information which it may require—Rules for Representation of the Laity, r. 18 (4) (Diocesan Directory, 1932, p. 198). This being so, I must request you to summon an emergency meeting of your church council which can be convened by your chairman at not less than three days' notice—Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure, rules for procedure, r. 7 (Diocesan Directory, 1932, p. 213). The commission further instructs me to say that, unless it hears from you definitely within the course of the next ten days, it will have to insist on the names of the parishioners who have appealed being reinstated on the parochial roll. Yours very truly (signed) H. E. Singleton Cooper, Secretary to the Commission."

To that on March 3, a Mr. Lambert, who, I suppose, was a deputy for Mr. Harper, writes: "Dear Sir,—In reply to yours of Feb. 25, the council will send their statement in a few days. Yours truly (signed) C. Lambert. For P.C.C. Haughley." Mr. Singleton

Cooper answers that on March 4, by saying: "Dear Sir,—I have duly received your letter of March 3, saying that the council will send their statement in a few days in regard to the removal of names of parishioners in Haughley from the electoral roll. You will please note that I shall expect this before very long as you will remember that the commission gave you ten days in which to reply. Yours very truly (signed) H. E. Singleton Cooper, Secretary to the Commission."

There follows that communication a letter from the defendant Harper as secretary of the parochial church council in which he says: "Dear Sir,—As secretary of the parochial church council, I am directed to inform you of the following proposition, that was passed by the council last evening, March 7. That the names of the ten persons removed from the electoral roll at the last revision neither attend worship nor support the parish church, and that any further correspondence will not be entered into by the 'Parochial Church Council.' Yours truly (signed) F. Harper, Secretary, P.C.C."

Thereupon, having, as I think they were entitled to suppose, the grounds upon which the parochial church council had removed the names of the appellants from the electoral roll, the lay electoral commission held a meeting on March 23, 1932. Mr. Singleton Cooper and the two other commissioners were present. Mr. Singleton Cooper read the letters including the letter which had been received from the vicar. Having considered the letters very carefully, the commission decided that it could see no reason for removing the appellants' names from the roll.

Mr. Singleton Cooper was instructed to convey this information to the parochial church council, that the council must obtain the consent of the persons concerned to the removal of their names or produce conclusive evidence showing that either the names were on the roll of another parish or that they were members of a religious body not in communion with the Church of England. Failing this the council was to reinstate the names at once, and on the same day, March 24, Mr. Singleton Cooper wrote to the secretary of the parochial church council, the defendant Harper: "Dear Sir,—Haughley Electoral Roll. We have considered your letters, but we can see no justification for removing the names of the appellants from the electoral roll without having first obtained their consent. If you feel it desirable that these names should be removed from the roll the best course of action is to see the people concerned and get their consent to the removal of their names or else you must produce conclusive evidence that they are members of a religious body not in communion with the Church of England. If you are not prepared to do this please reinstate all the names at once and let me have a certificate to the effect that this has been done. Yours faithfully (signed) H. Singleton Cooper, Secretary to the Commission."

[His Lordship then read letters indicating that, notwithstanding the intervention of the bishop of the diocese, the council declined to give any further reasons in writing for having removed the plaintiff's name from the roll and persisted in their refusal to reinstate the name on the roll, and that the bishop ultimately appointed the rural dean of Stow to put into effect the decisions of the commission, and continued:] Accordingly in pursuance of that authority the rural dean of Stow, on Sept. 20, 1932, posted up on the door of the church of the parish of Haughley a supplementary roll containing the names of those who had appealed from the act of the church council, including the name of the plaintiff. The rural dean having put that up, someone unknown, either on that day or the next, took it down. The name of the plaintiff was not restored to the electoral roll at the revision which took place in January, 1933. The plaintiff attended the parochial meeting in January, 1933, and he was told that he had no right to be there. He waited until the year 1934, when the next parochial church meeting of the parish of Haughley was held. His name was not then on the parochial church roll. He went to the meeting for the purpose of exercising the right of taking part in the meeting, and he was met by a steward or two stewards and a police constable and was informed that he was not on the roll, and no doubt for the presence of the police constable the vicar was responsible.

Henn-Collins, K.C., and W. T. Elverston for the plaintiff.
Stable, K.C., and Michael Hoare for the defendants.

BENNETT, J. [after stating the facts, continued:] Counsel for the defendants contended that the lay electoral commission acted contrary to natural justice. The foundation of that contention was that the lay electoral commission had not heard the vicar, or the secretary, or some members of the parochial church council, and that it was contrary to natural justice to come to a decision without hearing argument. The lay electoral commission is a statutory body, a body of laymen, and the powers of a court of law to interfere with the decisions of a body of that kind are distinctly limited, and, as MAUGHAM, J., decided in Maclean v. Workers' Union (1), the court has no jurisdiction to vary or set aside the decision of such a tribunal if in giving the decision the tribunal has acted honestly.

I propose to follow that decision. There is no question, but that the commission acted in good faith. It gave to the defendants, the parochial church council, an opportunity of stating the grounds upon which it removed the plaintiff's name from the electoral roll. The parochial church council stated in writing the grounds upon which it had removed the plaintiff's name from the church roll. I can see nothing contrary to natural justice in the way in which the lay electoral commission decided the appeal against the parochial church council.

Accordingly, the action, in my judgment, succeeds and the plaintiff is entitled to a declaration that he is entitled to have his name reinstated on the electoral roll of the parish of Haughley.

The defendants appealed.

Michael Hoare for the defendants.
Henn-Collins, K.C., and W. T. Elverston for the plaintiff.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R. [having reviewed the facts, continued:] It was suggested that the lay electoral commission had not heard and determined the matter, and it is said that some outside body, such as a parochial church council, ought to decide whether or not the commission have properly received and considered the materials which the parochial church council thinks they ought to have considered. Why is that so, when a domestic tribunal of this sort is set up and power is given to them to hear and to decide ? It is for the tribunal to determine what are the relevant circumstances; they are given power to inspect the documents and papers relating to the subject-matter of the appeal, and to be furnished with information. This domestic tribunal must deal with the matter, and are rightly entrusted with the powers of exercising their jurisdiction, and they are not subject to scrutiny or to being overruled by some other body who may wish that they had acted in some way differently. Their decision is to be final, and in the present case there is no ground whatever for charging them with having come to a decision otherwise than bona fide, or on any of the grounds which might justify, if properly pursued, steps being taken to set aside their conclusion. It is sufficient to say that upon the facts before us it is clear that they were entrusted with the decision, that the appeal was rightly brought before them, that it was for them to determine how they would receive and deal with the matter, that they invited information to be given to them which was not forthcoming, and that upon the materials which they had before them, which, of course, would include the electoral roll and the fact that the plaintiff was upon the electoral roll, they came to their determination. A bona fide determination has been come to and is final for all purposes. In these circumstances there is no ground for saying that the action and decision of the lay electoral commission can be questioned. The learned judge has given effect to it; he was right in so doing; and this appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

MAUGHAM, L.J.—I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

A syndicate was formed to produce a play written by M. Guitry, a Frenchman, on the terms that royalties should be paid to M. Guitry with a payment of £300 in advance on account of royalties. The syndicate instructed their solicitors, the appellants, to pay M. Guitry the £300 out of moneys which had been placed in their hands to the account of the syndicate, and a cheque for that amount was accordingly sent by them to M. Guitry's agent in Paris. The play was produced at a loss. It was admitted that M. Guitry's usual place of abode was not within the United Kingdom, and that the sum of £300 was a payment to him on account of royalties in respect of a copyright of which M. Guitry was the owner. The appellants were assessed to income tax in respect of the £300, so paid on the ground that they were the persons by or through whom the payment was made on account of copyright royalties, and were chargeable, therefore, under r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, as amended by s. 26 of the Finance Act, 1927, and applied to copyright royalties by s. 25 of that Act.

Held: the appellants were the persons by or through whom the payment for or on account of royalties was made within the meaning of r. 21 (1) of the All Schedules Rules as applied by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 25, and, therefore, they were under an obligation to deduct the proper amount of income tax from the sum payable by them and account for that amount to the Crown.

Notes. The Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 21, was repealed by the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 527, and is replaced by s. 170 of the latter Act.

As to income tax in respect of copyright royalties where owner abroad, see 21 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 377, para. 686; and for cases on the subject, see DIGEST SUPP.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HANWORTH, M.R., SLESSER and ROMER, L.JJ.) on a Case Stated under the Finance Act, 1927, s. 25; the Income Tax Act, 1918; r. 21 of the General Rules applicable to all Schedules as amended by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 26; and the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149, by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

The Case Stated as follows: At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on Nov. 24, 1932, for the purpose of hearing appeals, Messrs. Rye & Eyre, solicitors, of 13, Golden-square, London, hereinafter called the appellants, appealed against an assessment to income tax in the sum of £300 for the year ending April 5, 1931, made upon them under the provisions of s. 26 of the Finance Act, 1927, as extended by s. 25 of the Finance Act, 1927, in respect of a payment made to M. Sacha Guitry on account of copyright royalties.

In June, 1930, a Mr. Lionel Barton was proposing to form a company with the object of producing in London an English version of a play called "Desire," written by M. Guitry. The company was registered on July 3, 1930, under the name of the Long Acre Syndicate, Ltd. Pending its formation, Mr. Barton negotiated with Mr. F. Howell, M. Guitry's agent, an agreement for a licence for the performance of the play on payment of royalties, one of the terms of the agreement being that on its signing the sum of £300 should be paid in advance on account of the royalties thereinafter stipulated.

On June 23, 1930, Mr. Barton called upon the appellants, who acted as solicitors for him and from and after its incorporation for the company which was then about to be formed, and instructed them to forward the agreement in duplicate to Mr. Howell and out of moneys which had been placed in their hands on account of the then proposed company (but of which the said Mr. Barton had the disposition on June 23, 1930) to pay the sum of £300 in accordance with the above-mentioned provision of the agreement.

Accordingly, on the same date the appellants forwarded the agreement in duplicate to Mr. Howell, together with their cheque for £300, accompanied by a covering letter in the following terms:

> "13, Golden-square, W. 1.—June 23, 1930.—Dear Sir,—M. Sacha Guitry and Mr. Lionel H. Barton.—'Desire.'—Long Acre Syndicate.—On the instructions of Mr. Barton, we enclose the two parts of the agreement, one of which has been executed by him, together with our cheque for £300 (the amount of royalties payable in advance under cl. 3), and should be glad if you would kindly return the other part to us signed by M. Guitry as early as possible, as the play is billed for production at the New Theatre on July 2.—Yours faithfully, RYE & EYRE.—F. Howell, Esq., 6, Rue de la Paix, Paris."

The cheque for £300, which was drawn payable to Mr. Howell, was cashed in due course. The production of the play resulted in a loss to the company, and in the events which happened no further sums were paid or payable to M. Guitry on account of royalties in respect of the performance of the play.

When the question of income tax was subsequently raised by the Revenue authorities the appellants endeavoured to persuade Mr. Barton, M. Guitry and Mr. Howell to pay the tax, but their efforts to this end have not been successful.

It was not disputed that M. Guitry's usual place of abode was not within the United Kingdom, and that the sum of £300 paid to him was a payment on account of royalties paid in respect of a copyright of which M. Guitry was the owner.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants:

(a) That the appellants were not persons by or through whom any payment giving rise to liability to tax was made;

(b) That they were not liable to account to the revenue for income tax on the sum of £300 paid to M. Guitry; and

(c) That the assessment should be discharged.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown:

(a) That the appellants were persons through whom the sum of £300 had been paid to M. Guitry on account of copyright royalties;

(b) That as such they were chargeable to income tax in respect of such payment under r. 21 of the rules applicable to all Schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, as amended by s. 26 of the Finance Act, 1927; and applied to copyright royalties by s. 25 of the last-mentioned Act;

(c) That the assessment ought to be confirmed.

The commissioners who heard the appeal held that the appellants were chargeable to income tax as persons through whom the payment in question was made, and they confirmed the assessment.

The appellants immediately after the determination of the appeal declared to the commissioners their dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and in due course required them to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Finance Act, 1927, s. 26, and the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149.

The Court of Appeal held, affirming the decision of FINLAY, J., that the sum of £300, being a sum paid in advance and on account of royalties, was, within the meaning of sub-s. (1) of s. 25 of the Finance Act, 1927, a sum paid periodically, the royalties being dependent on the weekly receipts of the play. There was no question of any territorial limit, as this was taxable income derived from property, namely, copyright, situated in and derived from the United Kingdom. The alteration of r. 21 was mere machinery, and under r. 19 of the General Rules there was justification given to the person who paid as against his principal to rely upon the deduction as money which had been paid for and on account of the principal. The appellants now appealed to the House of Lords.

Croom-Johnson, K.C., and P. B. Showan for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and R. P. Hills for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD ATKIN.—This appeal raises a simple question and one which I venture to think admits of only one answer. It has been answered in the same way by the Commissioners, by FINLAY, J., and by the Court of Appeal, and I am bound to say that I agree with the answer which they have given. It is a case in which there was an agreement between a Mr. Barton in London and M. Sacha Guitry, of Paris, by which Mr. Barton agreed to produce a play of M. Guitry's on terms that he was to pay certain royalties, and one of the terms of the agreement was that on the signing of the agreement he was to pay a sum of £300 "on account of the royalties hereinafter stipulated." Messrs. Rye & Eyre, the appellants, who are solicitors, and who were acting as solicitors for Mr. Barton, having certain funds in their hands which Mr. Barton was in a position to direct them to apply for this particular purpose, were directed by him to pay the £300 on account of royalties to M. Guitry, which they proceeded to do at the time when they enclosed the agreement signed by their client.

It is now sought by the Crown to make them liable for income tax in respect of that sum, and the material paragraphs of the relevant rules which it is contended make the solicitors liable are these. Rule 21 of the rules applicable to all schedules of the Income Tax Act provides in sub-s. (1) as follows:

> "Upon payment of any interest of money, annuity, or other annual payment charged with tax under Sched. D, or of any royalty or other sum paid in respect of the user of a patent, not payable, or not wholly payable out of profits or gains brought into charge, the person by or through whom any such payment is made shall deduct thereout a sum representing the amount of the tax thereon at the rate of tax in force at the time of the payment."

Then further subsections of the rule go on to provide that he shall then be assessed on the sums which he has deducted or ought to have deducted.

It will be observed that the rule is confined expressly to royalties or other sums paid

> "in respect of the user of a patent, not payable or not wholly payable out of profits or gains brought into charge"; and by s. 25 of the Finance Act, 1927, it was provided:

> "Where the usual place of abode of the owner of a copyright is not within the United Kingdom"—which is this case—"r. 21 of the General Rules"—that is the rule I have read—"shall apply to any payment of or on account of any royalties or sums paid periodically for or in respect of that copyright as it applies to annual payments not payable out of profits or gains brought into charge."

So that in respect of such a payment, you have not to consider the question of the payment being payable out of profits or gains brought into charge; there is an absolute obligation upon "the person by or through whom any such payment is made" to deduct the sum representing income tax from that sum.

Now were the appellants in this case, Messrs. Rye & Eyre, "the person by or through whom any such payment is made"? I imagine that, on the plain meaning of those words, the words would be apt to describe either the principal or the agent—the principal by whom, or the agent through whom, the payment was made. I reserve any question as to whether or not in this particular case the solicitors could be said to be the persons "by whom" the payment was made, but it seems to me obvious that the payment was made either by them or through them. And, indeed, the only other suggestion that was made in the case was that they were not the persons "through whom" the payment was made, because "through whom" means the person in consequence of whose instructions the payment was made, which seems to me to be entirely contrary to the plain meaning of the words, which appear to me to indicate agency.

A It appeared to the learned judges below to be a very plain case, and, indeed, it so presents itself to my mind. I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed.

LORD TOMLIN.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

LORD RUSSELL.—I agree.

LORD MACMILLAN.—I also agree.

B LORD WRIGHT.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

The plaintiff, the widow of a man who had been killed through the negligent driving of a motor car by the defendant, claimed damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, on behalf of herself and his other dependants, and also under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, as administratrix of the deceased man's estate, for the physical pain and suffering undergone by him, and for the shortening of his expectation of life. The deceased man had been rendered unconscious when struck by the motor car and died two days later without recovering consciousness. F

Held: (i) there being claims under the two Acts which were essentially different, the correct procedure was first to assess the damages under the Act of 1846 and then to consider the questions arising under the Act of 1934; G

(ii) on the claims under the Act of 1934, in view of the state of unconsciousness in which the deceased man had been from the time of the accident until that of his death, there was proved no pain or suffering and no mental distress due to the deceased's knowledge that his expectation of life was shortened in respect of which damages could be awarded. Action claiming damages for negligence.

The plaintiff was the widow of a man who had been killed in a motor accident and sued in two capacities (i) under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, on behalf of herself and the other dependants of the deceased; and (ii) as administratrix of her late husband's estate, under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934.

The accident occurred on Dec. 22, 1934. The deceased was cycling on the Great North Road when he was struck by the defendant's car and sustained a fractured skull. The medical evidence was that he at once lost consciousness and did not regain it before his death on Dec. 24. One witness of the accident, however, stated that the deceased made an effort to rise after being struck, and that he moaned. The defendant at first denied negligence, but withdrew that defence at the trial and admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to such damages as the court might award under the Fatal Accidents Act. He contended, however, that in the circumstances the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934.

Section 1 of that Act provides as follows:

> "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, on the death of any person after the commencement of this Act, all causes of action subsisting against or vested in him shall survive against, or, as the case may be, for the benefit of his estate. . . . (2) Where a cause of action survives as aforesaid for the benefit of the estate of a deceased person, the damages recoverable for the benefit of the estate of that person . . . (c) where the death of that person has been caused by the act or omission which gives rise to the cause of action, shall be calculated without reference to any loss or gain to his estate consequent on his death, except that a sum in respect of funeral expenses may be included. . . . (5) The rights conferred by this Act for the benefit of the estates of deceased persons shall be in addition to and not in derogation of any rights conferred on the dependants of deceased persons by the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 to 1908."

Edward Terrell (T. J. O'Connor, K.C., with him) for the plaintiff.—The two heads of the plaintiff's claim are separate and distinct. The court must first assess the damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, without reference to the claim under the Act of 1934. After that has been done, it becomes necessary to consider the measure of damages to the deceased's estate. In doing so Flint v. Lovell (1) must be applied. In that case the Court of Appeal held that damages at common law awarded to a man still living might include a sum for the shortened expectation of life caused by the injury. During the two days which elapsed after the accident before death ensued, the deceased man could have brought an action claiming damages under three heads, namely (i) pain and suffering, (ii) shortened expectation of life, and (iii) loss of earning capacity. That cause of action survives his death. I admit, however, that if a sum is awarded under the Fatal Accidents Act, the same sum cannot be awarded again under the head of loss of earning capacity under the Act of 1934.

MACKINNON, J.—The evidence is that the deceased was unconscious from the moment of the accident until death. We must hope that he suffered nothing. How, then, can damages for pain and suffering be awarded?

Terrell.—Even if the suffering were only momentary, there must have been an instant in which he suffered great pain and great apprehension.

MACKINNON, J.—I find it difficult to separate damages for the loss of the pleasure of living and damages for loss of earning capacity.

Terrell.—I submit that that can be done and ought to be done, since the latter only are included in the damage under the Fatal Accidents Act. Those, therefore, should not be included in the damages under the Act of 1934, but damages for the loss of the pleasure of living should be included.

The words in s. 1 (2) (c) of the Act of 1934, "without reference to any loss or gain to his estate," refer to loss or gain consequent on the death, not consequent on the cause of action. What is contemplated is such a loss as the ending of a pension, or such a gain as the payment of a life policy. It is only matters of that description which are to be excluded from consideration. [He also cited two unreported cases recently heard at assizes, in one of which Humphreys, J., had awarded to an executor damages for pain and suffering sustained by the person injured, and in the other of which Macnaghten, J., had refused to do so.]

Russell Vick, K.C., and Berryman for the defendant.—Damages are compensation given to a person who has a cause of action for injuries sustained by him. It is impossible for a court to assess the amount of damages to be awarded to one person for suffering undergone by another. Take, for example, a case where a deceased person had bequeathed his estate to the British Museum. How can it be possible to compensate such an institution for pain suffered by the testator? What passes to an executor is a cause of action, not an accrued claim for damages. Damages can only be assessed as at the date of assessment, and cannot be fixed on the assumption that a dead person is still living. With regard to Flint v. Lovell (1), it is ludicrous to extend the doctrine that a man while living may recover damages for a shortened expectation of life to a case where the life has been ended by death. Even if we are wrong in this contention, it has not been proved by the plaintiff that the deceased suffered any pain or had any apprehension of a shortened life. On the contrary, he was unconscious from the moment of impact, and experienced nothing.

Edward Terrell replied.

MACKINNON, J. [after stating the facts, continued:] The deceased man died without regaining consciousness. This action is brought by his widow, who claims compensation under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and in addition she makes a further claim as administratrix of the deceased for damages recoverable under the Act of 1934. The claims under those two Acts are essentially different. The former is made on behalf of the dependants and for their benefit. The latter is made as legal personal representative in order to get in the assets of the estate, and if the deceased has made a will any money recovered will be dealt with according to that will. Further, it is provided by s. 1 (5) of the 1934 Act that the rights conferred by that Act shall be in addition to, and not in derogation of, rights conferred by the Fatal Accidents Acts.

Therefore, if a double claim like the one now before me is made, the correct procedure is, in the first place, to disregard the 1934 Act and to assess the damages under the Fatal Accidents Act alone. After that has been done, questions arising under the Act of 1934 must be considered separately. [His Lordship dealt with the earnings of the deceased and the position of his dependants, and assessed the damages under the Fatal Accidents Act at £1,850, and also awarded a sum of £17 for funeral expenses under s. 1 (2) (c) of the 1934 Act, and he continued:] Counsel for the plaintiff says that just before the deceased man died there was vested in him a cause of action for damages against the defendant. Those damages fall under two heads, namely, (i) pain and suffering, and (ii) a claim in respect of the shortening of his expectation of life. It might have been said that there was a third ground of claim, namely, the loss of future earnings. With regard to that, I should have been of opinion that it was excluded by s. 1 (2) (c) of the Act, but I do not discuss it in detail, as counsel has said that he makes no claim in respect of it.

There remain the two claims for pain and suffering, and for the shortening of the expectation of life. The latter is based on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Flint v. Lovell (1), which introduces some novel considerations into the law as regards damages. The question which has been debated is whether a claim made under either of those heads can ever be a cause of action which, under the 1934 Act, survives for the benefit of the estate. I think it can. Take the case I suggested during the argument, of a man lingering in hospital for six months, and during that period incurring medical expenses and losing wages and suffering pain. He dies, and at the time of death there is vested in him a claim for damages in respect of each of those three matters. It is vested in him while he is alive, and when he dies it survives for the benefit of his estate. Counsel for the defendant says that the fact that a man has suffered pain cannot be proved after his death. But it might be proved in a proper case by observers equally well as by the man himself, and I think that contention fails.

Therefore, at any rate in theory, the plaintiff in this case would be entitled to damages for the pain and suffering undergone by the deceased before death. But on the facts I am not satisfied that he did experience any pain or suffering. The doctor said that he lost consciousness at once and did not recover it before death. It was suggested by one witness who saw the accident that the deceased tried to raise himself, and that he

A moaned. In those circumstances the degree of pain must be a matter of pure speculation, since the movement may have been convulsive. I am not satisfied that there was any pain for which more than nominal damages could be awarded. In order that the court might act it would have to be proved that he suffered, and that the plaintiff has failed to do.

With regard to the other heads of claim, I am not sure that I appreciate the full B purport of Flint v. Lovell (1), but as I understand it the damages in that case were awarded for the subjective effect on the plaintiff—that is to say, for the mental effect on the man of knowing that his expectation of life was shortened. If a man does not retain consciousness, I do not think that any damages for the shortening of life can be awarded. Those damages are for the effect on his own mind of his knowledge that instead of being a healthy man he is a crippled wreck. It is the fact that he is so mentally distressed C that is the ground for compensation. Where, therefore, he at once loses consciousness there is not vested in him at the time of death a claim for damages in respect of the shortening of his expectation of life. On different facts the result might be different, for where there is pain and suffering through a period of lingering, that pain and suffering might well be increased by the knowledge that the expectation of life was shortened.

In the result the damages must be confined to those recoverable under the Fatal D Accidents Act, together with the amount of the funeral expenses, and there will be judgment for the plaintiff for £1,867.

Motion.

The parties married in March, 1915, and there were two children of the marriage, a son aged eighteen and a daughter aged seventeen years. Under terms of arrangement in proceedings in the Chancery Division in 1931 property was settled on the husband for his life, and thereafter on the issue of his marriage with his wife and his children by any future wife. By a petition dated May 24, 1933, the wife, Helen May Daglish, prayed for a judicial separation on the ground that the husband, William Arnold Daglish, had deserted her without cause for not less than two years. He denied the charge. The petition was amended on Nov. 29, 1934, by charging the respondent with adultery and praying for dissolution of the marriage. The respondent did not defend the petition as amended, and on July 17, 1935, a decree nisi of divorce was granted to the petitioner. The petitioner now moved that the decree nisi should be rescinded and that she should be granted instead a decree of judicial separation, the prayer in the petition being amended accordingly.

Notice of motion had been given to the respondent, who did not appear, and to the King's Proctor, who did not oppose the motion.

F. L. C. Hodson for the petitioner.—The petitioner's object is to prevent the possibility of any children whom the respondent, if he were divorced, might have by an after-taken wife from sharing in the settled property to the detriment of the children of the present marriage. It is well established that the greater remedy of dissolution of marriage includes the lesser one of judicial separation, if the aggrieved party chooses to ask for the latter. In Parsons v. Parsons (1) the court rescinded the decree nisi on the petitioning wife's application and pronounced a decree of judicial separation as prayed. In Rutherford v. Richardson (2) the House of Lords affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal, rescinding a decree nisi of divorce granted on the ground of adultery, and pronouncing a decree of judicial separation on the ground of cruelty by way of substitution.

LANGTON, J., allowed the amendment, rescinded the decree nisi of divorce, and pronounced a decree of judicial separation.

S., as the managing director of a limited company, was entitled to a yearly salary, but in addition, under resolutions each year, he was given (for services to the company) the right to apply for and take up at par "A" ordinary shares of the company. The shares were at all times of a value considerably in excess of par, and were freely saleable. S. had not sold any of the shares so taken up. Assessments were made on S. in respect of the difference between the par value and the actual value of the allotted shares.

Held: the advantage given to S. of receiving the allotments was "profits" from "having or exercising an office or employment of profit" within the Income Tax Act, 1918, Sched. E, r. 1, and, therefore, was liable to tax as assessed.

Notes. The Income Tax Act, 1952, Sched. 9, r. 1, replaced the Income Tax Act, 1918, Sched. E, r. 1. The words "having or exercising an office or employment of profit mentioned in Sched. Appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD HANWORTH, M.R., SLESSER and ROMER, L.JJ.) (reported 151 L.T. 410) on a Case Stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149, for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice. The Case stated as follows:

"At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held at York House, 23, Kingsway, London, W.C.2, on May 8, 1933, for the purpose of hearing appeals, Harry Salmon, managing director of J. Lyons & Co., Ltd., hereinafter called 'the respondent,' appealed against the undermentioned assessments made upon him under Sched. E of the Income Tax Act, 1918, namely:

For the year ended April 5,
1927, in the sum of	7,187	10	0
1928, " "	7,968	10	0
1929, " "	7,968	10	0
1930, " "	9,218	10	0
1931, " "	10,312	10	0
1932, " "	9,375	0	0
1933, " "	8,750	0	0

"1. The respondent was a managing director of J. Lyons & Co., Ltd., hereinafter called 'the company,' and was employed under a service agreement at a salary of £6,500 free of income tax, which was increased as from March 31, 1929, to £7,280 free of tax. There were other managing directors employed under similar agreements, and assessments had been made on those directors similar to the present assessments, and were also under appeal to us at the same time.

"2. The authorised capital of the company was £9,925,000.

"The issued share capital of the company at March, 1933, was as follows:

400,000 ordinary shares	400,000
1,241,273 'A' ordinary shares	1,241,273
647,065 five per cent. cumulative preference shares	647,065
5,000,000 seven per cent. cumulative preference shares	5,000,000
1,000,000 eight per cent. cumulative preference shares	1,000,000
466,667 six per cent. preferred ordinary shares	466,667
500,000 proportional profit shares	500,000
450,000 'B' proportional profit shares (10s. each)	225,000
Total	£9,480,005

"3. Article 100 of the articles of association of the company provides as follows: 'The remuneration of a managing director shall from time to time be fixed by the directors, and may be by way of salary, or commission, or participation in profits, or by any or all of those modes.'

"The respondent's service agreement was entered into under this article.

"4. Article 6 of the company's articles is in the following terms: 'The shares shall be under the control of the directors, who may allot or otherwise dispose of the same to such persons on such terms and conditions, either at a premium or otherwise, and at such times as the directors think fit.'

"5. Resolutions have been passed from time to time by the directors of the company giving to the managing directors the opportunity of subscribing for the 'A' ordinary shares of the company at par.

"The following are extracts from the minutes of the directors dealing with the matter in years preceding the years to which the appeal relates:

"'June 9, 1920: Resolved that having regard to the eminent and special services involving an abnormal amount of work rendered by Mr. Alfred Salmon, Mr. Isidore Salmon and Mr. Harry Salmon, the three managing directors of the company, during the financial year of the company which ended on March 31 last, each of them be permitted to make application for and to take up at par one thousand "A" ordinary shares in the capital of the company.'

"'June 14: The assistant secretary pro tem. produced applications for 1,000 "A" ordinary shares from each of the managing directors, Mr. Alfred Salmon, Mr. Isidore Salmon and Mr. Harry Salmon, pursuant to the minute of the 9th instant, and it was resolved that one thousand "A" ordinary shares in the capital of the company numbered 84,911 to 85,910 be and are hereby allotted to Mr. Alfred Salmon. Mr. Alfred Salmon did not vote on this and the two following resolutions.'

"'Similar resolutions for Mr. Isidore Salmon and Mr. Harry Salmon.'

"'June 3, 1921: Messrs. A. Salmon, I. Salmon and H. Salmon having each applied for 1,000 "A" ordinary shares at par, it was resolved that having regard to the eminent and special services rendered by them during the financial year of the company ended March 31, 1921, the shares be and are hereby allotted to them on the terms of such applications and that certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'June 9, 1922: The directors having intimated to the three managing directors that the privilege previously accorded them of applying for an allotment of "A" ordinary shares at par would be repeated, applications by these gentlemen for 2,000 "A" ordinary shares each at par were produced by the secretary, and it was resolved that, having regard to the eminent and special services rendered by them during the financial year ended March 31, 1922, the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. A. Salmon, I. Salmon and H. Salmon respectively on the terms of such applications, and that certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'June 14, 1923: The directors having intimated to the three managing directors that the privilege previously accorded them of applying for an allotment of "A" ordinary shares at par would be repeated, applications by these gentlemen for 2,000 "A" ordinary shares each at par were produced by the secretary, and it was resolved that having regard to the eminent and special services rendered by them during the financial year ended March 31, 1923, the shares be and they are hereby allotted to Messrs. A. Salmon, I. Salmon and H. Salmon respectively on the terms of such applications, and that certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'June 11, 1924: The directors having intimated to the three managing directors that the privilege previously accorded to them of applying for an allotment of "A" ordinary shares at par would be repeated, applications by these gentlemen for 2,000 "A" ordinary shares each at par were produced by the secretary, and it was resolved that having regard to the services rendered by them during the financial year ending March 31, 1924, the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. A. Salmon, I. Salmon, and H. Salmon respectively, on the terms of such applications, and that certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'May 28, 1925: The directors having intimated to the three managing directors that the privilege would again be accorded to them of applying for 2,000 "A" ordinary shares each at par, applications from each of them for that number of shares were produced by the secretary, and it was resolved that the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. A. Salmon, I. Salmon, and H. Salmon on the terms of such applications, and that the certificates be issued accordingly.'

"The following are the entries in the minutes relating to the years in question in this appeal containing the resolutions of the directors and recording the applications of the respondent for 'A' ordinary shares.

"'June 3, 1926: Resolved that the three managing directors be accorded the privilege of applying for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par. Messrs. I. Salmon and H. Salmon did not vote on this resolution.'

"'June 10, 1926: The secretary produced applications from the three managing directors for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par in accordance with the minute of the 3rd inst., and it was resolved that the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. A. Salmon, I. Salmon and H. Salmon on the terms of such applications, and that the certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'May 26, 1927: Resolved that the three managing directors be accorded the privilege of applying for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par. Messrs. A. Salmon, I. Salmon, and H. Salmon did not vote on this resolution.'

"'June 9, 1927: The secretary produced applications from the three managing directors for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par in accordance with the minute of the 26th ult., and it was resolved that the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. A. Salmon, I. Salmon, and H. Salmon on the terms of such applications, and that the certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'June 14, 1928: The directors having intimated to the three managing directors that the privilege would again be accorded to them of applying for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par, applications from each of them for that number of shares were produced by the secretary, and it was resolved that the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. A. Salmon, I. Salmon, and H. Salmon on the terms of such applications, and that the certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'May 28, 1929: Resolved that the three managing directors be accorded the privilege of applying for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par.'

"'June 12, 1929: The secretary produced applications from the three managing directors for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par in accordance with the minute of the 28th ult., and it was resolved that the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. I. Salmon, H. Salmon, and M. Salmon on the terms of such applications and that certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'June 11, 1930: The directors having intimated to the managing directors that the privilege would again be accorded to them of applying for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par, applications from each of them for that number of shares were produced by the secretary, and it was resolved that the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. I. Salmon, H. Salmon, M. Salmon, M. Gluckstein, and J. Salmon on the terms of such applications, and that the certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'June 2, 1931: Resolved that the five managing directors be accorded the privilege of applying for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par.'

"'June 11, 1931: The secretary produced applications from the five managing directors for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par in accordance with the minute of the 2nd inst., and it was resolved that the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. I. Salmon, H. Salmon, M. Salmon, M. Gluckstein, and J. Salmon on the terms of such applications, and that certificates be issued accordingly.'

"'May 31, 1932: The directors having intimated to the managing directors that the privilege would again be accorded to them of applying for 2,500 "A" ordinary shares each at par, applications from each of them for the number of shares were produced by the secretary, and it was resolved that the shares be and are hereby allotted to Messrs. I. Salmon, H. Salmon, M. Salmon, M. Gluckstein, and J. Salmon on the terms of such applications and that the certificates be issued accordingly.'

"The managing directors year by year took advantage of the privilege so accorded to them of applying for shares, and took up and paid for shares accordingly. The assessments appealed against were made upon the basis that the shares so applied for and taken up were worth more than the par price which was actually paid for them.

"It is admitted that the market value of the 'A' ordinary shares of the company which had already been issued was much above par at the time the resolution of the directors according the respondent the privilege of applying for shares was passed in each of the years in question, and it was admitted that the market value of the new 'A' ordinary shares were also much above the par value at that time.

"6. Evidence was given to us as to the value of the 'A' ordinary shares generally and of particular matters affecting the value of the 'A' ordinary shares allotted to the managing directors, and we are satisfied that the new shares allotted to the managing directors year by year were not worth at the time of allotment as much as the market price of previously existing shares. Such new shares did not participate in the yearly dividends payable at or about the time of the allotment, and were not at once quotable on the Stock Exchange. For these and other reasons they were not worth the full market price of quoted 'A' ordinary shares on the day of issue. It has not, however, been necessary for us to fix exactly how much less they were worth than the market price, and it is enough to say here that the reduction in value which could be allowed in this respect was not a very large one. Taking the year 1931 as an instance the value of the shares then allotted was not less than £2 10s. a share more than the price paid for them.

"7. Evidence was also given to us that the company had some 33,000 shareholders; that it was not commercially advisable for the company to make a general issue of 'A' ordinary shares at a premium, and that 'A' ordinary shares had never been so issued; and that the opportunity of applying for 'A' ordinary shares given to the managing directors was not transferable by them. It was the policy of the company to increase the interest of the managing directors in the business by encouraging them to acquire and hold as many 'A' ordinary shares in the company as possible. The respondent had never sold any of his 'A' ordinary shares in the company.

"8. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the respondent had not received a profit assessable to income tax. The case of Hilder v. Dexter (1) and a previous decision of the Special Commissioners were referred to.

"9. On behalf of the inspector it was contended that the privilege granted to the respondent was granted for services rendered or to be rendered as managing director of the company; that it was of a valuable nature; that its value was assessable to income tax; and that the assessments should be confirmed.

"10. The Commissioners who heard the appeal felt bound to consider the previous decision of their body to which they had been referred. That case, as also the present one, was very fully argued, and the decision was given in favour of the taxpayer. Although dissatisfaction was expressed with the decision, and a case was demanded and drafted, the case was not proceeded with by the Board of Inland Revenue. They were unable to distinguish that case in any substantial point from the present case, and they accordingly held it to be their duty to follow it, and they discharged all the assessments appealed against.

"Immediately upon their so determining the appeal, the inspector of taxes expressed to the Commissioners his dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and in due course required the Commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149."

The Court of Appeal held, affirming the decision of FINLAY, J., that though there were passages in the judgment of LORD WATSON in Tennant v. Smith (2), which possibly might favour the contention of the appellant that this privilege, as it could not be to his advantage unless he first found money to apply for the shares, secured the shares and then sold them, was not a profit assessable to tax, there were cases such as A.-G. v. Ashton Gas Co. (3) and Samuel v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (4) in which observations were made which clearly showed that it was not necessary that the privilege should be capable of immediately being turned into money.

Mr. Harry Salmon appealed.

Latter, K.C., Wilfrid Greene, K.C., and Andrewes-Uthwatt for the appellant.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Reginald P. Hills for the respondent were not called on.

LORD ATKIN.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal affirming an order of FINLAY, J., reversing the Special Commissioners. It is an appeal by the taxpayer, Harry Salmon, who is a managing director of the well-known company of J. Lyons & Co., Ltd., who had been assessed to income tax under Sched. E of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of allotments of shares that had been made to him in the circumstances which are set out in the case.

The material section of the Income Tax Act appears in r. 1 of Sched. E:

> "Tax under this schedule shall be annually charged on every person having or exercising an office or employment of profit mentioned in this schedule . . . in respect of all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites or profits whatsoever therefrom for the year of assessment."

The assessments were made in respect of the seven taxing years from the year ended April 5, 1927. The position is that Mr. Salmon, the appellant, had been a managing director of the company for a number of years, and the first of a series of resolutions on which these shares came into the possession of the appellant begins by a resolution of June 9, 1920:

> "Resolved, that having regard to the eminent and special services involving an abnormal amount of work rendered by Mr. Alfred Salmon, Mr. Isidore Salmon and Mr. Harry Salmon, the three managing directors of the company, during the financial year of the company which ended on March 31 last, each of them be permitted to make application for and to take up at par 1,000 'A' ordinary shares in the capital of the company."

Five days afterwards, the assistant-secretary produced applications for 1,000 "A" ordinary shares from each of the managing directors, and it was resolved that 1,000 shares should be allotted to each of them.

There are a whole series of resolutions which follow right through up to 1932, the only difference being that the reference to "eminent and special services" after a time falls to be omitted. No doubt by that time the value of the services was well ingrained in the minds of the directors of the company; and the numbers of shares allotted rose gradually. In 1922 the shares allotted were 2,000 shares, which continued until 1926, when the amount of shares rose to 2,500 shares, which is the figure at which it remains up to the present time.

The "A" shares are shares which rank with the ordinary shares of the company for full dividend, except that apparently they do not give a voting privilege. At all the material times these "A" shares could be sold in the market and were of a value in the market much above the par value at which the directors acquired them. We have not the full particulars of the prices, but apparently in some cases the prices were something like £3 or £4 as compared with the par value of £1. The result was that these managing directors got a very profitable advantage to themselves; and indeed it is very interesting to-day, when people sometimes say there is no gratitude in commerce, to feel that that is refuted by the circumstances of this case, and it is clear that the board of the company have fully recognised the valuable services rendered by these managing directors, for in addition to receiving a salary which is now about, I think £7,000, a year free of income tax, they have in these last years also had the advantage of receiving allotments of shares which they have obtained for £2,500, and which they could sell the next day for something like £7,000, £8,000 or even £10,000.

The question that arises is whether or not that advantage given to the managing directors comes under the words "salaries, fees, wages, perquisites or profits whatsoever therefrom," that is, from "having or exercising an office or employment of profit." That it was in fact remuneration for the office of profit, I think there can be no question at all, on the facts that I have stated. We have not, perhaps fortunately, to consider the precise meaning now of the word "perquisites," because "perquisites" has received a definition in the Act of 1842, it received another statutory definition in the Act of 1918, and now that assistance has been withdrawn from the courts, because the statutory definition has been repealed. It is quite sufficient here, I think, to say that this comes within "or profits whatsoever"; I can have no doubt that here was a profit that was a profit which was in fact given to the managing director and enjoyed by him.

It is to be observed that while the board have expressed their willingness to entertain an application for these shares, nobody was bound and no right was given and no profit was received of any kind by the appellant until the application had been accepted and the shares in question had been allotted to him. At that moment he received from the company 2,500 shares on which there was no clog whatever and he was entitled to go on the market and sell those shares, for which he had paid £1, and he would at once be in a position to receive £3 or £4 or £5, as the case might be.

I think it is really impossible to appreciate the argument which suggests that that was not an immediate profit in the nature of money's worth received by the director as remuneration for his services. It appears to me to correspond very closely in substance to a case where a company might have sold 1,000 tons of its product, if the company were a colliery company, to a director who was in the coal trade, at a price which was one-third of the market price of the day. There no question could arise that the person was receiving a profit in the nature of money's worth and he was receiving that profit in the nature of money's worth to the extent of the difference between the price he could get for it and the price he had actually paid.

For these reasons—I am not quite sure they are precisely the same reasons as those given by the Court of Appeal—this case appears to me to be a very simple case, and I move your Lordships that this case be dismissed with costs.

LORD TOMLIN.—I agree and have nothing to add.

LORD RUSSELL.—I also agree.

Street Trading—Child—Selling from stall in street market—Children and Young Persons Act, 1933 (23 & 24 Geo. 5, c. 12), s. 20 (1).

By s. 20 (1) of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933: "No person under the age of sixteen years shall engage or be employed in street trading." The respondent, who was teaching his daughter, who was under sixteen years of age, the business of selling from a stall, employed her to sell from a stall in a market held under a royal charter in a street in the borough of Lancaster.

Held: he was guilty of an offence under the above section despite the fact that a market was being held in the street at the time of sale.

Notes. As to the employment of children, see 17 HALSBURY'S LAWS (2nd Edn.) 722 et seq., and for cases, see 28 DIGEST 348 et seq. For Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, see 12 HALSBURY'S STATUTES 974.

Case Stated by justices for the borough of Lancaster.

An information was preferred by the appellant, Vann, against the respondent, Eatough, charging him with employing his daughter Violet Eatough, a young person under sixteen years of age, in street trading, contrary to s. 20 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933.

On the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted: On Sept. 18, 1934, a market was held on one side of Lower Church-street, Lancaster, under a charter granted by King Edward III to the borough in 1363, by which a market was permitted to be held every Wednesday and Saturday. The charter provided that persons selling from stalls in the market should pay a toll to the corporation. The respondent occupied a stall in the said street on Sept. 8, 1934, and had paid a toll of 3s. to the corporation, as required by the charter. His stall consisted of a collapsible trestle table, extended by boxes, and covering approximately 18 ft. along and 8 ft. across the street. Vegetables and flowers were on sale at the stall. The respondent employed his daughter, Violet, to sell from the stall, and on Sept. 8, 1934, she sold a cauliflower to one Edith Burrows. The respondent was teaching his daughter the business of selling from a stall.

It was contended for the appellant that the respondent employed his daughter in street trading, and that she was none the less selling goods in a street because a market was held there. It was contended for the respondent that Violet Eatough was not trading in a street, but in a market. The justices dismissed the information, and the appellant appealed to the Divisional Court.

Ralph Etherton for the appellant.

Sandlands, K.C., and J. A. Grieves for the respondent.

LORD HEWART, C.J.—The present case is the exact converse of Stratford Co-operative Society, Ltd. v. East Ham Corpn. (1), which has been relied upon by the respondent. In that case ROWLATT, J., said ([1915] 2 K.B. at p. 77):

> "I think 'street trading' means trading with customers found in the street—with customers whose resort is the street—the trader using the street as a market place, and not trading with customers whom he finds at their houses, to arrive at which he necessarily had to pass through the street."

Applying that statement of the law to the present case, I cannot doubt that the facts disclose a mode of street trading. The appeal must be allowed, and the case remitted to the justices with the direction that the offence which was charged was proved.

HUMPHREYS, J.—I agree.

SINGLETON, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

THE KATE

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Sir Boyd Merriman, P.), March 15, April 5, 1935]

Dock—Damage to ship alongside quay—Foul berth—Negligence by harbour authority and wharfingers—Lease of quay by authority to wharfingers—Covenant by authority to keep berths in good order—Right of wharfingers to indemnity from authority.

By a lease dated Feb. 28, 1932, and made between the first and second defendants, the first defendants the harbour authority, demised to the second defendants who were wharfingers, a length of quay frontage at a port with the right to berth and moor vessels for loading and discharging at the wharfingers' premises on the quay, and they covenanted to keep "the quay, quay walls, mooring posts or river berths in good order and condition." On Sept. 7, 1933, a motor vessel belonging to the plaintiffs sustained damage while lying aground alongside the quay. In an action by the plaintiffs against both defendants the court found that the first defendants had failed to take reasonable care to see that the berth on which the vessel lay was in a proper condition and that the second defendants had taken no reasonable care to see that the first defendants had remedied defects in the berth regarding which the second defendants had complained to them, and judgment was entered for the plaintiffs against both defendants. On a claim by the second defendants against the first defendants for an indemnity in respect of the damages and costs awarded against them, Held: notwithstanding the negligence of the second defendants towards the plaintiffs, the damage to the vessel flowed from the breach by the first defendants of the covenant in the lease, and, therefore, the second defendants were entitled to the indemnity which they claimed.

Third Party Claim for an indemnity in an action brought by the owners of the motor vessel Kate claiming damages from the first defendants, the corporation of Barnstaple, A as harbour authority at Barnstaple, and from the second defendants, Stanbury & Son, Ltd., flour millers and lessees of the corporation of part of the quay frontage on the River Yeo, Barnstaple, for damage received by the Kate through lying on the uneven bed of the river while discharging grain to the second defendants at the quay.

On March 5, 1935, SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., sitting with Trinity Masters, held that the corporation were liable for negligence in that they failed to take reasonable care to see B that the berth in question was kept in a fit condition as they had covenanted to do in the lease between themselves and the company, and that the company were liable because they knew that the berth had been unsafe and they had taken no reasonable care to satisfy themselves that repair work by the corporation had been efficiently done.

The company claimed from the corporation an indemnity in respect of the damages and costs awarded against them in the plaintiffs' action.

Cyril Miller for the company.

R. F. Hayward and Vere Hunt for the corporation.

April 5. SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P.—I have already delivered judgment in this case as between the plaintiffs and the two defendants, but I have now to decide the third-party claim by the company against the corporation.

D At the conclusion of the arguments in connection with the plaintiffs' claim, an attempt was made to argue the third-party claim, but it soon became apparent that it was impossible to deal with this satisfactorily until I had expressed my reasons for holding that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover against both defendants. The case was, therefore, argued after the parties had had time to consider my first judgment, and upon the basis that that judgment was accepted for the purpose of the argument. E This present judgment, therefore, is to be read in light of my earlier judgment, but I will summarise the effect of it for the purpose of making my present judgment plain.

Both defendants have been found guilty of negligence towards the plaintiffs, but I need scarcely say that the third-party claim is not based on any attempt to obtain contribution as between one tortfeasor and another, but is based upon the covenant in the lease dated Feb. 29, 1932, whereby the corporation covenanted with the company F to keep the quay, quay wall, mooring posts and river berths (including the berth at which the Kate was injured) in good order and condition during the said term. The company allege that the award of damages against them results solely from the breach of this covenant. The corporation, on the other hand, deny that they committed any breach of covenant, and they incorporate in their defence the allegation made in their defence to the plaintiffs' claim, that the damage was due to the Kate being improperly G placed on the morning of Sept. 7, 1933, without the knowledge and permission of the corporation or their servants, in a position abreast of the water discharge from the flour mills and partly in one berth and partly in another berth. On the question of damage the corporation also argue, as they are entitled to do, although there is no specific pleading with regard to damages, that, even assuming there was a breach of covenant, the damages claimed are too remote.

H In my former judgment I have already disposed, adversely to the corporation, of the issue raised by their defence to the plaintiffs' claim, and have found that the place where the Kate was lying was a recognised berth and that it was not in a reasonably safe condition owing to the negligence of the defendants. It follows, therefore, that I have already found that they were guilty of a breach of the covenant in respect of this very berth; and I do not propose to say anything further on that point. The real I substance of the argument of the corporation is that the liability of the company for the damage sustained by the Kate is the result of the independent tort of which they have been found guilty, and that, regarded as a consequence of the corporation's breach of covenant, the damages are too remote; and, secondly, that, in any event, the damages ought not to include costs incurred by the company in fighting the action. This argument was put in several ways, but it always came back to the question of remoteness of damage.

I have found that the corporation knew perfectly well that the berth was unsafe and had allowed things to get gradually worse. On the other hand, I have found that in the middle of August the company were uneasy about the state of the berths generally, and had called upon the corporation to put them in order; but as the letter from their Barnstaple office to the head office of Aug. 19 shows, they were re-assured by the fact that the corporation were doing work upon the berths, and, to quote their own words, "when they have finished, the berths will be in good condition." That remained, so far as any written record is concerned, the state of mind of the company's representatives at Barnstaple until the master of the Kate complained on Sept. 6. That complaint, however, related to a particular heap of sand under the Kate's stern as she lay alongside the elevator, which I have found had nothing whatever to do with the damage.

In other words, though the company did not know of the actual defect which caused the damage to the Kate, they knew that there had been grounds for complaint that the berths were defective and unsafe, and they knew that the corporation had been doing some repair work as the result of their own representations to this effect, but I found, nevertheless, that the company took no care to assure themselves that the results were satisfactory, or to inform the plaintiffs, in these circumstances, that they had not done so, and I have held them guilty of negligence in respect of this failure to warn the plaintiffs.

Counsel for the corporation argues that the damage to the Kate resulted solely from this negligence on the part of the company. He says that it is impossible that it should have been in the contemplation of the parties that the company would put a ship on the berth opposite the crane without warning the master of the extent of their own knowledge, or lack of knowledge, as the case might be, of the state of the berths. In particular, he argued that this could not be so, since the corporation had promised the company to remove the heap of sand on the morning of Sept. 7, a thing which it was impossible to do if the Kate was moved to the crane.

I will deal with this latter argument first. It would be a formidable argument if there were any ground for supposing that such delay in moving the Kate as would have enabled the corporation to remove what I have found to be the irrelevant heap of sand, would have prevented the damage which actually occurred, but I am satisfied that this would not have been so. At most it could only have postponed the damage; though, as the Kate did not take the ground until well after nine o'clock, this heap could easily have been removed in time to allow her to be moved on the same tide. The actual removal of the heap of sand would have had no effect whatever in minimising the real danger, though it might possibly have aggravated it by giving her even less support forward than she had. I think counsel for the second defendants is right in arguing that the failure to wait for the corporation to clear the heap of sand may have been a causa sine qua non, but was not a causa causans. It amounts to no more than that it enables the corporation to say that the Kate might not have been placed upon the point of danger at the exact moment when she was so placed, but otherwise it would have had no effect upon the matter whatever.

But it remains to deal with the main point—that it was the company's negligence in allowing the Kate to move to the dangerous berth, without warning, which was the cause of the damage. In my opinion, this argument is disposed of by Mowbray v. Merryweather (1). In that case the defendant, the owner of a steamship, had undertaken to provide the plaintiffs, a firm of stevedores, with the gear reasonably fit for the purpose of discharging a cargo. Instead, he supplied a chain so defective that it broke while being used in discharging the cargo, whereby a workman of the plaintiffs was seriously injured. That workman recovered damages against the stevedores under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, by reason of their negligence in failing to discover the defect as it was held they might have done by the exercise of reasonable care. The very argument used in this case, mutatis mutandis, was addressed to the Court of Appeal. In the course of his judgment LORD ESHER said that there was a contract, a breach of it, and, therefore, a cause of action for which, at any rate, nominal damages would be recoverable. He added that the workman could not have recovered unless, as between himself and the stevedores, the stevedores had been guilty of want of care, but that the stevedores argued that they were not bound to examine the chain because the defendant had warranted it sound, and that they had a right to rely on the warranty and did rely

A on it; and that the defendant could not rely on a duty to use due care which was owed not to him but to the plaintiff workman; and LORD ESHER held that this contention was correct, and that the plaintiffs owed no duty to the defendant to examine the chain before allowing it to be used by their workmen, the only duty they owed in that respect being to the workman. He also approved expressly the judgment of MARTIN, B., in Burrows v. March Gas and Coke Co. (2), which judgment seems to me to be in point in B the present case. One of the reasons given in support of this decision of the Court of Appeal was that, as in this case, the circumstances were such that the original plaintiff could have recovered direct against the then defendant.

In Scott v. Foley (3) the claim was founded on a breach by the owner of a warranty in a charterparty that the vessel was "in every way fitted for the voyage and service, and to be so maintained by the owners." The breach alleged was the defective con- C dition of an iron ladder leading to the hold, and it was held that the plaintiff charterer's liability to the stevedore was the natural consequence of the defendant's breach of warranty, notwithstanding that his own negligence in failing to inspect the ladder gave rise to the claim of the stevedore. It will be observed that the warranty was a warranty both that the ship was fit for the service and that it would be so maintained.

As regards both these cases, there is, of course, a difference between a covenant to D keep a thing in repair and a warranty that the thing is at a given time in a particular state of fitness or repair, but it seems to me that there is no distinction in principle. The question in either case is whether the damage sustained is the natural consequence of the breach of contract, notwithstanding some independent negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

I ought, however, to add that counsel for the corporation also took the point that, even E assuming that the present case was governed by the cases I have mentioned, the company had nowhere pleaded or proved that they put the Kate on the berth in reliance on the covenant. With regard to this, I need only say that the identical argument was used and rejected in Mowbray v. Merryweather (1), and that in Scott v. Foley (3) BIGHAM, J., found no difficulty in holding, apart from any specific evidence, that the warranty was obviously relied upon. I so hold in this case. The company had actually called F on the corporation to fulfil their covenant and were obviously re-assured to some extent by the work which they had seen the corporation doing. In my opinion, the fact that the company did not fulfil their duty to the plaintiffs involved no breach of duty to the corporation; and I hold that, notwithstanding their negligence towards the plaintiffs, they are entitled to say as against the corporation that the resulting damage to the Kate flowed from the breach of covenant.

G There remains the question of the costs. It seems to me that when the corporation had pleaded, not only as against the plaintiffs, but as against the company, that the Kate had been permitted to lie at a place which was wholly unauthorised as a berth, it was practically impossible for the company to submit to judgment. There is abundant authority, including Scott v. Foley (3) and the cases there cited, that costs reasonably incurred in defending a claim should be included in the damages. I hold that these H costs were reasonably incurred in the circumstances, and if costs are recoverable at all counsel rightly admitted that there was no distinction to be drawn between the party and party costs, and the solicitor and client costs. For these reasons I give judgment for the indemnity claimed, with costs.

Judgment for second defendants.

FREDMAN v. MINISTER OF HEALTH

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Swift, J.), December 16, 1935]

Housing—Clearance order—Right of objector to be heard in opposition to resolution before passed by local authority—Housing Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 39), s. 1 (1), s. 2 (1).

A local authority passed a resolution under s. 1 of the Housing Act, 1930, declaring an area in their district to be a clearance area, and made a clearance order under s. 2 (1) of the Act. An owner of property in that area contended that the clearance order based on the resolution was bad, because he had not been given an opportunity of being heard in opposition to the proposed order before the resolution was passed.

Held: the local authority were not obliged to hear objections by owners of the property affected before passing the resolution, and that the resolution and subsequent order were valid.

Notes. The Housing Act, 1930, was repealed by the Housing Act, 1936, which in turn was repealed by the Housing Act, 1957, ss. 42, 43 (1) and 44 of which reproduce ss. 1 and 2 of the Act of 1930. The powers and duties of the Minister of Health relating to housing have been transferred to the Minister of Housing and Local Government.

Application under s. 11 of the Housing Act, 1930, asking the court to quash a clearance order made by Plymouth City Council and confirmed by the Minister of Health.

In March, 1934, the council passed a resolution under s. 1 of the Act, declaring a certain area within their district to be a clearance area. The applicant, who was the owner of some of the houses in the area, himself caused certain improvements to be made to them, and gave notice of objection to the confirmation of the clearance order by the Minister. In April, 1934, a public local inquiry took place, at which evidence was given that the houses in the area were in a dangerous and insanitary condition by reason of lack of repair. The applicant gave evidence to the effect that the improvements carried out by him had removed the alleged defects. The Minister subsequently confirmed the order. The applicant now asked that it should be quashed on the ground that the council ought to have given him an opportunity of being heard in opposition to the resolution before they passed it.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Donald Somervell, K.C.) and R. C. Essenhigh for the Minister.

SWIFT, J.—On March 5, 1934, the corporation of the City of Plymouth, acting under Part I of the Housing Act, 1930, declared an area in their jurisdiction to be a clearance area, and one in which all buildings should be removed. They proceeded in due course to bring the order which they had made before the Minister of Health for his consideration, and after the proper steps had been taken to comply with the Housing Act, 1930, the Minister confirmed the order. The applicant, Israel Fredman, was the owner of the whole of the property which was situated in the area, and he objected to the order being confirmed by the Minister. He now applies under s. 11 (3) of the Act to this court, contending that before the corporation passed the resolution under s. 1 (1) he ought to have been heard in opposition to the step which they were proposing to take. He

A contends that this order, as confirmed by the Minister, is not an order which is within the Act, or that the requirements of the Act have not been complied with, because he was not heard by the corporation before they passed the resolution declaring this to be a clearance area.

It is a well-known principle of our common law that a tribunal which is by law invested with power to affect property of His Majesty's subjects is bound to give the particular
B subject an opportunity of being heard before it proceeds to deal with the property, and that rule, as was said by WILLES, J., in Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works (1) (14 C.B.N.S. at p. 190) "is of universal application, and founded upon the plainest principles of justice." As counsel for the applicant has pointed out to me, there have been numerous cases arising under all sorts of conditions in which it has been said by the courts that that principle must be regarded by persons who are empowered to deal with
C the property and the liberty of others. No man, by the common law of England, is to be condemned unheard.

That being a broad principle of our law, how far is it applicable in the administration of the provisions of the Housing Act, 1930? I do not think there can be any doubt that that broad principle is incorporated in the Act, and has to be regarded when one is considering the administration of the Housing Acts so far as the conduct of any person
D is concerned who has anything to do which affects the property of a private citizen. The Minister clearly, in confirming an order, has to have regard to the rights of citizens, and has to act in accordance with the dictates of natural justice, and so has the person, in my view, who holds the public local inquiry which the Act imposes. Nobody can suggest for one moment that the principle of the common law that the King's subjects are to be dealt with fairly by those who administer his Acts of Parliaments is not recog-
E nised, and is not implied, in the Housing Act, 1930. Counsel for the applicant has suggested to me that that principle must be applied by the corporation before they pass their resolution and make their clearance order, and there I am bound to say I cannot follow him. Before they pass their resolution the Act of Parliament says what they are to do. They are to consider an official representation or any other information in their possession, which, I suppose, is the information furnished by their own eyes and
F nostrils, if by nothing else, and on considering these, if they are satisfied that an area is dangerous or injurious to the health of the inhabitants of the area, they are to proceed to pass a resolution to that effect. They do not themselves thereby order the property to be pulled down, or to be made sanitary; they do not affect the property in any way, except that by passing their resolution they may bring it one step towards ultimate demolition, and they may thereby depreciate its value, or on the other hand, it is con-
G ceivable that they might enhance its value. It certainly does not affect the property in the way in which the property was affected in Cooper v. Wandsworth District Board of Works (1) or in the way in which the property was affected in Hopkins v. Smethwick Local Board of Health (2) which have been cited to me.

There is no obligation on the part of the corporation, and as far as I can see no power on the part of the corporation, to hold an inquiry of any sort before they pass their
H resolution and make their clearance order. What they have to do is to give notice of it when they have made it, and, having given such notice, the owner of the property in the area is informed that he may make his objection to the Minister. I do not think in the scheme of this Act there is any intention on the part of the legislature that the corporation shall hold any inquiry or give anybody any hearing at all. I, therefore, think that this application must be dismissed with costs.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Farwell, J.), November 12, 1935]

Charity—Cy-près doctrine—General charitable intent—Gift to named institution accurately described—Institution ceasing to exist before death of testatrix—Further gift, too vaguely described, to non-existent institutions.

A testatrix, by her will, gave £200 to the W. Peace Society, Cambridge, £300 to the Peace Society of Belfast, and £300 to the Peace Society of Dublin. The W. Peace Society had ceased to exist before the death of the testatrix. There was no evidence that there ever had been a Peace Society of Belfast. The Peace Society of Dublin had never existed, but there had been in existence the Dublin Peace Society, which, however, had ceased to exist before the death of the testatrix.

Held: (i) where a testator shows in the will itself some care to identify the particular charitable society he wishes to benefit, the difficulty of showing any general charitable intent if the society once existed, but has ceased to exist before the death of the testator, is very great; (ii) the testatrix had so identified the W. Peace Society, and, therefore, it was not open to the court to hold that there was any such general charitable intent as to allow the application of the cy-près doctrine, and the gift to the W. Peace Society accordingly failed; (iii) as there was a clear intention to benefit by the legacy to the Peace Society of Belfast any society whose object was the promotion of peace and which was connected with Belfast, there was a general charitable intent, and the cy-près doctrine applied; (iv) the testatrix's ideas as to the particular society she wished to benefit by the gift to the non-existent Peace Society of Dublin were extremely vague, but there was an intention to benefit any society whose object was the promotion of peace and which was connected with Dublin, the cy-près doctrine therefore applied.

Notes. As to legacies to unidentifiable or non-existent charitable institutions, and as to indications that the testator thereby intended a general charitable purpose, see 4 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 279, 327, and for cases on the subject, see 8 DIGEST (Repl.) 461–464, 1624–1641.

Adjourned Summons taken out by the executors and trustees of a testatrix for the determination of the questions how each of three legacies left by her will should be dealt with. K. E. Jones, on behalf of the Peace Committee of the Society of Friends, claimed a legacy of £200 left to the Wisbech Peace Society, Cambridge; M. F. Greeves, on behalf of the Belfast Branch of the League of Nations Union, claimed a legacy of £300 left to the Peace Society of Belfast; and W. O'C. Brady, on behalf of the League of Nations Society of Ireland, claimed a legacy of £300 left to the Peace Society of Dublin. The facts appear in the judgment.

G. W. Knowles (G. E. Timins with him) for W. O'C. Brady.
Wilfrid Hunt for the residuary legatee.
Andrewes-Uthwatt for the Attorney-General.

FARWELL, J.—The first question that I have to determine is whether a gift of £200 "to the Wisbech Peace Society, Cambridge," fails. The evidence is that this particular society ceased to exist in the testatrix's lifetime. It is said that it is being still carried on as part of the work of the Peace Committee of the Society of Friends. The onus is upon them to show that they are the persons entitled to take. The evidence in this case is so unsatisfactory that I cannot say that that onus has been discharged.

That leaves the question whether there is any general charitable intent, so as to admit of the application of the cy-près doctrine. In the will there is a long list of various charitable societies, including charities whose work is devoted to peace. It is said that as this is one of a long list of charitable legacies there is a general charitable intent. On the other hand, it is said that where there is a gift to a particular society, which once existed but ceased to exist before the death of the testator or testatrix, the gift lapses and there is no room for the cy-près doctrine. I have been referred to Re Davis (1). In that case the learned judge was able to come to the conclusion that as to one particular gift there was a general charitable intent; but in that case no such society as that named in the will had ever existed. It was not a case of a society which had been in existence and had ceased to exist. I do not decide that it can never be possible for the court to hold that there is a general charitable intent in a case where the charity named in the will once existed but ceased to exist before the death. Without deciding that, it is enough for me to say that, where the testator selects as the object of his bounty a particular charity and shows in the will itself some care to identify the particular society which he desires to benefit, the difficulty of finding any general charitable intent in such case if the named society once existed, but ceased to exist before the death of the testator, is very great. Here the testatrix has gone out of her way to identify the object of her bounty. In this particular case she has identified it as being "the Wisbech Peace Society, Cambridge (which is a branch of the London Peace Society)." Under those circumstances, I do not think it is open to me to hold that there is in this case any such general charitable intent as to allow the application of the cy-près doctrine.

Accordingly, in my judgment, the legacy of £200 fails and is undisposed of.

Then there is the gift to the "Peace Society of Belfast."

The claimant for this legacy is the Belfast Branch of the League of Nations Union. I am quite unable on the evidence to say that that was the society which this lady intended to benefit, and I doubt whether the lady herself knew exactly what society she did mean to benefit. I think she had a desire to benefit any society which was formed for the purpose of promoting peace and was connected with Belfast. Beyond that, I do not think that she had any very clear idea in her mind. That is rather indicated by the pencil note which was found after her death. At any rate, I cannot say that by the description, "the Peace Society of Belfast," the lady meant the Belfast Branch of the League of Nations Union; but there is enough in this case to enable me to say that, although there is no gift to any existing society, the gift does not fail. It is a good charitable gift and must be applied cy-près. The evidence suggests that at some time or other, possibly before the late war, there may have been a society called the Peace Society of Belfast. It is all hearsay evidence; there is nothing in the least definite about it, and it does not satisfy me that there ever was any society in existence which exactly fits the description in this case, and, there being a clear intention on the part of the lady, as expressed in her will, to benefit societies whose object was the promotion of peace and there being no such society as that named in her will, in this case there is a general charitable intent, and, accordingly, the doctrine of cy-près applies.

The next legacy is "to the Peace Society of Dublin the sum of £300." The claimant to that legacy is a society known as the League of Nations Society of Ireland. The way in which the claim is put is not the same as in the case of the Belfast Society. It is said that there was a society known as the Dublin Peace Society, the name of which was afterwards changed to the Irish Peace Society; that it ceased to exist many years ago, and that what was left of its funds was handed over to this new society, when it came into existence, and the old society is now being carried on by the existing society. The evidence does not satisfy me that that is so, and I am unable to say that the League of Nations Society of Ireland is entitled to the legacy. Then it is said that since there was at one time a society which answers the description in the will, and has now ceased to exist, there is a lapse and the legacy fails. I think that it is very probable that, if there was now a society in existence known as the Dublin Peace Society, having regard to the evidence here, such a society would have had little difficulty in establishing that

A it was the society which the lady intended to benefit; but the evidence shows that there never was a society which answered the exact description in the will, "the Peace Society of Dublin." It is also clear from the memorandum which the lady left, which was found after her death, that her ideas as to any particular society which she desired to benefit by this gift were extremely vague; her one idea seems to have been to benefit any society whose object was the promotion of peace which was connected with Dublin. B Under those circumstances, there never having been any society which exactly answers the description in the will, this again is a case where the doctrine of cy-près applies.

Declaration accordingly.

On April 2, 1933, the debtor executed a deed of arrangement in favour of a trustee and his creditors, but such deed did not contain a trust for preferential payment of those persons who would have been preferential creditors if the debtor had been made a bankrupt. On May 22, 1933, the trustee's solicitors informed the solicitors for an employee who would have been a preferential creditor in a bankruptcy that the trustee would treat the employee's claim as a preferential claim. G Subsequently the trustee refused to treat the employee's claim as a preferential claim.

Held: the trustee was bound to treat the employee's claim as a preferential claim because (i) the letter of May 22, 1933, and the employee's consequent acquiescence in the deed constituted an agreement for good consideration that the trustee H would treat the employee as a preferential creditor; (ii) this agreement to treat the employee as a preferential creditor was within the power to "compromise, compound . . . or otherwise settle any debt . . . claim or thing whatever relating to the . . . estate or to the trust" conferred on the trustee by s. 15 (f) of the Trustee Act, 1925, as applied to a trustee under a deed of arrangement by s. 3 (1) of the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, and was, therefore, binding on I the trustee.

Per CURIAM: It is not by virtue of s. 17 of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, that the workman must be treated as a preferential creditor: s. 17 merely protects the trustee from criminal liability and has no effect on the civil rights of the parties.

B Appeal by the trustee under a deed of arrangement from the Staffordshire County Court, made on a summons under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, that a creditor whom he had agreed to treat as a preferential creditor should be so treated.

On April 21, 1933, the debtor executed a deed of arrangement in favour of a trustee and his creditors, but such deed did not contain a trust for preferential payment of those persons who would be preferential creditors.

C By an award made in January, 1931, Samuel Harris, the creditor, an employee of the debtor, was certified to be suffering from silicosis, an industrial disease within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, and by reason of such award the creditor at the date of the execution of the deed of arrangement was in receipt of £1 3s. 10d. from the debtor as compensation under the Act.

On May 22, 1933, the trustee's solicitors wrote to the creditor's solicitors as follows:

D

> "Adverting to our conversation with you some little time ago. We have now heard from the trustee of the deed of assignment executed by Mr. Shenton and he instructs us that Harris's claim to compensation is being treated by him as a preferential claim, and that in accordance with the suggestion made at our interview with you Harris will be paid his present weekly compensation until some further arrangement is made between us."

E However, on June 7, 1934, the trustee's solicitors wrote to the creditor's solicitors that on the advice of their counsel they were not prepared to admit his claim to preferential treatment.

Eventually the creditor issued this summons, which asked (inter alia) whether he was entitled to preferential payment.

F The county court judge held in favour of the creditor, and ordered that the trustee should admit him as creditor under the deed and treat him as preferential creditor under the provisions of s. 17 of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, as if the estate of the debtor was being administered in bankruptcy.

Section 17 provides that:

G

> "if a trustee under a deed of arrangement pays to any creditor out of the debtor's property a larger sum in proportion to the creditor's claim than that paid to other creditors entitled to the benefit of the deed, then, unless the deed authorises him to do so, or unless such payments . . . are such as would be lawful in a bankruptcy, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

Section 3 (1) of the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, provides that:

H

> "for the purposes of the . . . Trustee Act, 1925, . . . the expression 'trust corporation' includes . . . in relation to . . . property subject to a deed of arrangement . . . the trustee under the deed."

The trustee appealed.

Allan Walmsley for the trustee.

J. Leonard Stone for the creditor.

I CLAUSON, J.—Under the deed of arrangement the trustee primâ facie would be committing a breach of trust if he recognised a preferential creditor as being preferential and paid him in priority over other creditors; he would be committing a breach of trust so far as the deed was concerned, because there is no provision in the deed which enables him to do that. I mention, though I do not think it is strictly relevant to this matter, that there is a provision in s. 17 of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914, which provides that a trustee who makes a payment which would be justified in bankruptcy is not committing a misdemeanour, whereas trustees who make certain other payments not authorised by the deed may be guilty of a misdemeanour. That does not throw light in itself upon what would or would not be a breach of trust, and it must be taken that, on the terms of this deed, and it is on this footing that I give this judgment, to pay a preferential creditor by way of preference would be a breach of trust. [His Lordship dealt with facts, and continued:] On the construction of the letter of May 22, 1933, in the circumstances which have arisen, I am of opinion that there was an agreement between the trustee and the workman that, on the terms that the workman assented to the deed, he was to be treated as a preferential creditor in respect of his claim under the award, on precisely the same footing as if the affairs of the debtor were in bankruptcy. If I am right in treating that as the true construction of the letter, then, in my view, that arrangement is an arrangement which is binding upon the trustee and upon the creditors, because, although it is not expressly justified by the terms of the deed, it is justified by the addition to the deed which is in effect made by s. 15 of the Trustee Act, 1925. For the purposes of that section the trustee of a deed of arrangement is by virtue of s. 3 (1) of the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, to be treated as a trust corporation: and accordingly the effect of s. 15 of the Act of 1925 is that he may, if and as he thinks fit

> (f) "compromise, compound, abandon, submit to arbitration, or otherwise settle any debt, account, claim, or thing whatever relating to the . . . trust; and for any of those purposes may enter into, give, execute, and do such agreements, instruments of composition or arrangement, releases, and other things as to him or them seem expedient, without being responsible for any loss occasioned by any act or thing so done by him or them in good faith."

On the construction which I give to that letter the arrangement which was made between the trustee and the workman amounted, in my opinion, to an arrangement which was justified by sub-cl. (f). If that be so, to carry out that arrangement is no breach of trust and the trustee is now bound to carry it out, and, accordingly, to treat the workman as a preferential creditor.

The way in which the matter comes before us is this: that arrangement having been made, at some later date the trustee was advised, or it may be that some of the creditors took the view, that it was an arrangement which ought not to be carried out, and that the workman ought to be relegated to the position of an ordinary creditor without any preference. With a view to bringing the matter to an issue, which was quite a proper and reasonable thing to do, the trustee took out a summons under the Deeds of Arrangement Act before the proper court asking for the determination of the following question, namely, whether the workman

> "is a creditor entitled to the benefit of the trusts and provisions of the said deed of assignment and if so whether he is entitled to any preferential payment."

The county court judge ordered:

> "that the trustee do admit the said Samuel Harris as a creditor under the deed and treat him as a preferential creditor pursuant to s. 17 of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1914."

We have not the advantage of having the reasons of the county court judge in detail; but, as that order stands, it appears to me not to be correct in form, because it is not by virtue of s. 17 that this workman must be treated as a preferential creditor. Section 17 merely protects the trustee from criminal liability if he deals with the matter in such a way as it might be dealt with in bankruptcy. That has no effect on the civil rights of the parties. In my view the right order is to declare that, in the events which have happened, the trustee is bound to treat the workman as a preferential creditor as though the estate were being administered in bankruptcy. Accordingly, in my view, the learned county court judge's judgment ought to be varied in form to that extent, but the result is in substance the same.

FARWELL, J.—I agree. If the arrangement which was made between the trustee and the creditor be a binding arrangement, it is not one which can be justified under the deed itself. However, it appears that by virtue of the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, s. 3, s. 15 of the Trustee Act, 1925, applies to a trustee under a deed of this

A kind. That being so, such a trustee has the powers which are given by s. 15 including a power to:

B In this case there was a claim by a creditor who had not assented to the deed that he was entitled to be paid by the debtor, and it may be that, failing payment or agreement, he had remedies against the debtor which he could have enforced. Under those circumstances the creditor's solicitor approached the trustee, and, as a result of conversations, the trustee's solicitor wrote to the creditor's solicitor the letter of May 22, 1932. In my judgment that letter clearly indicates that an arrangement had been come to between
C the trustee and the creditor as to the creditor's position. It is plain on that letter that the creditor assented to the deed. It would have been impossible after the creditor had received that letter and had been paid the weekly sums thereby agreed, for him to have attacked the deed in any shape or form; he would have been bound by it. If that be so, if he be bound by it, equally, in my judgment, the trustee has bound himself, as he was entitled to do under s. 15 of the Trustee Act, to treat the creditor as a pre-
D ferential creditor. That agreement was one for which there was ample consideration on both sides. It is an agreement which is binding on the trustee, and one which the trustee could properly enter into having regard to the provisions of s. 15. Under those circumstances the trustee is bound to give effect to the agreement which he has made.

Appeal dismissed; order varied.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Charles, J.), December 10, 1935]

[Reported 154 L.T. 103]

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Building operations on adjoining part of premises—Derogation from grant—Nuisance—Building operations—Dust and noise—Trespass—Second floor of building let for music
H lessons—Structural alterations to first floor causing noise and lessening of support.

The tenant under a lease of the second floor of a building had entered into the lease, as the landlords knew, for the purpose of carrying on on the demised premises his profession of a teacher of singing. The lease contained a covenant for quiet enjoyment.

After the tenant had gone into possession of the premises and had begun to carry
I on his profession there, the landlords granted a lease of the first floor of the building to E. That lease contained a term authorising E. to execute structural alterations to the first floor by cutting away walls so as to convert several small rooms into one large one.

Shortly after taking possession, E. began to execute the alterations, employing builders to do the work. The work was properly, carefully and considerately executed by the builders, but it continued for three months, during which period the noise caused by it was so great that the tenant was unable to carry on his professional work. Moreover, his premises were physically interfered with, since a wall supporting his floor was cut away, together with the ceiling and plaster above it, so that there was no support for the floor boards, and gaps appeared between them, whereby the noise caused by the building operations was rendered more audible.

Held: (i) temporary disturbance caused by reasonably carrying out the work of re-construction did not amount to a trespass or a nuisance, and the tenant therefore had no cause of action against E. or against the builders (reversed on appeal, [1936] 2 All E.R. 633). Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co. (1), [1891] 2 Ch. 409, followed; (ii) the noise created by the building operations, combined with the physical interference with the premises, was a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment (Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-on-Tweed (2) (1884), 13 Q.B.D. 547, applied), and was also a derogation by the lessors from their grant, (Lyttelton Times Co., Ltd. v. Warner's, Ltd. (3), [1907] A.C. 476, and O'Cedar, Ltd. v. The Slough Trading Co., Ltd. (4), [1927] 2 K.B. 123, applied) for both of which the tenant was entitled to recover damages from the landlords.

Notes. This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, [1936] 2 All E.R. 633, as regards the judgment against the landlords on the ground that their consent to the alterations was expressly conditional on the first floor tenants obtaining the tenant's consent, and that, as the first floor tenants did not obtain this consent, the alterations were made unlawfully and without the landlords' consent and so were neither a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment nor a derogation from grant. The Court of Appeal refrained from affirming or disapproving the view of Charles, J., that the alterations could amount to such a breach and such derogation. The Court of Appeal also reversed the decision in favour of the first floor tenants on the ground that the work done by its very nature involved a risk of damage to the tenant, and that the first floor tenants were, therefore, liable to the tenant in nuisance.

Action for damages for trespass and nuisance, and for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment, and for loss sustained through derogation by lessors from their grant. The facts are summarised in the headnote and are fully set out in the judgment.

Trevor Hunter, K.C., and Clement Edwards for the tenant.

P. B. Morle and R. Knight for the landlords.

L. W. Morris, K.C., and S. K. de Ferrars for the first floor tenants.

Stable, K.C., and Melford Stevenson for the builders.

CHARLES, J.—In this case the tenant, Francesco Matania, brings an action against the landlords, the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., the first floor tenants, the Elevenist Syndicate, Ltd., and the builders, T. H. Adamson & Sons, for damages which he sets out under three heads. He says firstly that there has been by the landlords a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment, and, further, that the landlords derogated from the lease which they granted to him of certain premises to which I will hereafter refer. Against all the defendants he asks for damages for trespass and damages for nuisance. The case has some rather exceptional points in it, which makes it all the more insistent for me to follow out the direction, which has been given in more than one case, that the surrounding circumstances of each case should be closely examined in order that the tribunal may attain, in a legal way, to the best justice that can be given to the litigant.

The facts are that the tenant is a professor of singing, and that at places other than the present premises he had given lessons to various pupils in the art of singing. He desired in 1933 to obtain premises which would be more commodious for the purposes, not only of singing, but of holding concerts and carrying on, if he could, an operatic society, the members of which would have the advantage of his teaching and coaching. So it was that he came into touch with the landlords, who had premises, the ground floor of which they themselves occupied, at 25, Nutford-place. He saw the second floor of those premises, which then, as I gather, consisted of three or four rooms with partitions between them, which the landlords, on his behalf for the specific purpose of his carrying on the musical arts that I have indicated, expressed themselves as willing to remove, so that the whole of the second floor, saving only a piece reserved as a bedroom for the tenant, should be thrown into one large room in which he could teach his pupils, hold his concerts with an audience of something like a hundred and above, and there also hold, if he desired, his operatic society. All these matters were well known to the landlords, and they, with that knowledge, did on May 25, 1933, enter into a lease with the tenant whereby those premises were leased to him under certain terms.

That lease contained two matters which are of importance for me to observe. One is that in cl. 1 (e) the tenant enters into the following covenant, that he will > "permit the lessors or their surveyors agents workmen and others authorised by them respectively at all times and upon due notice during the said term to enter into and upon the hereby demised premises for the purpose of executing and carrying out structural and other works and repairs to the said demised premises or any adjoining premises."

In the same document there is in cl. 4, sub-para. (b), a somewhat wide covenant for quiet enjoyment, and that is in these terms:

> "That the lessee paying the rent hereby reserved and performing and observing the several covenants conditions and agreements herein contained and on his part to be performed and observed may (subject to the reservations covenants and provisions herein contained) quietly enjoy the said premises during the said term without any lawful interruption or disturbance from or by the lessors their heirs executors administrators or assigns or any person or persons claiming under or in trust for them."

The alterations to which I have already referred were carried out upon that second floor, which was then turned into one large room and a bedroom, and the tenant entered into possession of those premises on Aug. 25, 1933, and there he began to carry on his work. He obtained a certain number of pupils, some of whom had come on with him from his last studio, and others who had joined with those already there and were desirous of taking singing lessons from him. The premises were much more commodious than his last premises, and seem to have attracted certainly one or two pupils who might not have cared to be taught, all things being equal, in a more restricted space.

All went well—the tenant had got some pupils—until the early part of 1934, and then the Elevenist Syndicate, Ltd., now the first floor tenants, who, I gather, are a limited company carrying out the business arrangements of the Elevenist Branch of the Christian Science Church, came along and said that they wanted a reading room and were minded to take the first floor under the tenant for that purpose. That floor was split up into a great many small rooms, and it is material that, when granting a lease to the first floor tenants, as the landlords did upon March 23, 1934, the landlords were well aware of what was going to happen—well aware, if they were people of sense at all, what would be the effect upon the tenant on the floor above. They were also aware that it was their duty, and not the duty of the first floor tenants, before they could establish that as a firm and sound lease, to get the consent of the head landlords, the proprietors of the Portman Estate. In the lease which the landlords granted upon March 23, 1934, to the first floor tenants, there is this clause, para. (c), in cl. 1:

> "At their own expense and during the said term to execute in a proper and workmanlike manner and"

and these words seem to me, having regard to the authorities, to be of great importance > "to the satisfaction of the lessors or their surveyor the alterations and works set out in and in accordance with plans and specifications"—again these words are important—"approved in writing by the lessors with such modifications as may be approved by the lessors."

The landlords had, during the negotiations, communicated with the first floor tenant, and said upon July 13, 1933—the negotiations went on for some time—as to the alterations:

> "Any alterations proposed by the tenants must be submitted to us for approval by [our] architect, and we would mention"—that is all—"that such alterations will require the approval of our head lessor," which it was their duty to obtain. On Sept. 25, 1933, the landlords again communicated with the first floor tenants, and, after some criticisms, which were the result of further advices by their own, the landlords' architect, they say: "Apart from the above matters, subject to the consent of the Portman Estate, the proposed alterations appear to be in order."

So there we have this position: the landlords have let to the tenant for a special purpose, of which they were fully apprised, and which had caused them to alter their premises, in order to satisfy it. As between the tenant and the first floor tenants the fact that no consent to the alterations was ever obtained from the tenant, as was required by a term of the Portman Estate licence, is really not of importance. I had evidence given to me by an officer of the first floor tenants, who said that it never occurred to him that he should get the consent of the tenant. Whether it occurred to him or whether it did not, the landlords never did, and nobody did. That being the position, on March 26, three days after the signing of that agreement between the landlords and the first floor tenants, work commenced and work went on until July 4, when it was completed. The tenant, whose consent had not been asked, very quickly found that that result of these alterations, to which I will refer hereafter, was that it made it absolutely impossible for him to carry on his music lessons, or, indeed, to carry on sensible conversation in that room at all, because of the extravagant, though perhaps unavoidable, noise that these operations at once began to show would appear during the continuance of those alterations. On March 30, that is only four days after, he writes a very clear letter, an extremely reasonable letter, saying he will do all he can when they get into the reading room to avoid the sound of his music school coming down to the reading room to their disturbance, and saying he will put insulators under his piano and carpets down if they thought it desirable. His action seems to have been very reasonable in the matter. But he says this:

> "The builders started on Monday, the 26th inst., and although I appreciate the care on the part of the foreman in conducting the work downstairs, I am compelled to tell you that since Monday it has been quite impossible for me to carry on my work. The unavoidable hammering for the demolition, and especially for the preparation and installation of the girders, which are directly underneath my studio, and the consequent shaking and noise, make it utterly impossible for me to give lessons, although I have made every effort to do so. The work starts at 8 a.m. and finishes at 5 p.m., and from 5–6.30 (when I must leave for evening school) leaves me, as you will appreciate, far too short a space of time within which to give all my lessons. I understand that this state of affairs is necessarily to continue for some time, and I can only, therefore, leave it to your committee, with whom I would like an interview on the matter, to see that some friendly arrangement be reached in order to reduce my loss."

It was a very great pity, inasmuch as the loss to the tenant was so plain and so undoubted, that these parties did not do that which, at that stage, they might have done for a comparatively few pounds, as I will indicate, namely, get rid of the trouble that endured until July 4.

Evidence has been given in extenso as to what happened in that room below the tenant. I am only going to refer to some matters because upon the evidence I find as a fact, that there was physical interference with the tenant's tenement. There was a thickish wall which formed partly the support upon which the tenant's room rested. That was knocked down, with all the inevitable noise, dirt, dust, and confusion that such an operation must entail, and in its place a girder was put up. That was in order to free the room of the hampering presence of the wall. In order to put the girder up, the ceiling which was below the tenant's room was, to a large extent, cut away, and the plaster taken off and the floorboards of the tenant's room exposed from the lower side, with the result that from the upper side—this is where physical interference comes in—where heretofore he had a floor supported by a wall with the covering of the cement that was removed, now, as he put it somewhat dramatically, and as is confirmed by the workmen, he was standing on a grid instead of a floor. The workmen who gave evidence on behalf of the builders said that the spaces between the boards—for it was an old house—were something like ⅜ in. wide, so that the tenant's description is not altogether inapt. The alterations were extensive, and not only inevitably produced noise, alteration of the support, and exposure of the floorboards so that the spaces were open from the tenant's room down into the room below, but the results were inevitable, as the landlords knew, because their architect had gone into the plans, approved them and criticised them. The landlords knew that that which happened in fact would happen. The extent of the noise and the dust, in my judgment, have been in no way exaggerated. The condition of the stairs has been exaggerated, for it is said that the mortar, which had to be employed during the carrying out of these alterations, was mixed at the side of the entrance hall, and that a heap of sand, which was designed for the mixing of the mortar, was put down just outside the entrance door, and so a good deal of inconvenience and dirt was inevitably, I find, caused in that hall, and also upon the stairway. That hall was the only entrance that the tenant had for his second floor, which had been let to him by the landlords. I say that the matter has been exaggerated because some people have said that the mess made the hall practically impassable; others have said that they trod freely through the entrance hall without getting their shoes dirty. Witnesses, both male and female, asserted that really the mixing of the mortar was more to the side, and that if you took a little reasonable care you could get past without disaster and so up the stairs into the tenant's room. Some point was made about getting to the top of the stairs, because as the stairs were being altered a temporary stairway or passover had to be made. I think there is nothing in that at all because the stairs were altered for the tenant's benefit, and he knew it, and the stairs, as altered, made a greatly improved manner of access to his room on the second floor.

Although the noise and the dirt and the dust resulting from these alterations was very great, so great I am quite satisfied as to make the second floor uninhabitable because you could not carry on a conversation with comfort there, much less give

A music lessons—I am unable to see that anything in the carrying out of these operations was carried out by the builders, on behalf of the first floor tenants, other than in a proper and reasonable way, avoiding unnecessary noise, unnecessary dirt, and unnecessary dust. Having said that, however, I am left with the conclusion of fact that the noise was intolerable, that the dust was intolerable, and that to a certain extent, the dirt was an inconvenience, but not intolerable.

B What, then, is the legal position upon those facts? I am satisfied that no nuisance has been committed. I consider myself to be bound by a case so often approved (Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co. (1)). In the judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., I find this ([1891] 2 Ch. at p. 413):

> C "It frequently happens that the owners or occupiers of land cause, in the execution of lawful works in the ordinary user of land, a considerable amount of temporary annoyance to their neighbours; but they are not necessarily on that account held to be guilty of causing an unlawful nuisance. The business of life could not be carried on if it were so. For instance, a man who pulls down his house for the purpose of building a new one no doubt causes considerable inconvenience to his next door neighbours during the process of demolition; but he is not responsible as for a D nuisance if he uses all reasonable skill and care to avoid annoyance to his neighbour by the works of demolition. Nor is he liable to an action, even though the noise and dust and the consequent annoyance be such as would constitute a nuisance if the same, instead of being created for the purpose of the demolition of the house, had been created in sheer wantonness, or in the execution of works for a purpose involving a permanent continuance of the noise and dust. For the law, in judging E what constitutes a nuisance, does take into consideration both the object and duration of that which is said to constitute the nuisance."

That case has been quoted and approved many times, and it is only a reiteration of the old cases such as Bamford v. Turnley (5), where BRAMWELL, B., says (3 B. & S. at p. 83):

> "It seems to me that that principle may be deduced from the character of these cases, and is this, namely, that those acts necessary for the common and ordinary F use and occupation of land and houses may be done, if conveniently done, without subjecting those who do them to an action."

So far as one can judge upon the evidence, these troublesome matters were conveniently done; I think that really means done with reasonable care. I come to that conclusion with some hesitation for this reason: one has to judge when something that is temporary passes from a proper connotation of the word "temporary" into G something more. Although, in the cases quoted to me, generally I find the temporary character to be something like a month, I find here that the trouble went on from March 26 to July 4, and therefore, having regard to the facts of this case, I come to that conclusion with some hesitancy because of the very length of time for which this intolerable inconvenience was imposed upon the tenant and because of the damage which it caused him. However, I think, having re-read the cases which govern the matter, H that I should not be justified in finding that the execution of these works, properly, carefully, and considerately executed, amounted to a nuisance.

Does that mean that the tenant must fail against all the defendants? He fails against all defendants in matters of trespass and nuisance, but, for reasons which I will now shortly develop, I do not consider that he fails against the landlords, either on the head of a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment or upon the head of derogation from I the rights conferred by them upon him in the lease of May 25, 1933. There must be an interference in order that there may be a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment; there must be an interference; some judges have used the words "physical enjoyment," and others the words "physical interference"—there must be something that is tangible. Noise, it has been held, is not tangible, but once you get the breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment involving something that is physical, the plaintiff can recover against persons who so commit such a breach, either for the breach of the covenant if there be some physical interference, or for derogation from the grant given by the lease if the facts justify the court in finding such derogation. I have indicated that the operation of these works not only produced intolerable noise and dust, but actually interfered with the floor of the tenant's room—I repeat his words, for I cannot improve upon them—causing him to stand, not on a sound floor, but on a grid. The effect of that physical interference was twofold; the noise, of course, was greater, and the dust found more or less free access into his room. The noise that came from the hammering and putting up of the girder, the knocking down of the wall, and the dust that resulted from those operations, were all the more evident to the tenant in that room than they would have been if he had not had the protection taken away from his floor by those operations, so as to expose the floor with its three-eighths of an inch, and sometimes more, spaces between the floorboards. The landlords' architect passed all the plans, having criticised them—and indeed his approval was necessary—so the landlords knew exactly what was going to be done in that room. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that there was in this case a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment which I have read, and which is not a very narrow one.

Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-on-Tweed (2), where the court consisted of Brett, M.R., Bowen, L.J., and Fry, L.J. I find this passage (13 Q.B.D. at p. 551) in the course of the judgment of the court, which was delivered by Fry, L.J.:

> "But it appears to us to be in every case a question of fact whether the quiet enjoyment of the land has or has not been interrupted; and where the ordinary and lawful enjoyment of the demised land is substantially interfered with by the acts of the lessor, or those lawfully claiming under him, the covenant appears to us to be broken, although neither the title to the land nor the possession of the land may be otherwise affected."

It had been contended on Dennett v. Atherton (6) that there was previously an idea, which this very distinguished court found to be a much too narrow idea, that a covenant for quiet enjoyment only affects title and possession. That case has been considered, and there is nothing in any succeeding case that I can find, certainly not in any case of superior authority—that was the Court of Appeal—which limits or alters the true effect of those words. Indeed, it is a matter to a certain extent, of the amount of interference. That is why there is that insistence in the cases that a judge ought to regard closely the facts and circumstances of each case. The comment which is made by Kekewich, J., in Jenkins v. Jackson (7) (40 Ch.D. at p. 74), upon Sanderson's Case, is this:

> "In that case there was water and drainage actually coming into the field demised, and making it, to use the words of the Lord Chief Baron, uninhabitable, that is to say, interrupting the actual physical enjoyment."

That is the words of the Lord Chief Baron referring to the case of Shaw v. Stenton (8), the doctrine of which is the doctrine which, in the later case of Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-on-Tweed (2), is enunciated by Fry, L.J. It does not seem to me that you can distinguish between water being drained on to land which may be drained off somewhere else and the present case; the drainage of the land may be diverted and the water taken away, leaving the land as it was, and the water as it was, and so introducing a temporary aspect into the matter.

The alterations in the present case continued from March to July, and during that time, or closely towards the end of that time—because, of course, the noise lessened as the work became more completed—the premises were rendered uninhabitable and the physical enjoyment of those premises was completely destroyed. I find that under these circumstances the landlords have been guilty of a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment.

Now, what am I to say about derogation? Counsel for the landlords prays in aid strongly that clause to which I earlier referred, which says that the lessor shall have the right to enter upon the premises to do structural repairs. It is to be remembered, however, that the landlords, who entered into that agreement with the tenant, were people who knew for what purpose that room was to be used, and I cannot help thinking that what the parties envisaged, if they envisaged anything structural, was something less than the structural alterations which took place here, and which lasted for months.

It was quite impossible to make that agree with the covenant for quiet enjoyment; it was quite impossible to my mind to execute those alterations in the circumstances without a derogation from the grant that was made to the tenant.

The cases which deal with this matter are very numerous, and I have been referred to a considerable number. The first to which I wish to refer is Lyttelton Times Co., Ltd. v. Warners, Ltd. (3).

LORD LOREBURN, the Lord Chancellor, says ([1907] A.C. at p. 481):

> "At the root of the difficulties in the case as presented to their Lordships in argument lies this question: ought the fact that one of the parties was the grantor, and the other the grantee of a lease to dominate the decision of the case? The maxim that a grantor cannot derogate from his grant expresses the duty ordinarily laid on a man who sells or leases land. But it does not touch a similar and equally binding duty that may in certain cases be laid on a man who buys or hires land. If A. lets a plot to B., he may not act so as to frustrate the purpose for which in the contemplation of both parties the land was hired. So also if B. takes a plot from A. he may not act so as to frustrate the purpose for which, in the contemplation of both parties, the adjoining plot remaining in A.'s hands was destined. The fact that one lets and the other hires does not create any presumption in favour of either in construing an expressed contract. Nor ought it to create a presumption in construing the implied obligations arising out of a contract. When it is a question of what shall be implied from the contract, it is proper to ascertain what in fact was the purpose, or what were the purposes, to which both intended the land to be put, and, having found that, both should be held to all that was implied in this common intention. . . . One cannot bisect the intention and enforce one half of it when the effect of so doing would be to frustrate the other half."

I have already commented on the view which the parties took as to structural alteration. It is inconceivable to me that the landlords should have deliberately made all these alterations to that second floor for the specific purpose of the somewhat delicate operation of teaching music, and at the same time intended, and believed, that their lessee intended that structural alterations such as I find in this case—extensive demolishing and re-building—should take place in such a way, to his prejudice, that it would for some months be absolutely and utterly impossible for him to use those premises for the purpose required, or even for the ordinary purposes of habitation. Whether it is necessary to refer to many other cases I doubt, for the principles are well established, but a case was quoted to me this morning of O'Cedar, Ltd. v. The Slough Trading Co., Ltd. (4). That is a decision of BRANSON, J., and he says this ([1927] 2 K.B. at p. 127):

> "It, therefore, becomes material to consider whether the principle that a lessor may not derogate from his grant extends beyond cases in which the purpose of the grant is frustrated to cases in which the purpose can still be achieved albeit at a greater expense or with less convenience. That it does not extend to prevent any interference at all with the enjoyment of the property demised is beyond doubt. This appears from Robinson v. Kilvert (9), and Browne v. Flower (10). There must be a substantial interference with the use of the premises for the purposes for which they were demised. I was invited by Mr. Archer to hold that mere interference, although it may be substantial, is not enough, but that the principle applies only in cases in which what has been done frustrates the purpose for which the premises were demised to the lessee. This appears to me to be contrary to the decision of STIRLING, J., in Aldin v. Latimer Clark, Muirhead & Co. (11), where a substantial interference with the purpose for which the premises had been demised was held to entitle the lessee to damages, although it was not suggested that that purpose had been frustrated. Aldin v. Latimer Clark, Muirhead & Co. (11) and Browne v. Flower (10) were treated by the Court of Appeal in Harmer v. Jumbil (Nigeria) Tin Areas, Ltd. (12) as stating the principle correctly. I see no reason in logic or fairness for limiting the application of the principle to cases in which there has been a complete frustration of the purpose for which the premises were demised."

In the case now before me there was for a period which, as I have indicated, it is difficult to regard fairly as temporary under the circumstances, a complete frustration for at least three months, and I come to the conclusion that upon that head the tenant is entitled to damages.

Now, I consider the question of damages. I have to say at once and without hesitation that the damages are grossly exaggerated. When they came to be tested in court it was made perfectly clear not only that the number of Mr. Matania's pupils were limited, but that some, at any rate, would have been willing to follow him to the Wigmore Hall. On April 6, 1934, that is to say, one week after he wrote that letter saying that it was quite impossible for him to do anything at all in the way of teaching, he ascertained from the Wigmore Hall that for £30 he could get a studio with light and heating, the occupancy of which for that sum he could enjoy from April 16 till July 21, a period which would cover the essential period here. Indeed, the tenant, with great freedom and great clarity, said: if only the landlords would have paid the £30. I would have taken it at once without any hesitation and gone to the Wigmore Studios and carried on my business, but so well as I could. There is March 26 until April 16 when he has no pupils. During that time people go away. I think there is evidence that people get tired of acquiring the arts of singing from the tenant and do not come back. Some people who had gone to the tenant apparently have gone into the provinces and so possibly would not, and probably could not, come back to him. It is displayed to me by his general account that when he makes a move there is a temporary, but inevitable, reduction of his earnings. That was seen when he moved from his last studio to the present studio, concerning which this present litigation is being carried on. However, his claim that he should have £400 odd is, to my mind, out of all reason. I have to do justice between all the parties as well as I can, and I give judgment for the tenant against the landlords for £150.

I give judgment in favour of the first floor tenants and of the builders. Without any sort of application I have no hesitation in saying that both those parties were properly joined, and I must make an order that such costs as the tenant has to pay to the first floor tenants and to the builders must be added to the costs which will be paid by the landlords to the tenant in the matter. There will be judgment for £150, and costs accordingly, accompanied by that which is commonly called a Bullock order.

Where the trustee under a deed of arrangement has discharged all the debts, and has a surplus in his hands, the creditors are not entitled, without an express or implied provision in the deed to that effect, to interest on their debts.

Bankruptcy Motion, by a trustee under a deed of arrangement for the direction of the court.

The motion which raised the question whether creditors are entitled to interest on their debts when a surplus remains in the hands of a trustee under a deed of arrangement after he has discharged all the debts of a deceased debtor, came before the registrar and was adjourned to the judge with the consent of all parties.

The facts appear from the judgment.

Oscar Kean for the trustee.

Gavin Simonds, K.C., and P. J. Sykes for the legal personal representatives of the debtor.

C. Duveen for the creditors.

FARWELL, J.—This is a motion by a trustee under a deed of arrangement, dated July 18, 1910, for the direction of the court whether he is entitled to pay to the creditors interest on their debts, and if so at what rate, out of the money in his hands before paying the surplus to the legal personal representatives of the debtor.

The motion in the first instance came before MR. REGISTRAR MELLOR, but with the consent of all parties has been adjourned to me. The debtor by the deed in question assigned to the trustee the whole, or practically the whole, of his property upon the trusts therein contained. He died on Jan. 4, 1928. All the debts have been paid in full, and there is, or will be, a substantial surplus in the hands of the trustee. The representatives of the debtor claim that, subject to the payment of any costs, charges and expenses of the trustee still unpaid, they are entitled to such surplus, while the creditors claim that they are entitled to interest on their debts before there is any surplus for the debtor's representatives. Which of those contentions should prevail depends, in my judgment, wholly upon the true construction of the deed. Unless there is either express or implied some provision in the deed for payment of interest, no interest is payable.

By the deed the property is assigned to the trustee

> "upon trust to pay all rates, taxes, wages, and similar claims, if any, which would be payable in full or in priority in bankruptcy, and subject as aforesaid upon trust thereout to pay and discharge rateably according to the laws of bankruptcy and in such preference or priority and by such dividends as the trustee shall think fit the debts due to the creditors, and to pay the surplus if any to the debtor his executors administrators and assigns."

It is said on behalf of the creditors that under that provision interest is payable by virtue of s. 33 (8) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. That subsection provides that:

> "If there is any surplus after payment of the foregoing debts, it shall be applied in

A payment of interest from the date of the receiving order at the rate of four pounds per centum per annum on all debts proved in the bankruptcy."

Section 69 provides for the payment of any surplus to the bankrupt.

It is said that some meaning must be given to the words in the deed "according to the laws of bankruptcy," and that unless these words have the effect of importing that subsection into the deed, they are mere surplusage. I cannot accept that contention. B In my judgment, as a matter of construction, it is reasonably plain that these words relate and relate only to the preceding word "rateably" and do not import any provision as to payment of interest. In my view, the words referred to were inserted in the deed to emphasise the direction that the payment of debts was to be made rateably, and are not apt to provide for payment of interest or to import into the deed any provisions other than those necessary to ensure a rateable distribution. If it had been intended C to provide for payment of interest it would have been easy to so provide in express terms, and in the absence of any such provision there is no justification for reading into the deed an agreement by the debtor to pay interest on the debts. In my judgment, therefore, after payment in full of the debts and costs, the debtor's legal personal representatives are entitled to the balance of the moneys in the hands of the trustee, and I will declare accordingly.

D The costs of all parties of this motion must be taxed as between solicitor and client and retained and paid by the trustee out of the moneys in his hands.

G Settlement—Voluntary settlement—Settlement of expected share under father's will—Trustees empowered to receive share from father's executors—Receipt accordingly—Right of settlor to call for transfer of share.

In 1868 a settlor made a voluntary settlement of any property to which she might become entitled on the death of her father, and she gave the trustees power to give receipts for the same or any part thereof in her name. Her father died in 1869 H and his executors transferred the settlor's share under her father's will to the trustees of the settlement. In 1935 the settlor requested the trustees to transfer to her as her absolute property the funds which her father's executors had transferred to them.

Held: the settlor was not entitled to call for the transfer because (i) the trustees had received the settlor's share under a valid and effective authority from the I settlor; (ii) immediately after such receipt by the trustees the settlor's share became impressed with the trusts declared in the voluntary settlement, and was now held by the trustees on those trusts.

Adjourned Summons by trustees for the directions of the court. The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of BENNETT, J.: This is a summons in the matter of a settlement dated July 9, 1868, made by the defendant, Miss Catherine Henrietta Bowden, and the plaintiffs ask the court whether they, being the trustees of this settlement, ought to transfer to the settlor as her absolute property investments and cash now held by them representing the funds subject to the settlement.

The settlement was made at the time when the settlor was proposing to become a member of a religious order or community of nuns of the Roman Catholic Church established at Stone in the county of Stafford.

By the settlement she assigned to the trustees the interest in remainder vested in her under her parents' marriage settlement and also an expectation or expectations which so far as material are described in the settlement as all the share and interest "to which upon the decease of the said Henry Bowden [the settlor's father] in her lifetime she may become entitled under and by virtue of his will or any codicil thereto or as one of his next of kin or otherwise from or under the said Henry Bowden."

As regards the second subject which the settlor purported to assign she had only a spes successionis and no property capable of assignment by law; but in addition to purporting to assign her expectation under her father's will or intestacy she appointed the trustees of the settlement her agents to receive her share of whatever might come to her under her father's will. She appointed them her attorneys to receive any property which might become hers. To such an appointment no objection can be taken or is taken. It is plain, I think, that it operated to appoint the two trustees the settlor's agents, to receive anything to which she might become entitled under her father's will or under his intestacy. Then the settlement proceeds to declare the trusts of anything which the agents might receive from the settlor's father as her agents and to provide that it is to be held on trusts not material for the decision of the present question.

The settlor's father died on Nov. 18, 1869, the settlor not having revoked the power of attorney or authority given to the trustees of the settlement to receive the interest to which she might become entitled under her father's will or on his intestacy; and in due course of time these trustees as the settlor's agents received from the executors of the will substantial sums, and from the time when they were received those sums have been held by the original and subsequent trustees on the trusts of the voluntary settlement.

In the year 1935 it seems to have occurred to the settlor that she might not have settled what came to her, so on Jan. 23, 1935, she addressed a communication in writing to the trustees requesting them to transfer to her as her absolute property the cash representing the fund. She states that to the best of her knowledge she never authorised the transfer of any such property to the trustees of that settlement. Those are the facts which give rise to the question raised by the summons.

R. W. Goff for the settlor.

J. H. Stamp for the Attorney-General.

P. M. Walters and R. C. H. Horne (Roger Turnbull with them) for other parties interested.

BENNETT, J.—[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] Counsel for the settlor submitted that the question should be answered in the affirmative and that the property the subject of the trusts of the settlement should be transferred to her. He based his argument on the authority of Meek v. Kettlewell (1) and Re Ellenborough (2), and contended that the settlement, being a voluntary settlement, was void and altogether unenforceable. Neither of these authorities supports either of his propositions. All that was decided in Meek v. Kettlewell (1) was that where the assistance of the court of equity is needed to enable the trustees of a voluntary settlement to obtain possession

A of property subjected to the trusts of the voluntary settlement, the property not having been vested in the trustees, a court of equity will render no assistance to the plaintiff.

But here nobody is seeking the assistance of the court of equity to enforce the voluntary settlement. Under a valid authority, unrevoked, the persons appointed trustees under the settlement received the settlor's interest under her father's will, and, immediately after it had been received by them, as a result of her own act and her own B declaration, contained in the voluntary settlement, it became impressed with the trusts contained in the settlement.

No assistance is required from a court of equity to put the property into the hands of the trustees.

I can find no ground which enables me to decide that the trustees of this settlement must, after sixty years, hand over the property to the settlor. I therefore answer the C question in the negative.

Work and Labour—Contract—Commission to paint portrait—Not contract for sale of goods.

F The defendant commissioned an artist to paint a three-quarter length portrait of a lady for the sum of 250 guineas, and the artist accepted the commission. The defendant repudiated the contract, and, on the artist suing him for its breach, pleaded s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

Held: the plaintiff was entitled to succeed because as the contract in substance was for the exercise of skill, and as materials would have passed from the G plaintiff to the defendant only as incidental to that skill, the contract was not a contract for the sale of goods, but one for work and labour and materials supplied, and, therefore, s. 4 did not apply.

Notes. Section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act was repealed by the Law Reform (Enforcement of Contracts) Act, 1954, s. 2, but the distinction between a sale of goods and a I contract for work labour and materials supplied remains of importance in determining such questions as, for example, the time when the property passes.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of ACTON, J., in favour of the defendant on the ground that the contract relied on was unenforceable by virtue of s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

C The plaintiff was a painter of portraits; the defendant was a film producer. On July 27, 1932, the plaintiff was introduced to the defendant at a party given by a friend. The defendant asked the plaintiff his fee for painting a three-quarter length portrait of Miss Finnegan, his fiancée, whom the defendant subsequently married, and the plaintiff said 300 guineas. The defendant said that this was more than he was willing to pay, and after some conversation the parties agreed orally that the plaintiff should paint such a portrait of Miss Finnegan for 250 guineas, one half of the fee to be paid in advance, the work to commence forthwith as the defendant was getting married in September. D Miss Finnegan came to the studio on the next day, when the plaintiff made rough crayon studies for the portrait, and he purchased the canvas and other materials for painting the portrait. On July 30 the plaintiff, the defendant not having communicated with him or sent the 125 guineas, rang up the defendant and asked him if he was really in a position to pay for the portrait. The defendant replied that he was, but that it would be more convenient if he were to pay only 100 guineas down. E The plaintiff agreed to this, and the defendant promised to send on that amount without fail. On Aug. 2 the plaintiff wrote asking the defendant to call and see the studies he had made for the portrait, and asked him to let him have the cheque for 100 guineas on account: "I shall be grateful as you promised to let me have it last week, only I suppose it must have slipped your memory." There was no reply to this letter, but on Aug. 5, the plaintiff having spoken to the defendant on the telephone, the defendant wrote to him F a letter: "We are not entertaining any thought of having a portrait painted." On Aug. 8, 1932, the plaintiff wrote the defendant a letter setting out the facts as stated above and concluded by inviting the defendant to reiterate his instructions to proceed with the portrait: if he did not want the portrait painted the defendant was asked to forward the cheque for 250 guineas. To this letter there was no reply.

G The plaintiff sued for the agreed fee, £262 10s. or damages for breach of contract. By his defence the defendant denied the agreement alleged to have been made with the plaintiff, and pleaded:

> "if and in so far as may be necessary the defendant will rely upon the provisions of s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893."

H At the trial, ACTON, J., found the facts as stated above, but held that this was a contract for the sale of goods of the value of £10 and more, and that, as there was no note or memorandum of the contract in writing, it could not be enforced. ACTON, J., said that the rule had been laid down by BLACKBURN, J., in Lee v. Griffin (2) (4 L.T. at p. 547),

> I "if the contract be such that when carried out it would result in the sale of a chattel, the party cannot sue for work and labour; but if the result of the contract is that the party has done work and labour which ends in nothing that can become the subject of a sale, the party cannot sue for goods sold and delivered," and gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

The Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 4, provides:

> "(1) A contract for the sale of any goods of the value of ten pounds or upwards shall not be enforceable by action unless the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the > contract, or in part payment or unless some note or memorandum in writing of the contract be made and signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf. (2) The provisions of this section apply to every such contract, notwithstanding that the goods may be intended to be delivered at some future time, or may not at the time of such contract be actually made, procured or provided, or fit or ready for delivery, or some other act may be requisite for the making or completing thereof, or rendering the same fit for delivery. (3) There is an acceptance of goods within the meaning of this section when the buyer does any act in relation to the goods which recognises a pre-existing contract of sale whether there be an acceptance in performance of the contract or not. (4) The provisions of this section do not apply to Scotland."

Sylvain Mayer, K.C., and John Fennell for the plaintiff, the artist.
Sylvester Gates for the defendant, the buyer.

GREER, L.J.—This appeal raises an interesting question, which has been well argued and is not free from difficulty. There has not yet been any actual decision on the point involved, though there have been judicial dicta expressing opinions that vary. The question is this: whether, when a client (to use, for the moment, a neutral term) goes to an artist to have a portrait painted, whether it be his own portrait or that of another, and when the commission is accepted by the artist, they have made a bargain for the manufacture of future goods to be delivered when those goods come into existence under circumstances which make it a sale of goods within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and so within the terms of s. 4 of that Act which has now taken the place of s. 17 of the Statute of Frauds.

I propose to look at the question first apart from authority, because after all we are dealing with the meaning of the English language in this statute and its application to the particular facts of this case. I can imagine nothing which would more surprise a client who goes to a portrait-painter to have his portrait painted, or an eminent artist who accepts such a commission, than to be told that he, either the client or the artist, was making a bargain about the sale of goods. It is, of course, possible that a picture may be ordered under such circumstances as will make it an order for goods to be supplied in the future; but it does not follow that this is the inference to be drawn under all the circumstances as between the client or customer and the artist. Looking at the propositions involved from the point of view of interpreting the words in the English language, it seems to me that the painting of a portrait in these circumstances would not be deemed to be the purchase and sale of that which is produced by the artist. It would, on the contrary, be held to be an undertaking by the artist to exercise such skill as he possessed, in order to produce for reward a thing which would ultimately have to be accepted by the client. If that is so, the contract in this case was not a contract for the sale of goods within the meaning of s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

There are only two cases to which, I think, it is necessary to refer. The first is Clay v. Yates (1), which was concerned with the question whether a contract with a printer to print and deliver printed paper to the customer who desired to have it printed was or was not one for the sale of goods; and in the course of the argument MARTIN, B., said (1 H. & N. at p. 76):

> "Suppose an artist paints a portrait for 300 guineas, and supplies the canvas for it, which is worth 10s., surely he might recover under a count for work and labour."

I regard that as an expression of opinion, by a high authority on all questions of the common law, that under those circumstances there would not be any sale of goods but there would be a contract for work and labour. In the other judgments in that case the learned judges seem to me to agree with that view, because POLLOCK, C.B., uses these words (1 H. & N. at p. 78):

> "My impression is, that in the case of a work of art, whether in gold, silver, marble, or plaster, where the application of skill and labour is of the highest description, and the material is of no importance as compared with the labour, the price may be recovered as work, labour, and materials."

Alderson, B., agreed with that judgment and did not find it necessary to add anything, and then Martin, B., said (1 H. & N. at p. 79):

> "I am of the same opinion. There are three matters of charge well known to the law, namely, for labour simply, for labour and materials, and for goods sold and delivered. Now every case must be judged of by itself, and what is the present case?"

Then he deals with the present case and agrees with the judgment that has been delivered by the learned Chief Baron. Bramwell, B., said (1 H. & N. at p. 80):

> "I did not hear the whole of the argument, and will not, therefore, give a decided opinion, but I am inclined to think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, even assuming Mr. Quain's argument to be right. The contract is to print a treatise and a dedication, the latter to be thereafter furnished. That imposed on the defendant the obligation of furnishing a dedication, such as the plaintiff could by law print."

A contract to make a portrait or produce a portrait involves the fact that the person whose portrait is to be painted should contribute something, that is to say, he should contribute the sittings which are necessary for the purpose of enabling the portrait to be painted.

It is said that the decision in Clay v. Yates (1) is inconsistent with that in Lee v. Griffin (2). So far as the facts in Lee v. Griffin (2) are concerned, it affords no help to the decision of the present case because it was concerned with the question whether, when a dentist undertakes to make a plate of false teeth—more frequently called a denture—that is or is not a sale of goods. In that case a principal part of that which the parties are dealing with is the chattel which will come into existence when such skill as may be necessary to produce it has been applied by the dentist and those who work for him; but in the course of delivering the judgments in that case, Crompton, J., and Hill, J., said nothing whatever which would throw any doubt upon the views expressed in the earlier case of Clay v. Yates (1). Crompton, J., said (4 L.T. at p. 547):

> "However, on the point which was made at the trial, whether the plaintiff could not succeed on the count for work, labour, and materials, I am also clearly of opinion against the plaintiff. Whether the cause of action be work and labour or goods sold and delivered, depends on the particular nature of each individual contract"; and then he refers to Clay v. Yates (1) as turning upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, and concludes with these words:

> "I do not agree with the proposition that whenever skill is to be exercised in carrying out the contract, that fact makes it a contract for work and labour, and not for the sale of a chattel; it may be the cause of action is for work and labour, when the materials supplied are merely ancillary, as in the case put of an attorney or printer. But in the present case the goods to be furnished, namely, the teeth, are the principal subject-matter; and the case is nearer that of a tailor, who measures for a garment and afterwards supplies the article fitted."

In giving judgment Hill, J., said (4 L.T. at p. 547):

> "The proposition of Bayley, J. (in Atkinson v. Bell (1828), 8 B. & C. 277), that where a person has bestowed work and labour on his own materials he cannot maintain an action for work and labour, is certainly not universally true; and Tindal, C.J., as well as the other members of the court, in Grafton v. Armitage (5), repudiated that doctrine, and explained that Bayley, J., must be regarded as speaking with reference to the particular circumstances of the case then before this Court; and the same view was taken by the Court of Exchequer in Clay v. Yates (1)," the case to which I have already referred. It is quite true that in giving judgment Blackburn, J., to whose views on any question of contract or of the common law the greatest weight is to be attached, uses these words (4 L.T. at p. 547):

> "The other question is, whether the present was a contract for the sale of goods, or for work and labour. In order to ascertain this you must, of course, in each case,

> A look at the contract itself. If the contract be such that it will result in the sale of a chattel, the proper form of action, if the employer refuses to accept the article when made, would be for not accepting";

and later in his judgment he said:

> "An attorney employed to draw a deed is a familiar instance of the latter proposi- B tion"—that is to say, where the action is for work and labour—"and it would be an abuse of language to say that the paper or parchment of the deed were goods sold and delivered."

Then he quoted TINDAL, C.J., in Grafton v. Armitage (5), observing of that case:

> "The substance of the contract was goods to be sold and delivered by the one party to the other."

C I treat that judgment as indicating that in the view of BLACKBURN, J., one has to look to the substance of the contract. If you find, as the court did in Lee v. Griffin (2), that the substance of the contract was a contract to produce something to be sold by the dentist to the dentist's customer, then that is a sale of goods. But if, on the other hand, the substance of the contract is that skill and labour have to be exercised for the production of the article, and that it is only as ancillary to that that there will pass D from the artist to his client or customer some materials in addition to the skill involved in the production of the article, that does not affect the conclusion that the contract is one for work and labour and materials, because the substance of the contract is for the skill and experience of the artist in producing the article.

I am of opinion that in this case the substance of the matter was an agreement for the exercise of skill, and that it was only as incidental to this that some materials would E have passed from the artist to the gentleman who commissioned the portrait. For these reasons I think that within the meaning of s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, this was not a contract for the sale of goods, but one for work and labour and materials.

That disposes of the subject-matter of this appeal with this exception, that it does not follow that the plaintiff is entitled, as damages, to the full amount that he would have recovered if he had been allowed to complete the contract, because there would F have to be some expenditure by the plaintiff upon the cost of the canvas and the coats of paint to be put upon the canvas, and that ought to be deducted. As no such question was raised or discussed at the trial we think that under the circumstances it is open to this court to say that something ought to be deducted, and the damages therefore should be, not the 250 guineas claimed, but, say, £200. We have to make a guess, and this is rather on the generous side towards the plaintiff, but the only alternative would G be to send the case back for trial, a course which, as I understand the argument, neither party is desirous should be taken. For these reasons I think there ought to be judgment for the plaintiff for £200 damages.

SLESSER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case the plaintiff is unable to produce any document in writing sufficient evidentially to maintain his contract which has been found to have been made, orally, with the defendant. If this is a contract for H work and labour done, that does not prejudice him. If it is a contract for sale of goods or an agreement to deliver goods under a sale, then the objection has been held to be fatal to him. In my opinion this is a contract for work and labour.

This question, whether such a contract is for sale of goods or for work and labour done which ultimately may produce a chattel which is delivered to the purchaser, has vexed jurists from the earliest stages. According to the Civil Law as finally settled by I JUSTINIAN, the test whether a contract was conductio-operis or emptio-venditio depended upon whether the material was supplied by the employer or by the workman. That view appears to have been accepted by BAYLEY, J., in Atkinson v. Bell (3), but since that time the dictum of BAYLEY, J., has been repudiated by all the authorities. It was repudiated in Grafton v. Armitage (5) (2 C.B. at p. 339) by MAULE, J., and ERLE, J. The English doctrine is far more elastic in this matter than that contained in the INSTITUTES OF JUSTINIAN or in most of the foreign civil codes. The question of the ownership of the material on which the work is done is not conclusive of the matter.

Another test which has been suggested is that which appears particularly prominently in the judgment of Blackburn, J., in the case of Lee v. Griffin (2). There Blackburn, J., said (4 L.T. at p. 547):

> "I do not think that the relative value of the labour and of the materials on which it is bestowed can in any case be the test of what is the cause of action; and that if Benvenuto Cellini had contracted to execute a work of art for another, much as the value of the skill might exceed that of the materials, the contract would have been the less for the sale of a chattel."

It is that observation of that very learned judge which has given me considerable doubt and difficulty in this case, but I have come to the conclusion, looking at the authorities as a whole, and considering the matter as a matter of principle myself, that if Blackburn, J., there meant to state that whenever there was an agreement whereby a chattel would ultimately have to be delivered, that was of necessity for the sale of goods, so wide a proposition cannot be supported. As is indicated by the old plea in Bullen and Leake's Pleadings (2nd Edn.), for a common indebitatus account for work done, what is claimed is > "money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for work done and materials provided by the plaintiff for the defendant at his request."

Normally, in the class of case which we have here to consider, when the work has to be done in order to make the chattel fit for ultimate delivery to the purchaser, there will always be, or nearly always be, some material which, at some stage or another, will have to be delivered, and if that be the only test, that delivery of some ultimate material decides that the contract is for the sale of goods, I should find it difficult to understand how cases in which it has always been agreed that the contracts are for work and labour and not for the sale of goods, such as the delivery of written documents of parchment by a solicitor, would not fall within the category of contracts for the sale of goods. But I think that the authorities are clear to the contrary, notwithstanding the weighty observation of Blackburn, J.

In the first of the two cases to which my Lord drew attention, to which, therefore, I need not refer in any detail, that of Clay v. Yates (1), Pollock, C.B., said (1 H. & N. at p. 78):

> "The true rule is this, whether the work and labour is of the essence of the contract, or whether it is the materials that are found."

Then he gives the illustration of a work of art:

> "Whether it be silver or gold, or marble or common plaster, that is a case of the application of labour of the highest description, and the material is of no sort of importance as compared with the labour; and therefore that all this would be recoverable as work and labour and materials found."

Martin, B., spoke to the same effect, and he said (1 H. & N. at p. 80):

> "I do not think it is profitable to go into an inquiry of the other cases, for in the common sense and understanding of mankind this is clearly a case of work, and labour, and materials."

In Lee v. Griffin (2), the later case, Crompton, J., seems to me to support that view He said (4 L.T. at p. 547):

> "I do not agree with the proposition that whenever skill is to be exercised in carrying out the contract, that fact makes it a contract for work and labour, and not for the sale of a chattel; it may be the cause of action is for work and labour, when the materials supplied are merely ancillary, as in the case put of an attorney or printer"

—to which I may add, that of a painter of portraits. Hill, J., spoke of there being a sale of goods when the substance of the contract was goods to be sold and delivered, and therefore inferentially suggested that where goods to be sold and delivered were not the substance of the contract but merely ancillary to it, the contract might be one for work and labour; so that all those authorities seem to me to be consistent.

There is one other matter upon which I will comment. It has been pointed out in this case that under s. 5 (1) (a) of the Copyright Act, 1911:

> "The author of a work shall be the first owner of the copyright therein: Provided that (a) where, in the case of . . . a portrait the . . . original was ordered by some other person and was made for valuable consideration in pursuance of that order then, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, the person by whom such . . . original was ordered shall be the first owner of the copyright."

There would therefore be in a case such as this a restriction upon the proprietary rights of the painter to dispose of these goods, which one would not have expected to find if the property in the goods was still in an unrestricted state in his disposition before he delivered them, under the contract of sale of goods, to the purchaser. One of the learned judges in an earlier case points out that, in that particular case, where it was held that the contract was one for work and labour, there was a restriction on the power of the printer to dispose of the goods.

I am of opinion that on the facts of this case it is here shown that the material, the paint and the canvas, were merely ancillary to the actual technical work of producing the work of art, and that, therefore, this is a contract for work and labour. I will only guard myself finally by saying that I only decide this case upon its own particular facts. There may be cases where portraits are ordered in circumstances which would constitute the contract one for the sale of a picture as a chattel. In the circumstances of this case, however, where the defendant gave a commission to an artist to paint the portrait of a lady impliedly contracting, as I think, that the lady should attend at the artist's studio that the work might be executed, it is impossible to say that the mere fact that there would result an ultimate delivery of the picture constituted the contract one for the sale of goods. Consequently, s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, is no protection to the defendant in this case, and this appeal must be allowed.

ROCHE, L.J.—The defendant in this action desired that a portrait should be painted of a lady who subsequently became his wife. He, as the learned judge found, entered into a contract with the plaintiff, an artist, for the painting of the lady's picture. The picture was not painted because the defendant refused to go on with the contract. The artist, the plaintiff, sued for the price or for damages. At the trial the defendant disputed the making of a contract. The learned judge at the trial found the facts on this issue entirely in favour of the plaintiff, and held that the contract alleged was established. But the learned judge felt himself bound by the decision in Lee v. Griffin (2), to hold that the contract between the parties was a contract for the sale of goods and not one for work and labour. In so doing the learned judge was, I think, too much influenced by an expression in the judgment of BLACKBURN, J. (4 L.T. at p. 547), in reference to a well-known goldsmith artist of mediaeval Italy; but, however that may be, the learned judge's conclusion that he was so bound by the decision in Lee v. Griffin (2) to decide in favour of the defendant was based, I think, on a mistaken view. On the contrary, in my opinion, Lee v. Griffin (2) is an authority for a decision in favour of the plaintiff. In Lee v. Griffin (2) the authority of the decision of Clay v. Yates (1), which clearly is an authority in favour of the plaintiff, was recognised, and in Lee v. Griffin (2) BLACKBURN, J., whose judgment has been principally relied on as an authority for the defendant, said (4 L.T. at p. 547):

> "If the work and labour be bestowed in such a manner as that the result would not be anything which could properly be said to be the subject of sale, then an action for work and labour is the proper remedy. An attorney employed to draw a deed is a familiar instance of the latter proposition; and it would be an abuse of language to say that the paper or parchment of the deed were goods sold and delivered."

Equally, in my judgment, if the history and reality of the transaction involved in the painting of a portrait of this kind is considered, it would be an abuse of language to say that the portrait is sold. In former days the phrase used would have been: What painter are you going to employ to paint the portrait? In these more polite days the phrase is, Who is commissioned to paint the portrait? Both phrases alike represent a transaction which is a mandate or authority given to another for reward to execute a certain thing desired, namely, the production of a portrait or representation of the person giving the commission or of someone whom he wishes to be so represented. That was the language, I think, employed in this case. The evidence was that the defendant asked the plaintiff his fee for a portrait of Miss Finnegan, and then later the plaintiff was commissioned to carry out the work.

In those circumstances, adopting the test put by BLACKBURN, J., in Lee v. Griffin (2), I have no doubt that the proper conclusion to be drawn is that this was a transaction not for the sale of goods but of the employment of an artist to do work which the defendant desired that he should do. The terms of s. 5 (1) (a) of the Copyright Act, 1911, referred to by SLESSER, L.J., tend, I think, towards the same conclusion, because it is plain by reason of that subsection, and I think, also, by reason of the nature of the contract between the parties, that it would be quite impossible, and would amount to a breach of contract, if the plaintiff, when he had begun to paint this portrait on the commission of the defendant, had sold it to someone else. In no respect was this, in my opinion, a transaction of which the end was the delivery of goods. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed and that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of £200.

GREER, L.J.—I had intended to say, and would like to add, that in deciding as we have done we are not deciding anything which is necessarily contrary to the decision of MATHEW, J., in the shortly reported case of Isaacs v. Hardy (4), which dealt with a contract of a very different kind, where a picture dealer whose sole object was to acquire something that he might sell in his business, engaged an artist to paint and deliver to him a picture of a given subject at an agreed price. It must not be taken that we are in any way overruling that case or deciding in any way as to whether that decision was right or wrong.

Appeal allowed.

BUTTERWORTH (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. PAGE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Slesser, and Romer, L.JJ.), November 28, 29, 30, 1933].

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Atkin, Lord Tomlin, Lord Russell, Lord Macmillan and Lord Wright), March 8, 11, 12, April 8, 1935]

[Reported 153 L.T. 34; 19 Tax. Cas. 328]

Income Tax—Award of Royal Commission on awards to inventors—Award made to company—Agreement between company and inventor that moneys received in respect of user of inventions up to certain date should be paid to inventor—Right of inventor to share of award—Liability of inventor to tax in year of award—Whether capital or income in the hands of inventor—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), Sched. D.

In 1909 the respondent sold his engineering business to a private limited company incorporated for the purpose, the price being satisfied by shares in the company. The respondent was appointed whole-time manager of the company for life. In 1917 the government required the company to impart the knowledge necessary to enable contractors to construct aeroplanes of the types designed and built by the company. When the United States of America entered the war of 1914–1918 the British Government required the company to hand to the Government of the United States the designs of their aeroplanes and to instruct American engineers how to build the machines. In 1918 the company and the respondent entered into an agreement for the payment by the company to the respondent of royalties in respect of a licence previously granted orally to the company to use certain inventions and designs, in respect of which the respondent had obtained letters patent. In 1919 the company and the respondent entered into a new agreement which recited that the company owed a large sum to the respondent for royalties payable up to Dec. 31, 1918, and it was agreed that the company would pay to the respondent all royalties and remuneration received by the company for the use of the inventions and designs by the British Government or the United States Government up to that date. The agreement also provided for the assignment to the company of specified inventions, drawings, and letters patent, and for the assignment to contain a covenant by the respondent to communicate to the company all such further inventions in connection with aircraft as he might make during the period of seven years from Jan. 1, 1919. The consideration for the assignment was a considerable number of shares in the company, and the appointment of the respondent as managing director for seven years from Jan. 1, 1919. The sale was made accordingly, and soon afterwards the company became a public company. In December, 1919, the company presented two claims to the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors relating to the services of the company to the British Government in supplying aircraft designs and imparting knowledge as to the methods of construction of the machines. On the same date two claims were lodged by the company in respect of the user by the United States Government. On May 15, 1922, the Royal Commission made one award of £30,000, under head 3 of the powers conferred by the Royal Warrant of March 19, 1919, in respect of the two claims of the company in relation to the user of their services by the British Government including the user of all parts or appliances covered by the patents referred to in the agreement of 1919. The claims arising out of the American user were dealt with by a special Anglo-American body to which a fresh claim in the names both of the company and the respondent was submitted, based in part on an alleged contract made by the British Government with the respondent to be responsible for compensation in respect of user by the American Government. On March 21, 1923, the joint body awarded £9,000 as compensation to the claimants. The £30,000 was paid to the company in October, 1923, and the £9,000 was paid to the company in the course of the year ending April 5, 1924. On Feb. 14, 1927, the board of directors of the company considered proposals made by the respondent for the settlement of his claims against the company in respect of the two awards, and it was resolved that his claim for approximately £30,400 should be admitted. The respondent was assessed to income tax in respect of that sum under the Income Tax Act, 1918, Sched. D, for the year ending April 5, 1924.

Held (by the Court of Appeal): the sum received by the respondent was not received in the course of the carrying on of his business, but was a capital sum paid to him for the surrender of a capital asset, and, therefore, was not taxable.

Held (by the House of Lords): on the facts, the respondent had no right to any part of the compensation as such received by the company, who did not claim on his behalf or as his agent; the respondent's rights in respect of the compensation were contractual only, arising out of his agreements with the company, and the £30,483 was only received by him when it was paid to him in 1927; and, therefore, the assessment must be discharged.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (infra) affirmed on different grounds.

Appeal. This was an appeal by the taxpayer from an order of FINLAY, J., dated July 28, 1933, on a Case Stated under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149, by the Commissioners for the general purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the Division of the Hundred of Gore for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

The Case Stated (so far as relevant to this report) as follows:

At a meeting of the said commissioners for the general purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the Division of the Hundred of Gore, held at the Court House, Hendon, on Oct. 29, 1930, Frederick Handley Page (hereinafter called "the respondent") appealed against two assessments to income tax made upon him under the provisions of Sched. D of the Income Tax Acts for the years ended April 5, 1923, and April 5, 1924, respectively in the sums of £39,000 each expressed in column 4 of the assessment under the heading of "Description of Trade Profession Vocation Concern or other profit chargeable under Sched. D" as "Royal Commission award in respect of the user of certain patents and designs." The said assessments were made alternatively to protect the position of the revenue in case any question should arise as to the year of receipt of the subject-matters of the assessments. At the hearing of the appeal the assessment for the year ended April 5, 1923, was abandoned, and the commissioners accordingly discharged it. It was agreed that if there was liability the assessment of £39,000 for the year ended April 5, 1924, should be reduced to £30,483.

The following facts were admitted or proved:

A company called Handley Page, Ltd. (hereinafter called "the company") was registered under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, as a private company on June 17, 1909, for the purposes, inter alia, of acquiring from the respondent the business of an engineer carried on by him at Woolwich together with the goodwill, plant, machinery, &c., and also an invention and a design of which the respondent was the author and registered proprietor. The terms on which the company acquired the said business and other assets are set out in an agreement between the respondent and the company dated July 27, 1909. This agreement provides, inter alia, as follows:

> "Clause 1: The purchase price to be £500 for the invention and design and the business and goodwill thereof; benefit of contracts plant machinery and effects; the respondent to indemnify the company against all debts existing at date of said agreement.
> Clause 3: The purchase price of £500 to be satisfied by allotment to respondent or as he should direct of 25 fully paid up shares of £20 each in the company.
>
> Clauses 10 to 15: Company to employ respondent at a salary and percentage of profits.
> Clause 20: The respondent for a period of five years to disclose to company any improvements on existing inventions or designs; and also any further inventions or designs he might make.
> Clause 21: The consideration for the undertaking in cl. 20 to be a payment by the company to the respondent of £1,000."

On the outbreak of war the company, which then owned and was carrying on the business and was entitled to the goodwill thereof, to the services of a skilled staff and in particular to the services of the respondent, worked out designs for large bombing aeroplanes which, when made in accordance with those designs, were known as the "O" and "V" types of aeroplane. These designs were not capable of being registered and were not in fact registered designs nor could they be made, nor were they in fact made the subject of letters patent, though certain minor features were patented from time to time. In the evolution of these designs many questions of great technical difficulty were solved by the company's technical staff.

In 1917 H.M. Government resolved that machines should be made from the company's designs, and accordingly required the company to impart the knowledge necessary to enable government contractors in various parts of the country to construct machines in accordance with the designs. The company, in complying with this requirement, distributed blue prints and drawings of the machines and imparted the necessary knowledge to such contractors (including the company's competitors in trade), by whom large numbers of "O" and "V" machines were constructed.

By an agreement, expressed to be supplemental to the above-mentioned agreement of July 27, 1909, entered into between the respondent and the company on May 28, 1918, it was recited that no improvements or further inventions had been made by the respondent during the said period of five years, and that since the expiration of the said term of five years the respondent had made certain improvements on existing inventions and designs, and had also made certain further inventions and designs for which protection had been obtained, all of which further inventions and designs were recited in the agreement to be the sole property of the respondent, and to have been used by the company pursuant to a verbal licence granted to the company by the respondent upon the terms that the respondent should be paid a sum to be agreed upon, and it was agreed (cl. 1) that the company should pay to the respondent: (a) 10 per cent. on prices charged by the company in respect of aeroplanes, &c., and (b) 15 per cent. on prices charged by the company in respect of bomb gear at any time theretofore manufactured and sold by the company under the letters patent inventions or designs in the schedule to the agreement.

Clause 2 of the agreement provided for the like percentages to be paid to the respondent on the same items manufactured and sold by the company after the date of the agreement.

Just before the entry of the United States of America into the war the company had an opportunity of selling in America all its rights in the before-mentioned designs for a very large sum of money.

Before, however, the company could take advantage of this opportunity the United States of America became a belligerent power, with the result that by agreement between His Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States the company was required by His Majesty's Government to hand over all its blue prints and designs relating to the said types of aeroplane to the American Government, and was required to instruct that government how to build the said machines from the said designs.

The company accordingly handed over all its blue prints and designs as aforesaid, and sent its draughtsmen and six foremen to America. By reason of the foregoing the company parted with its trade secrets and lost its goodwill in relation to the said designs. In fact the disclosure of the said designs enabled several American companies to make large twin engine machines which previously had never been made in America.

A further agreement was entered into between the respondent and the company on April 11, 1919, by which time large numbers of aeroplanes had been manufactured by the company in accordance with the said designs.

This agreement referred to the two previous agreements and further recited as follows:

> "And whereas there is due from the company to the [respondent] the sum of £108,800 for royalties payable up to and including the 31st day of December, 1918, in respect of the inventions designs provisional protection letters patent and registered designs mentioned in the second and third parts of the schedule hereto. And whereas the said inventions and designs have been used by His Majesty's Government and with such government's consent by the Government of the United States of America during the present war and the company has at the request of the [respondent] claimed from His Majesty's Government royalties or remuneration for such use and it has been agreed that all such royalties or remuneration as may be received by the company for such use up to the 31st day of December, 1918, shall be paid and shall belong to the [respondent], but that all such royalties or remuneration for such use after the 31st day of December, 1918, belong to the company."

By this agreement it was provided:

Clause 1, that the before-mentioned agreements of July 27, 1909, and May 28, 1918, were cancelled as from Dec. 31, 1918, save as thereinafter mentioned.

Clause 2 of this agreement provided for the payment of £108,800 in satisfaction of the royalties due to the respondent for user by the company and remuneration up to Dec. 31, 1918. The said clause also provided as follows:

> "And (the company) shall also pay to the [respondent] all such royalties or remuneration as the company shall receive for the use of the said inventions and designs by His Majesty's Government or the Government of the United States of America up to Dec. 31, 1918. Should any question arise between the parties hereto as to what proportion of any sum which may be received from the government the [respondent] is entitled to, the same shall be submitted to the auditors of the company for the time being whose certificate thereon shall be final and binding on both parties."

Clause 3 provided for the sale by the respondent of his rights in the inventions, drawings, letters patent, designs, &c., specified in the schedules to the agreements.

Clause 4 provided that the respondent would at request and cost of the company apply for and assign to the company letters patent for the said inventions.

Clause 5 provided that the assignment to the company should contain covenants by the respondent to communicate all improvements and inventions connected with aircraft that he might make or discover or become entitled to during the seven years from Jan. 1, 1919.

Clause 6 provided that the consideration for the sale should be 140,000 fully paid £1 ordinary shares in the company to be issued and allotted to the respondent or his nominees.

Clause 8 provided that the respondent should serve the company as managing director for seven years from Jan. 1, 1919, with power in the respondent to extend that period for a further three years.

This agreement was entered into because it was intended to turn the company into a public company (this was done shortly afterwards, the company's capital being then increased by £150,000), and it was considered necessary that the respondent should have sold to the company everything which might be his in relation to aircraft and to have it clear that as from the date of the agreement he had no other interest in the company than the share consideration plus the amount of royalties up to Dec. 31, 1918, and in addition all such royalties or remuneration as the company should receive for the use of the inventions and designs by H.M. Government or the Government of the United States of America up to Dec. 31, 1918. The patents which the company became entitled to under this agreement included the respondent's slotted wing patents and this, together with the right to the benefit of all patents taken out in the said seven years, was of immense value to the company.

By an indenture dated Oct. 21, 1919, the respondent assigned to the company the various inventions, &c., specified in the schedules to this document in consideration of the allotment to him or his nominees of 140,000 shares in the company and in pursuance of the agreement dated April 11, 1919.

A Royal Commission on awards to inventors was appointed by His Majesty's Royal Warrant on March 19, 1919.

The warrant having recited s. 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, further recited as follows:

> "And whereas there may also have been the like exceptional user of inventions, designs, drawings, or processes which, though not protected against the Crown under the said Act or otherwise, may have been of such merit or utility as to render it proper that the inventor, author, or owner thereof should receive some remuneration from the Treasury in respect of such user."

The warrant then sets out the powers conferred upon the commission under three heads as follows:

> "(1) In any case of user or alleged user of any patented invention for the services of the Crown by any government department and of default of agreement as to the terms of user, the commissioners upon the application of the patentee and agreement to accept their determination may proceed to settle and may settle the terms of user in lieu and place of the Treasury. . . .
> "(2) In any case where the terms of user of any patented inventions . . . or any terms as to assignment of an invention under s. 30 of the Act have been agreed or are in course of agreement between the patentee and any government department, the commissioners may, on the application of the Treasury, make any recommendations as to the giving or withholding by the Treasury of approval of such agreement or proposed agreement and may assist in adjusting or determining any term or terms of any proposed agreement as to which the parties may not be fully agreed.
> "(3) In any case of user or alleged user for the services of the Crown by any government department of any inventions, designs, drawings, or processes which, though not conferring any monopoly against the Crown or any statutory right to payment or compensation, may nevertheless appear from their exceptional utility or otherwise to entitle the inventor, author, or owner thereof to some remuneration for such user (including user by way of selling for use, licensing, or otherwise dealing with any articles made in accordance therewith) the commissioners may, on the request of the Treasury, inquire into the circumstances of the case and make a recommendation to the Treasury as to the remuneration (if any) that is proper to be allowed therefor."

A claim dated Dec. 3, 1919, was made by the company under heads (1) and (3) of the Royal Warrant for compensation in respect of the user by the British Government of the "O" Type twin engine aeroplane. [A copy of the claim was annexed to the Case.] The respondent was included in the claim as a party interested in the letters patent.

Clause 1 of the counter-statement states that no admission was made as to the validity of the patents or designs specified in the said claim; that the same were in respect of minor features of design and that the department was willing that compensation should be assessed under head 3 of the Royal Warrant. An identical claim was made in respect of the user by the British Government of the "V" type four-engine aeroplane.

The said claims were duly heard before the Royal Commission, and dealt with as falling under head 3 of the Royal Warrant. Accordingly the claim for compensation for user of the said letters patent was abandoned at the hearing. On May 15, 1922, the Royal Commission issued their recommendation. The said recommendation was in the following terms:

> "The commission having inquired into the circumstances of the case recommend to the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury that the sum of £30,000 is proper to be paid by way of remuneration to the applicants, Messrs. Handley Page, Ltd., in respect of user by the Crown of all 'O' type twin engine aeroplanes and 'V' type four-engine aeroplanes, which down to May 1, 1922, had been or were being manufactured for the services of the Crown by companies, firms, or persons other than the applicants, and of all parts or appliances of or in connection with the said aeroplanes, including those protected by the letters patent or applications therefor set out in the schedule hereto.
> "In arriving at the sum hereinbefore recommended the commission have not taken into consideration any contractual claim which the applicants may have in respect of services alleged by them to have been rendered at the request of His Majesty's Government in providing a separate 'drawing office and blue print department' and an 'outside contracts department,' and supplying therefrom to contractors blue prints, drawings, and other articles, and in furnishing instruction and assistance and the services of trained staff."

In addition to the claim for compensation for user by the British Government of the subject-matters of those claims a further claim was made on Dec. 3, 1919, in respect of the user of the "O" type twin engine aeroplane by the Government of the United States of America. The claim is substantially in the same form as the British user claims.

By an agreement dated Jan. 11, 1923, and made between the company and the respondent of the first part, the President of the Air Council (for and on behalf of His Majesty) of the second part, and the Assistant Secretary of War, War Department, U.S.A., of the third part, after reciting that the company and the respondent (therein referred to as the claimants) claimed compensation for the communication, information, and assistance made and given by them as hereinbefore stated (including any question of patent rights and use of inventions and designs by the U.S. Government), it was agreed that the claims of the claimants should be considered and the amount (if any) proper to be paid to the claimants determined by the Royal Commission aforesaid sitting conjointly with the commission appointed by the War Department of the U.S.A. (thereinafter called the Joint Commission), and provisions were made under which the claim was to be brought before the Joint Commission.

The claimants duly lodged their claim pursuant to the agreement of reference, and the U.S. Government lodged a counter-statement. The principles on which the Joint Commission proceeded were precisely the same as the Royal Commission.

The claim in respect of American user of the "O" type of aeroplane was duly heard before the Joint Commission, who made their award on March 21, 1923, that the amount proper to be paid to the claimants was £9,000. The said award reads as follows:

> "The Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors and the American Commission for the Adjustment of Foreign Claims.—The Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors and the Commission for the Adjustment of Foreign Claims appointed by the War Department, United States of America (hereinafter called the Joint Commission), having taken into consideration the matters referred to them by the memorandum of agreement dated Jan. 11, 1923, and made between Handley Page, Ltd., and Frederick Handley Page (hereinafter called the claimants) of the first part, the President of the Air Council of the second part, and the Assistant Secretary of War of the United States of America of the third part, and having heard the respective parties thereon, award and determine that the amount proper to be paid by His Majesty's Government to the claimants in respect of the communication to and (or) user by or on behalf of the Government of the United States of the invention or inventions, design or designs in the said memorandum of agreement mentioned is the sum of nine thousand pounds (£9,000)."

The said sum of £9,000 was paid in cash to the company.

In an agreement dated Oct. 17, 1923, made between the Treasury Solicitor, the Disposals and Liquidation Commission, and Handley Page, Ltd., it was recited that the company was indebted in the sum of £86,554 10s. 10d. to the Crown in respect of accounts between the parties and in the sum of £67,000 in respect of the purchase by the company of certain lands at Hendon. The agreement further recited that the government had agreed to accept £35,000 in settlement of the claim for £86,554 10s. 10d. and £67,000 in respect of the claims under the agreement for purchase of the land. The agreement provided that the company thereby assigned to the Treasury Solicitor the benefit of the award dated May 15, 1922, and the benefit of the sum of £30,000 payable to the company thereunder. The company thereby requested the Treasury to pay the £30,000 to the Treasury Solicitor in lieu of the company towards satisfaction of the sums owing by the company to the Treasury, and this was done.

At the date of the said agreement the respondent was the managing director of the company, and there was no evidence before us to suggest that the respondent objected to the agreement being carried out.

In the balance sheet of the company as at Dec. 31, 1924, the amount of the two awards, namely £39,000, was shown as in "suspense account." The company made substantial losses for all relevant years.

At a meeting of the directors of the company held on Feb. 14, 1927, the following resolution was passed:

> "Extract from minutes of a board meeting of the directors of Handley Page, Ltd., held on Feb. 14, 1927: Mr. Handley Page's proposals for a settlement of his claims against the company in regard to the 'O' and 'V' and 'American User' awards were discussed and subject to his undertaking to meet any claim against the company for income tax payable in respect of the value of the awards now agreed to be due to him it was resolved that his claim for approximately £30,400 in respect of compensation for sale of assets by disclosure of plans be admitted in full in consideration of which he would release to the company the sum of approximately £2,400—the company in turn agreeing to bear tax on the latter amount should it be assessed against them. It was further resolved that the net amount of approximately £28,000 due to be paid to him over a period of five years, bearing in the meantime interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum; such interest to commence from the date of this arrangement subject to the scheme for reorganisation going through."

The respondent admitted in evidence before the commissioners that he had in fact received the said sum of £30,483 in cash from the company in accordance with this minute.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the hearing of the appeal before the commissioners: Constantinesco v. R. (1) and Mills v. Jones (2).

On behalf of the respondent it was contended:

(i) That the sums awarded by the Royal Commission and by the Joint Commission, being in respect of user of the designs of the "O" and "V" type aeroplanes which were at all times the absolute property of the company, were not sums awarded to the respondent.

(ii) That the respondent, not being entitled to any sums that might be awarded, could not, and did not, reserve to himself the right to receive any part of the sums awarded to the company, and did not in fact receive the sums awarded or any part thereof.

(iii) That the sum of £30,483 was part of the purchase price paid by the company for the assets sold to it and for the benefit of the services of the respondent acquired by it by the agreement of April 11, 1919.

(iv) That the said sum was capital in the respondent's hands.

(v) That the sums awarded by the Royal Commission and by the Joint Commission were ex gratia payments in the nature of bounty and were not taxable.

(vi) Alternatively, if, contrary to the respondent's contentions, any taxable profit arose to the respondent, such profit did not arise and (in this alternative) is not chargeable in the year of assessment.

(vii) That the assessment should be discharged.

On behalf of the Crown it was contended:

(a) That under the agreement of April 11, 1919, the respondent had specifically reserved to himself the right to receive the whole of any award which might be made in respect of the use of the inventions and designs up to Dec. 31, 1918.

(b) That this was no part of the consideration for the assignment of the patents and designs, but that such consideration was specifically stated in the agreement and did not include any part of any award which might be made.

(c) That the fact that the respondent, who was the managing director of the company, allowed the money to be used by the company in paying the company's debts for a time was immaterial.

(d) That the respondent did in fact receive £30,483 as his share of the awards and that the said sum represented income properly included in the assessment made upon him.

(e) That the terms of the awards clearly stated that the payments were made for "user" and that although the payments were made under head 3 such payments could not, so far as concerning their nature as payments for user, be distinguished in principle from payments made under the other subheadings of the Royal Warrant.

The commissioners having considered the evidence and arguments adduced before them decided to confirm the assessment for 1923–24 in the figures agreed, namely, £30,483, and they discharged the assessment for 1922–23. The respondent immediately on the determination of the appeal declared his dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law, and in due course required the commissioners to state and sign a Case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149.

FINLAY, J., held that consequent on the awards, the company received money on behalf of the respondent, in respect of which he was correctly assessed to tax.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—It is necessary to state the facts on which the point comes before this court. It is a claim by Mr. Frederick Handley Page that, in the assessment made on him in the year 1924, was wrongly included a sum of £39,000* which he had received from the government. The £39,000 was paid to him in two sums of £30,000 and £9,000. The sum in the first case, the £30,000, was in respect of matters with which I must deal in fuller detail vis-à-vis His Majesty's Government, and the £9,000 was in reference to the matters dealt with vis-à-vis the American Government. Mr. Handley Page was a person who was interested in, and a leader in, the making of aeroplanes, and after the war a claim was made in respect of the user and appropriation which had been made by the government of certain matters and things which belonged to Mr. Handley Page. The form of the claim is this:

> "Particulars of claim under cls. 1 and 3 of the Royal Warrant dated March 19, 1919, that is, claims in respect of the user of designs and patented inventions where no terms of user have been agreed between the patentee and the government department concerned."

As we all know, there was a Royal Commission set up for the purpose of making awards to inventors. That was its primary purpose, but the constitution and the duties which it had to perform are found in the case and are set out in three separate heads. [His Lordship referred to the three heads specified in the Royal Warrant, and continued:] It is plain, therefore, that those three duties were imposed on the commission—one, settling the terms of the user of a patented article; two, assisting in reaching the ascertainment of an amount where terms of user had been agreed; and, three, the ascertainment of a sum where the commission thought that it was appropriate that a sum should be recommended to be given by the Treasury; but it is quite plain that under the third head what was ascertained was not ascertained in pursuance of a right but in pursuance of compensation which might, nevertheless, appear to be appropriate to the facts which had taken place.

* See the statement of facts taken from the Case Stated. It was later agreed that this assessment should be reduced to £30,483.

It is to be remembered that in the case of patented articles, there was, under the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, a right to be paid a sum by the Crown. Section 29 of the Act of 1907 gave the inventor in respect of his patent the same right against His Majesty the King, as the inventor had against the subject, and the sum which was to be paid was, in default of agreement, to be settled by the Treasury, and such cases have been known. That was repealed by s. 8 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, and then there was given a right to the Crown to use patented inventions, but, in case of a dispute arising as to what should be paid therefor, that was to be referred to the court for decision, the court being the High Court, and then there was to be a sum ascertained.

In lieu of following that procedure, it will be seen that, under the warrant, the commissioners were entrusted with a duty in respect of the cases (1) where there was a good patented article used, and (2) where there was an agreement, but (3) was added in respect of cases which lay on the borderline, where it was not possible to say there was an agreement, and yet it should seem right to the commissioners that some remuneration should be granted.

It is not in dispute that certain patents, certain designs, certain knowledge, which belonged to Mr. Handley Page were made use of by the government, but, in many cases, what was made use of was not the subject-matter of patents, because for many reasons the relevant designs, &c., could not be patented.

The claim that is made deserves to be looked at. It says this:

> "The subject of this claim is the design of the Handley Page 'O' type twin engine aeroplane—the only really successful large bomb-carrying machine produced either in Great Britain or by any of the Allied and Associated Powers. The only really successful large bomb-carrying machine produced by the opposing belligerents was the German Gotha, the design of which was copied from an 'O' type aeroplane which accidentally landed in German territory. Minor features of the 'O' type design are protected by" certain patents, and the particulars with full names of the persons who were interested in the patents are "Frederick Handley Page pursuant to an assignment by him" made to the company; and then it says:

> "The claimant elects to accept the decision or recommendation of the Royal Commission under the terms of the Royal Warrant in lieu of the settlement by the Treasury under s. 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907."

Then particulars are given of the alleged user. First, they say they are designers of certain aeroplanes, and then (b):

> "In the middle of the year 1917 the aircraft production department of the Ministry of Munitions received demands from the Forces for a large number of bombing machines, and orders were placed with other contractors for the supply of large quantities of Handley Page aeroplanes. The claimants, at the request of the department of aircraft production, and in order to increase the output of these machines, imparted the special knowledge they had acquired in the construction of bombing machines to other government contractors, handed over to them all the necessary drawings, &c., and dispatched trained staffs of engineers and others to all parts of the country to instruct fully the other contractors in the art of constructing Handley Page aeroplanes. For these services the claimants have received no payment whatsoever"; and in (c) they say: "The aeroplanes so produced proved of great value." Paragraph 9 is as follows:

> "The claimants have made no terms with such users [His Majesty's Government] but owing to the action of the latter the American Government have used this > design and probably others. The user by the American Government is the subject of a separate claim." A

To that there was a counter-statement put in on behalf of His Majesty's Government, and they said this:

> "No admission is made as to the validity of any of the letters patent or registered designs mentioned in para. 3 of the particulars of claim herein. The same are in B respect of minor features of design, and the department is willing that compensation therefor should be assessed under cl. 3 of the Royal Warrant of March 19, 1919, in connection with the general design of 'O' type aeroplanes."

Then they mention the extent of the user by the government, and they say, with regard to their objections and remarks on para. 8 of the particulars of claim:

> "The design of both the said aeroplanes was worked out by the air department of C the Admiralty in collaboration with the applicants . . . [and they say that] the design was the subject of modifications in detail which were the result of discussion and collaboration between the applicants and the air department of the Admiralty, and numerous tests were made from time to time during the said period by the advisory committee of aeronautics for the purpose of elucidating points of difficulty in connection with the said design." D

Then they say:

> "By reason of the premises the applicants have been enabled to secure contracts for very large sums of money all the experimental and extra costs of the said machine due to modifications of design"

were paid by the government; they say that the design now reached E

> "is of considerable value . . . the applicants have been adequately remunerated for the part taken by them in the said design."

There was a further claim in respect of the "V" type which followed the same lines. When we come to see what happened we are told in the case at para. 15:

> "The said claims were duly heard before the Royal Commission, and dealt with as F falling under head 3 of the Royal Warrant" [that is, under the ex gratia clause]. "Accordingly the claim for compensation for user of the said letters patent was abandoned at the hearing. On May 15, 1922, the Royal Commission issued their recommendation, of which a copy marked 'I' is annexed hereto and forms part of this case."

That is, as plain as can be, a statement that all questions of right which might arise to G the applicants under s. 29 or the revised s. 8 of the Act of 1919 were set aside and the whole matter was dealt with under cl. 3 of the warrant. Hearing it in that way, the commissioners arrived at the sum to be paid as £30,000, and they say that, in arriving at that sum they have not taken into consideration any contractual claim which the applicants could have in respect of a drawing office, in respect of supplying prints of the drawings, and in furnishing instruction and assistance and the services of trained H staff. To my mind that makes it quite plain, on these facts, that there was nothing in respect of which a petition of right would lie that was taken into account in this determination of this £30,000. Such matters are set aside, and £30,000 is arrived at as the sum to be taken in virtue of the collaboration and assistance which had, in that sense, been rendered to the common pool of knowledge out of which the aeroplanes ultimately emerged. It is common ground that these ex gratia payments were merely recom- I mended to the Treasury. There was no means whereby, such as under the Petitions of Right Act, a claim could be made which would ultimately have a legal sanction and could be brought effectively against the Treasury; it was that the Treasury were going to honour the recommendation of the Royal Commission. And in respect of what? Something that they had come to the conclusion ought to be recommended under head 3. I do not want to be misunderstood, or that this judgment should go too far. It is quite true that if this sum could be treated as a sum which was received by the applicants in the course of carrying on their business, if it was a sum which was due

A to a possibly unusual system of carrying on their business, but yet was a part of the business which they undertook and did carry on, and in respect of which they provided services or plant or materials, I should hesitate long before I said that it was not a taxable item under Sched. D. But it appears to me that the circumstances under which the decision of the commissioners was reached are such as to differentiate this claim from anything which could be called the result of the carrying on of the business B of the applicants. You may have a case in which a single payment is made but yet is made in the course of business; that is illustrated by Martin v. Lowry; Martin v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (3). You may have a case in which the work that is done, although it is the making of individual out-and-out contracts, yet is a part of the business which is carried on by the trader. But in the present case it seems to me that when one looks at the counter-statement put in by the Crown to the claim it is a negation of C there being any right, a negation of there being services rendered, a negation of the user of the property of the applicants; it is merely a statement that there was some collaboration for which the applicants had been adequately remunerated. That paragraph which I have read, para. 15 of the Case, seems to me of great importance, because it shows that any claim except that which fell under head 3 of the Royal Warrant was abandoned.

D Let me go back to the most recent case of what may be called the "voluntary payments." In Stedeford v. Beloe (4) LORD DUNEDIN reads the words of Sched. D and says ([1932] A.C. at p. 390):

> "Now it must be a real profit under Sched. D, and it has been held again and again that a mere voluntary gift is not such a profit because it is not, in the true sense of the word, income. It is merely a casual payment which depends upon E somebody else's goodwill."

I apply those words to the facts of the present case. Can I in any way say that this sum, which has been reached in the confused circumstances set out in the counter-statement, and which took place during the war, is a sum which has been reached in the course of the carrying on of their business? I do not find myself able to bring this payment F within those words of LORD DUNEDIN, and, therefore, it seems to me that the appeal must succeed on that ground. Equally, I find myself unable to accept the view which commended itself to the learned judge. He says:

> "In each case the sum is handed over by the government to the inventor, and in each case it is in respect of the user of something valuable which he has invented."

G I cannot so find the facts in the Case; but he goes on:

> "The real difference is this, and my attention was properly called to it. Differences between head 1 and head 3, I think, do not affect the matter once the payment has been made. It was a voluntary payment [and there the learned judge and I are in agreement] it need not have been made; but when it is made it seems to me that it is assessable to income tax."

H Somehow or another, although it was a voluntary payment, yet, when it had reached the hands of a business concern, it was to be treated as a sum, a profit and gain, reached and received in the course of business. It is upon that point that I find myself unable to agree with the learned judge.

There is another point on which I think the case also succeeds. What is this sum—a large sum, a considerable sum. What is it paid for? There was here a dissipation of I the knowledge and experience of the applicants. It was placed at the disposal of all and sundry who were engaged in making these aeroplanes and supplying them to the government. They were required to place their experience, their knowledge and such inventive faculties as they employed in their business, at the benefit of the other contractors. It seems to me that that was the very negation of carrying on the business of the Handley Page concern. No one in business, in their wisdom or prudence, would have so dealt with their faculties; I do not want to use the word "property," because I am by no means sure whether or not what was done was the handing over of property; it seems to me rather that they were contributing to a common pool their experience, A their knowledge and the drawings and the like, most of them, if I understand, incapable of being either registered, and not capable of being patented. But they brought all that into the common pool, and what was the result? They had enabled their competitors to enjoy the fruit of their research and labours during a number of years, and, to call that a sum which is received in the course of carrying on the business seems to me to neglect the very first meaning of the terms. From this point of view it appears to me that the two sums of £30,000 and £9,000 can be treated as a capital payment and not B as income at all. Whichever view commends itself to those who may have to consider this question at all, it seems to me it was in the nature of a capital payment. In the case of their claim against the United States it is said in their claim in para. 8:

> "Relying on the assurance as aforesaid, the claimants did not attempt to enter into any legal arrangement with the United States, and, so far as they have been able to determine their position, it would appear that they have no legal rights against C the United States Government."

Would they, apart from any contract, apart from any agreement, have made all this research and experience available to those who were, if not competitors, at least their rivals in business? That seems to me to be a view which is in strong contrast with the facts, and it appears to me, therefore, that these two payments may be considered D equally as a matter of capital payments; they had made their contribution and, for that contribution, it was held that they were entitled to be remunerated ex gratia.

For these reasons it appears to me that these two sums do not come within the ambit of profits and gains in the course of their business, and once they have been paid and reached the hands of the applicants they do not lose the character or characteristics under which they were paid; they remain the same, and they cannot be altered after E their receipt into the hands of the applicants. For those reasons it appears to me that the appeal must be allowed with costs here and below and the assessment discharged.

SLESSER, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be allowed. I can state my reasons very shortly. I am of opinion that this sum of money which was awarded to the company by the Royal Commission was in the nature of capital in their hands. I think that the learned judge has laid too much emphasis on the word "user" which is given F as the ground of the compensation in the finding of the Royal Commission, where they say that having inquired into the circumstances the sum of £30,000 is proper to be paid by way of remuneration "in respect of user" by the Crown of the twin engine aeroplanes. On that the learned judge says this:

> "It was also argued that this was capital. That argument I may deal with at once. I do not think it can succeed. That was not, I think, a payment in respect of G capital. It is no doubt true that probably a communication of the design to other people would depreciate, and greatly depreciate, its value. It is in respect of that largely that the sum was awarded; but none the less, I think that the sum was truly awarded in respect of the user of a secret process, and I cannot see that that can be regarded as a capital payment."

When the facts of this case, as stated in the Case, are examined, it is found that, so H far from being a user in the sense that there was a user in Mills v. Jones (2) and in the case of Constantinesco v. R. (1), where the patents remained in the hands of the patentees, here what was done, either by request or by compulsion, was that Mr. Handley Page parted with the whole of his property in the subject-matter. For what was his property? His property was the knowledge which he had acquired of the methods for constructing these machines, and in para. 4 it is stated that he was required to impart the knowledge I necessary to enable government contractors in various parts of the world to construct the machines, and that he complied with that requirement, so that he did not give them a mere user of a patent or a mere user of his property, but he handed over the whole, the substratum of his property. He had in substance nothing of his business left. His property was his secret process and his knowledge, and that property was, at the request or by compulsion of the government, dissipated among all his competitors. To speak of "user" as if there was some tree producing fruit seems to me an entire misconception of the facts. The whole tree, root and branch, was lost to him, and the

A award was given in compensation for the total loss of the substratum of his business. Once those facts are realised I think it must necessarily follow that this was in the nature of a capital payment and not income.

ROMER, L.J.—I, too, agree that this appeal must be allowed on the ground that these payments were capital payments and were not in the nature of profits or gains within B the meaning of those words as used in Sched. D.

I can state my reasons for arriving at that conclusion, I think, quite shortly. A patentee has, of course, a monopoly, and that monopoly, which is a right of preventing other people utilising his invention, is a capital asset in his hands. He may exploit that capital asset in either or both of the following ways: He can himself exercise his invention for profit or he can grant licences to others to do so on payment of royalty. C The profit he derives by exercising the invention himself or the profit he derives from the royalty are profits and gains within the meaning of Sched. D, notwithstanding the fact that every year his capital asset is diminishing in value. If, on the other hand, he sells the monopoly, or if—I cannot remember that such a case has ever happened—he surrenders his monopoly in consideration of a payment, the payment he received for the sale of the patent or the payment he received for surrendering his monopoly would D be a capital asset in his hands, and none the less so because, after surrendering the monopoly, he himself was in a position which enabled him, in competition with the rest of the world, still to exercise his own invention. The owner of a secret process such as was possessed by Mr. Handley Page stands in a very analogous position; he has not a monopoly at law, but he has a monopoly in fact—a monopoly in fact arising from the possession by him of the secret knowledge of the process that he is carrying on. That E secret knowledge is as much his capital asset as is the patent monopoly the capital asset of the patentee, and, like the patentee, he can use that capital asset in either or both of the following ways: he can himself carry on the secret process, or he may—it is very seldom done owing to the obvious danger involved—grant a licence to a third person to carry on the secret process, securing himself against his secret process being divulged by that third party to others. In both these cases the profits he derives from carrying F on the secret process himself and the royalty he might derive from the licensee would be annual profits or gains within the meaning of Sched. D. But supposing he sells his secret process or supposing, as here, he surrenders his quasi monopoly by making it public to the world, then I say that, if he gets paid for doing either one or the other of those things, the money he receives in payment is a capital asset. Here, at the invitation of the government, he surrendered to the world his secret knowledge, and his G capital asset thereupon ceased to exist. The payment in question in my opinion was made to him for the surrender of his capital asset, and, in his hands, is capital money not taxable under Sched. D or any other schedule.

April 8.—LORD ATKIN.—I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend LORD TOMLIN, and I entirely concur in it and have nothing to add.

I

LORD TOMLIN.—Two assessments to income tax were made upon the respondent under the provisions of Sched. D of the Income Tax Acts for the years ending respectively April 5, 1923, and April 5, 1924, each for the sum of £39,000 described in column 4 of the assessment under the heading of "Description of Trade Profession Vocation concern or other profit chargeable under Sched. D" as "Royal Commission award in respect of the user of certain patents and designs."

On an appeal to the general commissioners for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts the appellant (who is the Inspector of Taxes) abandoned the assessment for the year ending April 5, 1923, and agreed to the reduction of the figure of £39,000 in the other assessment to £30,483.

The commissioners affirmed the assessment of £30,483 for the year ending April 5, 1924. On appeal Finlay, J., affirmed the commissioners' decision, but the Court of Appeal have set the assessment aside.

To understand the nature of the case a story of some length and complexity has to be unfolded.

In and prior to 1909 the respondent carried on business as an engineer in Woolwich and owned an invention in relation to aeroplanes for which provisional protection had been obtained and also a registered design for a propeller. Neither the invention nor design formed any part of the design for either of the types of aeroplane which will be presently mentioned.

On June 17, 1909, a limited company called Handley Page, Ltd., with a nominal capital of £10,000 in 500 shares of £20 each, was registered as a private company to take over the respondent's business.

On July 27, 1909, the respondent and the company entered into an agreement by which the respondent sold and the company purchased for £500 (to be satisfied by the allotment of twenty-five fully-paid shares of £20 each in the company) the invention and design to which I have referred and the respondent's business and the goodwill thereof and the benefit of all contracts and agreements of the respondent in relation to the business and certain plant, machinery and effects.

By the agreement the respondent was appointed whole-time manager of the business for life at a salary which included a sum equal to 20 per cent. on the net annual profits earned by the company when not less than 10 per cent. for the year had been divided by way of dividend on shares.

Any improvement on the existing invention or design, and any further invention or design made by the respondent within five years from the registration of the company were under the terms of the agreement to belong to the company, and as consideration for this provision the respondent was allotted a further fifty fully-paid shares of the company of £20 each.

In fact no improvement, invention or design was made during the five years in question.

Paragraphs 3, 4 and 6 of the Case Stated contain findings to the following effect:

> "3. On the outbreak of war the company which then owned and was carrying on the business and was entitled to the goodwill thereof to the services of a skilled staff and in particular to the services of the appellant, worked out designs for large bombing aeroplanes which when made in accordance with those designs were known as the 'O' and 'V' types of aeroplane. These designs were not capable of being registered and were not in fact registered designs nor could they be made, nor were they in fact made, the subject of letters patent, though certain minor features were patented from time to time. In the evolution of these designs many questions of great technical difficulty were solved by the company's technical staff.
> "4. In 1917 H.M. Government resolved that machines should be made from the company's designs and accordingly required the company to impart the knowledge necessary to enable government contractors in various parts of the country to construct machines in accordance with the designs. The company in complying with this requirement distributed blue prints and drawings of the machines and imparted the necessary knowledge to such contractors (including the company's competitors in trade) by whom large numbers of 'O' and 'V' machines were constructed.
> "6. Just before the entry of the United States of America into the war the company had an opportunity of selling in America all its rights in the before-mentioned designs for a very large sum of money.
> "Before, however, the company could take advantage of this opportunity the United States of America became a belligerent power, with the result that by agreement between His Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States the company was required by His Majesty's Government to hand over all > its blue prints and designs relating to the said types of aeroplane to the American Government, and was required to instruct that Government how to build the said machines from the said designs.

> "The company accordingly handed over all its blue prints and designs as aforesaid and sent its draughtsmen and six foremen to America. By reason of the foregoing and by reason of the matters referred to in paras. 3 and 4 hereof the company parted with its trade secrets and lost its goodwill in relation to the said designs. In fact the disclosure of the said designs enabled several American companies to make large twin engine machines which previously had never been made in America."

Up to this point the position on these findings seems reasonably plain. The designs for the "O" and "V" types of aeroplane and the minor patented features were worked out by and belonged to the company, and any compensation which might become payable by reason of the action of the government in regard to these designs and patents would apparently be payable and belong wholly to the company. Compensation was later on paid in respect of these matters and the question is whether, having regard to what was subsequently done and to the circumstances of the case generally, the respondent has been properly charged to tax in respect of the year ending April 5, 1924, with a sum of £30,483, as though it were part of such compensation.

In 1918, after the government had compelled disclosure of the designs of the "O" and "V" types of aeroplane, and after these designs and the minor patented features had first come to be used in the United Kingdom by or on behalf of H.M. Government and in America by or on behalf of the Government of the United States of America, the respondent and the company entered into a further agreement dated May 28, 1918. This agreement was expressed to be made between the respondent (therein called the vendor) of the one part and the company of the other part, and to be supplemental to the agreement of July 27, 1909, and after a recital that no improvement, invention or design had been made during the five years mentioned in the principal agreement, the following recitals and provisions appeared, namely:

> "And whereas since the expiration of the said term of five years the vendor has made improvements upon the said invention and design (that is the invention and design mentioned in the principal agreement) and has made further inventions and designs and has applied for and obtained provisional protections and letters patent and registered designs in respect of such improvements and further inventions and designs which provisional protection letters patent and registered designs are more particularly specified in the schedule hereto and whereas the improvements and further inventions and designs and the provisional protection letters patent and registered designs in respect thereof are the sole property of the vendor as the company hereby admit and acknowledge which improvements further inventions and designs have pursuant to a verbal licence granted to the company by the vendor been hitherto used and exercised by the company in their business upon terms that the vendor should be paid by the company in consideration of such licence such sum as should be thereafter agreed now it is hereby agreed as follows:
> "1. As consideration for the said licence the company shall pay to the vendor (a) 10 per cent. on the prices charged by the company in respect of all such aeroplanes hydroplanes airships aeronautical apparatus machines engines and accessories (except bomb gear) and (b) 15 per cent. on the prices charged by the company in respect of all bomb gear at any time heretofore manufactured and sold by the company under any of the said letters patent inventions or designs set forth in the said schedule.
> "2. The company shall so long as the said licence continues pay to the vendor the like percentages in respect of all such aeroplanes hydroplanes airships aeronautical apparatus machines engines and accessories including bomb gear as the company shall manufacture and sell after the date of this agreement.
> "3. The said licence shall continue on the terms aforesaid until revoked by > notice in writing addressed by the vendor to the company which he may give at any time." A

The schedule to this agreement contained particulars of two British letters patent and of three applications for other British letters patent and of particulars of a registered design. One of these letters patent and the three applications for letters patent were concerned with some of the minor features of the design of the "O" type of aeroplane for the user of which compensation was afterwards paid. B Except to this extent the agreement seemed to have had no reference to the design either of the "O" or "V" type of aeroplane, though the effect of cl. 1 (a) may be that the 10 per cent. therein mentioned became payable on the price charged for any type of aeroplane which embodied any of the features covered by the particulars in the schedule.

The only things referred to in the recitals are: (1) Improvements on the original invention and design which have nothing to do with this case; C and (2) further inventions and designs particularised in the schedule. Of the particulars in the schedule only the four items to which I have referred are material to this case. With regard to those four items the statement in the recitals that they were the sole property of the respondent seems on the face of it to be at variance with the findings of the Case Stated, but the four items relate only to minor features.

D On March 19, 1919, the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors was erected by Royal Warrant of His Majesty. By the warrant the powers of the commissioners were set out under three heads. The first and third of these heads so far as material to the present appeal were as follows:

> "(1) In any case of user or alleged user of any patented invention for the services of the Crown by any government department and of default of agreement as to the E terms of user the commissioners upon the application of the patentee and agreement to accept their determination may proceed to settle and may settle the terms of user in lieu and place of the Treasury . . ."
> "(3) In any case of user or alleged user for the services of the Crown by any government department of any inventions designs drawings or processes which though not conferring any monopoly against the Crown or any statutory right to F payment or compensation may nevertheless appear from their exceptional utility or otherwise to entitle the inventor author or owner thereof to some remuneration for such user (including user by way of selling for use, licensing or otherwise dealing with any articles made in accordance therewith) the commissioners may on the request of the Treasury inquire into the circumstances of the case and make a recommendation to the Treasury as to the remuneration (if any) that is proper to be G allowed therefor."

It is to be noted that under head 1 the commissioners' duty was in certain circumstances to settle and award the amount which a patentee was legally entitled to for the use of his patent for the service of the Crown, while under head 3 the cases dealt with were cases in which there was no patent or other source of legal monopoly relied on and therefore no claim of right, and in which the commission only recommended to the H Treasury a payment by way of bounty. It is also to be observed that the commission had no power to determine the validity of a patent, accordingly if the validity of the patent of a claimant under head 1 was not admitted by the Crown, the claimant had either before coming to the commission to go to the ordinary courts of law to establish the validity of his patent or else to waive his claim under his patent and seek some compensation by way of bounty under head 3 of the Royal Warrant. I There was a subsequent Royal Warrant of Oct. 3, 1920, which further regulated the commissioners' powers, but it did not affect the position as I have stated it under the original Warrant.

On April 11, 1919, a new agreement was entered into between the respondent and the company in which the respondent is referred to as the vendor. This new agreement referred to the two previous agreements and recited as follows:

> "And whereas there is due from the company to the vendor the sum of £108,000 for royalties payable up to and including the 31st day of December, 1918, in respect of the inventions designs provisional protection letters patent and registered design > mentioned in the 2nd and 3rd parts of the schedule hereto and whereas the said inventions and designs have been used by His Majesty's Government and with such government's consent by the Government of the United States of America during the present war and the company has at the request of the vendor claimed from His Majesty's Government royalties or remuneration for such use and it has been agreed that all such royalties or remuneration as may be received by the company for such use up to the 31st day of December, 1918, shall be paid and shall belong to the vendor, but that all such royalties or remuneration for such use after the 31st day of December, 1918, shall belong to the company and whereas it was provided by the said agreement of May 28, 1918, that the licence therein mentioned should continue on the terms therein provided until revoked by notice in writing addressed by the vendor to the company."

The operative part of the new agreement provided (cl. 1) that the two earlier agreements and the licence with regard to the applications and inventions set forth in the third part of the schedule to the new agreement should be cancelled as from Dec. 31, 1918, save as was thereafter mentioned and (cl. 2) that the respondent should be paid by the company £108,800 in satisfaction of the royalties due to him for user by the company and remuneration up to Dec. 31, 1918. The same clause also provided as follows:

> "And (the company) shall also pay to the vendor all such royalties or remuneration as the company shall receive for the use of the said inventions and designs by His Majesty's Government or the Government of the United States of America up to Dec. 31, 1918. Should any question arise between the parties hereto as to what proportion of any sum which may be received from the government the vendor is entitled to the same shall be submitted to the auditors of the company for the time being whose certificate thereon shall be final and binding on both parties hereto."

Clause 3 provided for the sale by the respondent of all his rights and interests to and in the inventions, drawings, letters patent, applications for letters patent and design specified in the first, second, and third parts of the schedule to the agreement, and all rights of the respondent to obtain protection in foreign countries or the Dominions. The agreement also contained provisions for an assignment to the company of the letters patent or other rights sold and that such assignment should contain inter alia a covenant by the respondent to communicate to the company all such further inventions in connection with aircraft as he might make or discover or to which he might become entitled during the period of seven years from Jan. 1, 1919. The consideration for the sale and covenants was to be the issue by the company to the respondent of 140,000 fully-paid ordinary shares of £1 each, and the respondent was to hold office as managing director for a term of seven years from Jan. 1, 1919, upon the terms mentioned in the agreement.

The schedule to the agreement was divided into three parts. The first part was as follows: "Drawings showing the design of the Handley Page 'O' type aeroplane, the like Handley Page 'V' type aeroplane." The second part was the same as the schedule to the agreement of May 28, 1918, with the omission of a patent for bomb-releasing gear which has nothing to do with the appeal. The third part contained particulars of applications for four British letters patent relating to other minor features of the design of the "O" type of aeroplane.

Subsequently a deed of assignment was executed by which the respondent assigned to the company a large number of patents, including seventeen letters patent covering minor features of the designs of the "O" and "V" types mentioned in the award of the Royal Commission to which I shall presently refer; these seventeen letters patent or applications for letters patent included (a) the four letters patent and applications for letters patent already mentioned by me, of which particulars were set out both in the schedule to the agreement of May 28, 1918, and in the second part of the schedule to the agreement of April 11, 1919, and (b) the four applications for letters patent set out in the third part of the schedule to the agreement of April 11, 1919.

According to the findings of the Case Stated, (1) at the time when the agreement of April 11, 1919, was entered into large numbers of aeroplanes had been manufactured by the company in accordance with the designs of the "O" and "V" type (see para. 7); and (2) the agreement of April 11, 1919, was entered into because it was intended to turn the company into a public company (as was shortly afterwards done), the capital being increased by £150,000, and it was considered necessary that the appellant should have sold to the company everything which might be his in relation to aircraft and to have it clear that as from the date of this new agreement he had no other interest in the company than the share consideration.

On Dec. 3, 1919, the company presented two claims to this Royal Commission on awards to inventors, one relating to the design for the "O" type of aeroplane and the other relating to the design for "V" type of aeroplane. Each claim was in the same form, mutatis mutandis. Each claim showed the claimants to be the company and the company only. The subject of the claim was stated to be the design of the Handley Page "O" type (or "V" type) twin engine aeroplane, with minor features protected by specified patents and registered designs. Under heading 4 of the claim, "particulars of any other parties interested in the patents," the respondent's name was mentioned with the words, pursuant to an assignment by him to the claimants dated Oct. 21, 1919. Under heading 7 of the claim, "particulars of the alleged user," the company set out (inter alia) the following:

> "7. (a) The claimants are the designers and constructors of aeroplanes registered as a limited liability company in June, 1909, and since that date have been engaged in experimental work designing improved types of aeroplanes. At the outbreak of war they were specialising in the development of large weight carrying aeroplanes, and in 1915, a small contract was placed with them by the Air Department of the Admiralty for the supply of large machines for bombing purposes.
> "(b) In the middle of the year 1917, the Aircraft Production Department of the Ministry of Munitions received demands from the Forces for a large number of bombing machines and orders were placed with other contractors for the supply of large quantities of Handley Page aeroplanes. The claimants, at the request of the Department of Aircraft Production and in order to increase the output of these machines, imparted the special knowledge they had acquired in the construction of bombing machines to other government contractors, handed over to them all the necessary drawings, &c., and dispatched trained staffs of engineers and others to all parts of the country to instruct fully the other contractors in the art of constructing Handley Page aeroplanes. For these services the claimants have received no payment whatsoever."

The claims were proceeded with under head 3 of the Royal Warrant, the patent rights in the minor features being waived.

On the same date the company lodged two further claims in respect of the American Government's user. The company was the sole claimant. Particulars of the invention were set out in the following terms:

> "(3) The subject of this claim is the design of the Handley Page 'O' type (or 'V' type as the case might be) twin engine aeroplane—the only really successful large bomb carrying machine produced either in Great Britain or by any of the allied and associated powers. The only really successful large bomb carrying machines produced by the opposing belligerents was the German Gotha, the design of which was copied from an 'O' type aeroplane which accidentally landed in German territory."

Particulars of patents, patent applications and registered designs protecting minor features of this design were also set out. Particulars of this alleged user were given as follows:

> "(7) The British Government handed over the drawings of the Handley Page 'O' type (or 'V' type) aeroplane to representatives of the Government of the United States of America, and these were thereupon used by American contractors in the construction in America of Handley Page aeroplanes. The claimants were > A moreover entirely prohibited from constructing these machines in the United States and thereby lost a considerable revenue both in profits on sales and in royalties on machines not constructed by them. Furthermore, the claimants have lost a considerable goodwill in the United States as their designs and trade secrets have been handed over to trade competitors in the United States. The reputation of the claimants has also suffered by the fact that machines made by other firms B in America may have proved faulty owing to inferior materials and workmanship which the claimants would not have permitted had they supervised the manufacture thereof."

In each case the claimants claimed as compensation for the past, present and future user for this type of machine by the Government of the United States of America and C for the losses which the company had suffered the lump sum of £250,000.

On May 15, 1922, the Royal Commission made one award in respect of the two claims of the company in relation to the user of the designs of the two types of machines by the British Government. The award so far as material was in the following form:

> "The commission having inquired into the circumstances of the case recommend to the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury that the sum of D £30,000 (thirty thousand pounds) is proper to be paid by way of remuneration to the applicants, Messrs. Handley Page, Ltd., in respect of user by the Crown of all 'O' type twin engine aeroplanes and 'V' type four engine aeroplanes, which down to May 1, 1922, had been or were being manufactured for the service of the Crown by companies, firms or persons other than the applicants and of all parts or appliances of or in connection with the said aeroplanes including those protected by E the letters patent or applications therefor set out in the schedule hereto."

The letters patent or applications set out in the schedule were the seventeen patents or applications for patents to which I have already referred.

Difficulties arose in connection with the claims arising out of the American user and as a result of an agreement with the American Government dated Jan. 11, 1923, these claims were dealt with by a body consisting of the Royal Commission and the American F Commission for the Adjustment of Foreign Claims sitting together and new particulars of claim were put in on Jan. 25, 1923. On this occasion the respondent's name was joined with the company as one of the claimants apparently because the claim was now in part based upon an alleged contract made by the British Government with the respondent to be responsible for compensation in respect of the user by the American Government.

G On March 21, 1923, the joint body made one award on the claims in respect of American user in the following terms:

> "The Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors and the Commission for the Adjustment of Foreign Claims appointed by the War Department, United States of America (hereinafter called the Joint Commission) having taken into consideration H the matters referred to them by the memorandum of agreement dated Jan. 11, 1923, and made between Handley Page, Ltd., and Frederick Handley Page (hereinafter called the claimants) of the first part the President of the Air Council of the second part and the Assistant Secretary of War of the United States of America of the third part and having heard the respective parties therein award and determine that the amount proper to be paid by His Majesty's Government to the claimants I in respect of the communication to and (or) user by or on behalf of the Government of the United States of the invention or inventions design or designs in the said Memorandum of Agreement mentioned is the sum of nine thousand pounds sterling (£9,000).
> "The said sum is awarded and is to be taken in full satisfaction of all claims by the claimants which are mentioned in the said agreement down to the date hereof."

The sum of £30,000 recommended for payment by the Royal Commission by their award of May 15, 1922, was paid to the company in October, 1923, by means of a settlement in account with the Treasury under an agreement dated Oct. 17, 1923. The £9,000 awarded by the joint body by the award of March 21, 1923, was paid to the company in the course of the year ending April 5, 1924.

The question whether as between the respondent and the company the former was entitled to be paid anything by the company in respect of the £39,000 received by the company under the awards does not appear to have been dealt with until some years later.

The minutes of a board meeting of the directors of the company held on Feb. 14, 1927, contain the following entry:

> "Mr. Handley Page's proposals for a settlement of his claims against the company in regard to the 'O' and 'V' and 'American User' awards were discussed and subject to his undertaking to meet any claim against the company for income tax payable in respect of the value of the awards now agreed to be due to him it was resolved that his claim for approximately £30,400 in respect of compensation for sale of assets by disclosure of plans be admitted in full in consideration of which he would release to the company the sum of approximately £2,400—the company in turn agreeing to bear tax on the latter amount should it be assessed against them. It was further resolved that the net amount of approximately £28,000 due be paid to him over a period of five years, bearing in the meantime interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum; such interest to commence from the date of this arrangement subject to the scheme for reorganisation going through."

It is admitted that the respondent under this minute received from the company the sum of £30,483 though there is nothing to show how this amount was arrived at. This is the sum in respect of which the respondent has been assessed to income tax under Sched. D for the year ending April 5, 1924.

At first sight it seems paradoxical that the respondent should be assessed for tax for the year ending April 5, 1924, for a sum of £30,483 as being a sum awarded by the Royal Commission when in fact no sum was ever awarded to him by the Royal Commission (except so far as he may be said to have been one of the claimants to which the £9,000 was awarded by the joint body) and such sum as he did receive was paid to him not by the Treasury under any award but by the company in 1927 "in settlement of his claims against the company." The appellant, however, says that all the claims were made by the company on behalf of themselves and the respondent and their receipt in 1923 of the amounts awarded were receipts, so far as the respondent was entitled to the money, as agent for him, and were therefore receipts by him in 1923, and that the fact of there being a dispute between the company and the respondent as to the amount of the latter's share remaining unsettled till 1927 makes no difference to the position. Further, the appellant says that the amounts awarded were taxable items of receipts under Sched. D, relying upon the decision in Constantinesco v. R. (1), where an award under head 1 of the Royal Warrant was dealt with.

The respondent, on the other hand, denies the agency of the company, contends that the £30,483 was paid to him in satisfaction of a contractual claim against the company, and was not received under any award and cannot be treated as received before it was actually received by him, and in any case further contends that any sum receivable as the result of an award under head 3 of the Royal Commission is a matter of bounty and is also of a capital nature and is not therefore assessable to income tax under Sched. D.

The general commissioners gave no reason for affirming the assessment. Finlay, J., dismissed the appeal from the general commission, holding, as I understand, that the company were the agents of the respondent and must be treated as having received the sum of £30,483 for him in 1923 and that the same was in the nature of a profit assessable to tax under Sched. D. The Court of Appeal, without considering the relations between the company and the respondent, held that the assessment must be discharged. The Master of the Rolls took the view that any payment made in respect of an award under head 3 of the Royal Warrant was voluntary and not taxable under Sched. D, and all three members of the court held that such a payment was in the nature of a capital payment and not taxable under Sched. D.

Now I confess that I do not think it possible to dispose of this case without first reaching a conclusion as to the rights inter alia of the company and the respondent and as to the character in which the claims were put forward by the company. This is not easy to do by reason of the obscurity of some of the documents, and the difficulty of reconciling some of the passages contained in them with the findings of the Case Stated.

No doubt until the company became a public company and issued shares to the public the respondent and the company, though in law separate entities, were for practical purposes the same. The respondent controlled the company, he was its whole-time manager, and probably mainly its inventive mind. So far as actual patents or applications for patents standing in his name are concerned, they may well have been his property though used by the company in its business. But the claims against the government were in respect of designs for types of aeroplanes worked out in the company's shop, with the company's material and by the company's staff including, of course, the respondent. These designs were not registrable as designs and were not covered (except in minor details) by patents. In such a design so far as not covered by registrable design or patent there is no legal monopoly or property. There is property no doubt in the drawings and plans in which it is embodied, and if the design is kept secret it may be protected by those remedies which are available against breaches of confidence. Bearing these conclusions in mind and having regard to all the circumstances and documents which I have related and set out, I think that there is no substantial irreconcilability between the documents and the findings in the Case Stated.

It seems to me that the respondent had, so far as the subject of the claims is concerned, no property in the designs except to the extent that minor features were covered by patents in his name and when he affected to sell all his rights and interests in (inter alia) the drawings mentioned in part four of the schedule to the agreement of April 11, 1919, he was only in effect saying so far as those drawings embody features covered by any patents you are to have any rights after Dec. 31, 1918. I think that the designs of the "O" and "V" types (so far as they can be the subject of property and subject to the respondent's claim in respect of the patented minor features) belonged to the company, and that throughout the period covered by the claims the company had the right to the designs and the right to use under their agreements with the respondent the patented features. The forms of the claims before the Royal Commission make it plain that the designs in their entirety were regarded by the company as theirs to use, and that the company was claiming on the footing of the damage suffered by the company and on no other footing and were claiming on their own behalf and not on behalf of or as agent for the respondent.

Nevertheless, under the agreements the respondent had, I think, a definite contractual right against the company to an appropriate payment by the company for user in respect of those features which were covered by patents belonging to him prior to Dec. 31, 1918, but this was an unliquidated contractual claim. In no sense had he any right to any part of the actual moneys paid to the company by the Treasury. The fact that £30,000 was paid by a settlement in account with the Treasury without apparently the respondent requiring any provision to be made for him out of it seems in accordance with this view. I think that the company could do what they liked with the money payable to them by the Treasury.

I do not think that the joinder of the respondent in the American claims makes any difference to the position. He was in my judgment joined pro forma only because of an allegation of an agreement made between the British Government and him acting on behalf of the company.

If this be, and I think it is, the right view, the question of the agency of the company disappears and the Attorney-General candidly and fairly admitted before your Lordships' House that if the plea of the agency of the company could not be sustained the appeal must fail. I think that the sum of £30,483 was only received by the respondent when it was paid to him in 1927 by the company in discharge of its contractual obligation to him.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the questions passed upon in the Court of Appeal, and I do not desire to give any indication of opinion one way or the other in regard to them.

In my opinion this appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

LORD MACMILLAN.—I agree.

LORD WRIGHT.—I also agree.

LORD ATKIN.—I am asked by my noble and learned friend, LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, to say that he also agrees.

Appeal dismissed.
